

Pol. g.

210

4'

Lidney

DISCOURSES CONCERNING GOVERNMENT

BY ALGERNON SYDNEY

WITH HIS LETTERS TRIAL APOLOGY

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

LONDON PRINTED FOR A. MILLAR

MDCCLXIII

OR TO THE UNJUST TRIBUNALS UNDER CHANGE OF TIMES

PREPARED TO THE FIRST EDITION OF THE

DISCOURSES CONCERNING GOVERNMENT

BY ALEXANDER HAMILTON

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

WITH HIS LETTERS

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

BY ALEXANDER HAMILTON

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

WITH HIS LETTERS

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

BY ALEXANDER HAMILTON

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

WITH HIS LETTERS

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

BY ALEXANDER HAMILTON

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

WITH HIS LETTERS

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

BY ALEXANDER HAMILTON

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

WITH HIS LETTERS

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

BY ALEXANDER HAMILTON

AND SOME MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE

MDCCCLXIII

* PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION OF THE DISCOURSES CONCERNING GOVERNMENT
PRINTED MDCLXXXVIII

How highly the writings of wise and good men concerning government have been esteemed in all ages; the testimony of history, and the preservation of so many books composed by the antients on that subject, do sufficiently manifest. And it may be truly said, that unless men have utterly abandoned themselves to all that is detestable, they have seldom attempted to detract from the worth of the assertors of liberty, tho' ambition and other passions, have influenced them to act in opposition to it. When Augustus had surpris'd a young Roman, who was related to him, reading a political discourse of Cicero, he commended his judgment in that choice. The history of France, written by the president de Thou, with a spirit of freedom that might have been worthy of those who had lived before the violation of their liberty, has been so generally valued by men of all ranks in that nation, that it is hard to find a book on any important subject, which has had so many Editions. And the just esteem, that the emperor Charles the Fifth, made of the memoirs of Philip de Commynes, tho' that Author has given so many instances of his detestation of tyranny, may be enough to put this matter out of dispute. But if all other proof were wanting, the implacable hatred and unwearied industry of the worst of men to suppress such writings, would abundantly testify their excellency.

That nations should be well informed of their rights, is of the most absolute necessity; because the happiness or infelicity of any people intirely depends upon the enjoyment or deprivation of liberty; which is so invincibly proved in the following

* By John Toland. Besides the "Discourses concerning Government," he also collected and first published Milton's prose-works; and Harrington's works, "some of them from the original manuscripts."

discourses, that to endeavour to make it more clear, would be an unpardonable presumption.

If any man think the publication of this work to be unreasonable at this time; he is desired to consider, that as men expect good laws only from good government, so the reign of a prince, whose title is founded upon the principle of liberty which is here defended, cannot but be the most proper, if not the only time to inform the people of their just rights; that from a due sense of their inestimable value, they may be encouraged to assert them against the attempts of ill men in time to come.

'Tis not necessary to say any thing concerning the person of the author. He was so well known in the world, so universally esteemed by those who knew how to set a just value upon true merit, and will appear so admirable in the following discourses, as not to stand in need of a flattering panegyrick. But it may not be amiss to say something of the discourses now published.

The paper delivered to the sheriffs immediately before his death informs us, that he had left a large and a lesser treatise, written against the principles contained in Filmer's book; and that a small part of the lesser treatise had been produc'd for evidence against him at his Tryal. 'Tis there also said, that the lesser treatise neither was, nor probably ever should have been finished. This therefore is the large work mentioned in that paper, and not the lesser, upon part of which the wicked sentence pronounc'd and executed against him was grounded.

It remains only to add a few words for satisfaction of the public, that these discourses are genuine. And here I shall not need to say, that they were put into the hands of a person of eminent quality and integrity, by the author himself; and that the original is, in the judgment of those who knew him best, all written by his own hand: his inimitable manner of treating this noble subject is instead of a thousand demonstrations, that the work can belong to no other than the great man whose name it bears.

MEMOIRS OF A. SYDNEY

Though there is nothing more useful and entertaining than the lives of great and excellent men, yet it often happens, that through the neglect of their friends and contemporaries, proper materials are wanting; and thus it is in the present case. One cannot but wonder, that the life of our author, who was a man of such excellent abilities, such a lover of liberty, and who died for the glorious cause, was never attempted by any of his intimate friends, and such as were acquainted with the most remarkable passages concerning him. To retrieve this error as much as we can, we shall lay together in one view, what can now be gathered from various authors, who occasionally mention the name and actions of colonel Sydney: and it is to be hoped, that this short account, though very imperfect, may do some justice to the memory of that noble person, and give some instruction to the reader.

Algernon Sydney, descended from a very antient and honourable family, and was * second son of Robert earl of Leicester, by Dorothy, eldest daughter of Henry Percy earl of Northumberland; to whom his lordship was married in the year 1618. The exact year when our author was born is not certain, but it was probably about the year 1622. His noble father was careful to give him a good education; and in 1632, when he went ambassador to Denmark, took his son with him; as also, when he was ambassador to the king of France in 1636: and the countess, his mother, † in a letter to the Earl then at Paris, acquaints his lordship, that she hears her son much commended by all that came from thence; and that one, who spake well of very few, said, "he had a huge deal of witt, and † much sweetness of nature." Upon the breaking out of the rebellion in Ireland, the latter end of the year 1641, he had a commission for a troop of horse in the regiment of his father, who was then lord-lieutenant of that kingdom; and he went over thither with his eldest brother Philip lord viscount Lisle, distinguishing himself upon all occasions with great gallantry against the rebels. In the year 1643, he had the king's permission to return to England; for which purpose the earl his father gave him likewise a licence, dated at Oxford June 22, that year; but landing in Lancashire in August following, he was, by order of Parliament, brought up in custody to London, where he was prevailed on to take a command under them: and on the 10th of May 1644, the earl of Manchester, major-general of several counties, constituted him captain of a troop of horse in his own regiment. His brother the lord viscount Lisle, being soon after appointed lieutenant-general of Ire-

* Collins's Peerage of England, and Memoirs of the lives and actions of the Sydneys.

† Collins's Letters and memorials of state, vol. ii. p. 445.

‡ This sweetness of nature (with a huge deal of wit) appears remarkably in the portrait of him, which was painted at Brussels in the year 1663, yet at Penshurst; and made, whatever some have thought, an essential part of his noble disposition.

land, and general of the forces there, gave him the command of a regiment of horse to serve in the expedition thither: and it appears by the * MS. journal of the earl his father, that he was likewise lieutenant-general of the horse in Ireland, and governor of Dublin; and that before he went into that kingdom, he had the government of Chichester, and † was in the battle at York, and several other engagements. In the same journal the earl writes as follows; " On the 8th of April 1647, early in the morning, " the house of commons being then thin, and few of my son's friends present, it was moved by Mr. Glyn the recorder, that colonel Jones should " be made governor of Dublin in chief, and not deputy-governor to Algernon Sydney; pretending that Jones would not go, unless he might be governor, which was not true, Jones having accepted of the place of deputy-governor from the committee at Derby-house, who had also appointed the Lord Lisle to commission his brother Algernon to be governor of Dublin, which he had done before he went into Munster. This " motion of the recorder was seconded by old Sir Henry Vane, who pretended that his conscience moved him to be of opinion, that since the " house had thought proper to recal the lord Lisle, it was not fit to let his " brother, Algernon Sydney, remain governor of so important a place as " Dublin. Sir William Armyn and others, opposed this motion, alledging, that if they had used one brother ill, they ought not to do injustice " to the other, who had so well deserved of them. But it was carried " against him, and the government was conferred on Jones. After which " resolution, it was moved, that some recompence might be given to " Algernon Sydney, according to his merit; to which the house assented " without opposition." And on the 7th of May, colonel Sydney had || the thanks of the House for his good services in Ireland; and was afterwards made governor of Dover. In January 1648, he § was nominated one of king Charles's judges, though he did not sit among them. What his reasons were for declining this, we know not. 'Tis manifest that he was, both by inclination and principle, a zealous republican; and, on that account, ¶ a violent enemy to Oliver Cromwell, when he assumed to himself the government, to which, as well as to that of Richard, his successor, he was ab-

* Collins's Memoirs, p. 150.

† Colonel Sydney also, son to the Earl of Leicester, charged with much gallantry in the head of my Lord of Manchester's regiment of horse, and came off with much honour, though with many wounds, the true badges of his honour; and was sent away afterward to London for cure of his wounds.

The Parliamentary Chronicle, part 3. p. 273.

|| Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 246. Edit. 1732.

§ Our authority for this article is taken from Echard's history of England, p. 675 and 697.

¶ Whitelocke, p. 678.

folutely

solutely irreconcilable. But, upon the resignation of Richard, the long parliament being restored in May 1659, and having passed a declaration, "to secure the liberty and property of the people, both as men and christians, and that without a single person, kingship, or house of lords, and to uphold the magistracy and the ministry," he adhered to them; and was appointed one of the council of state, with the lord Fairfax, Bradshaw, Sir Henry Vane, general Ludlow, Sir Arthur Haselrig, Fleetwood, Lambert, † col. Henry Marten, Mr. Thomas Challoner, Mr. Thomas Scot, || Mr. Henry Neville, Mr. Wallop, and others. On the 5th of June he was likewise nominated, with Sir Robert Honeywood and Bulstrode Whitlocke † Within two days after this discourse from Mr. Fiennes, Mr. Hyde walking between the parliament house and Westminster, in the church-yard met with Harry Marten, with whom he lived very familiarly; and speaking together about the proceedings of the house, Marten told him, that he would undo himself by his adhering to the court; to which he replied, that he had no relation to the court, and was only concerned to maintain the government and preserve the law: and then told him, he could not conceive what he proposed to himself, for he did not think him to be of the opinion or nature with those men who governed the house; and asked him what he thought of such and such men; and he very frankly answered, he thought them knaves, and that when they had done as much as they intended to do, they should be used as they had used others. The other pressed him to say what he desired; to which, after a little pause, he very roundly answered, I do not think one man wise enough to govern us all: which was the first word he had ever heard any man speak to that purpose; and would, without doubt, if it had then been communicated or attempted, been the most abhorred by the whole nation of any design that could be mentioned: and yet it appears it had even so early [1640 or 1641] entered into the hearts of some desperate persons; that gentleman being at that time possessed of a very great fortune, and having great credit in his county.

The life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, part i. p. 81. octavo edit. The colonel was author of divers curious tracts; and was also a principal promoter of the publishing of "The first Century of scandalous malignant priests," "The King's Cabinet opened," and other state tracts. See his character in A. Wood's Athenae Oxonienses, and in Bishop Kennet's historical register; but drawn in bitterness of wrath and anger.

|| Henry Neville, second son of Sir Hen. Neville of Billingbeare in Berks, was educated at Oxford. In the beginning of the civil war, he travelled into Italy and other countries, whereby he advanced himself much as to the knowledge of modern languages and men; and returning in 1645 or thereabouts, became Recruiter in the Long Parliament for Abingdon in Berkshire, at which time he was very intimate with Harry Marten, Thos. Chalmer, Thos. Scot, James Harrington, and other zealous commonwealths men. In Nov. 1651, he was elected one of the Council of State, being then a favourite of Oliver; but when he saw that person gaped after the government by a single person, he left him, was out of his favour, and acted little during his government. In 1658 he was elected Burgess for Reading to serve in Richard's Parliament; and when that person was deposed, and the Long Parliament shortly after restored, he was again elected one of the Council of State.—He was a great Rota-man, was one of the chief persons of James Harrington's club of commonwealths men, to instil their principles into others; he being esteemed to be a man of good parts, and a well-bred gentleman. At the appearance of "The Commonwealth of Oceana," it was greedily bought up, and coming into the hands of Tho. Hobbes of Malmsbury, he would often say, that Harry Neville had a finger in that pye, and those that knew them both were of the same opinion. By that book, and both their smart discourses and inculcations daily in Coffee houses, they obtained many proselytes. In 1659, in the beginning of locke Esq; to go commissioners to the Sound, * in order to mediate a peace between the kings of Sweden and Denmark. But Mr. Whitelocke was not willing Mich. term, they had every night a meeting at the then Turk's Head, in New palace yard, Westminster, called Miles's Coffee house, to which place their Disciples and Virtuosi would commonly repair: and their discourses about government and ordering of a Commonwealth, were the most ingenious and smart that ever were heard, the arguments in the Parliament House being but flat to those. They had a balloting box, and balloted how things should be carried, by way of Tentamens; which not being used or known in England before, on that account, the room every evening was very full. Besides the author and Harry Neville, who were the prime men of this club, were Cyriac Skinner, a Merchant's son of London, an ingenious young gentleman, and scholar to John Milton, which Skinner sometimes held the chair; Major John Wildman, Charles Wolfeley of Staffordshire, Roger Coke, William Poultney, (afterwards a Knight) who sometimes held the chair; John Hoskyns, John Aubrey, Maximilian Pettie of Tetworth in Oxfordshire, a very able man in these matters, and who had more than once turned the Council-board of O. Cromwell; Michael Mallet, Philip Carteret of the Isle of Guernsey, Francis Cradock, a Merchant, Henry Ford, Major Venner, Thomas Marriot of Warwickshire, Henry Croane, Physician, Edward Bagshaw, of Christ Church, and Robert Wood of Lincoln College Oxford; James Arderne, then or soon after a Divine, with many others; besides auditors and antagonists of note. Dr. William Petty was a Rota-man. The doctrine was very taking, and the more, as there was no probability of the King's return. The greatest of the Parliament men hated this design of rotation and balloting, as being against their power. Eight or ten were for it, of which number Harry Neville was one, who proposed it to the house, and made it out to the members thereof, that except they embraced that way of government they would be ruined. The model of it was, that the third part of the Senate or House should rote out by ballot every year, so that every third year the said Senate would be wholly altered. No magistrate was to continue above three years, and all to be chosen by ballot; than which choice nothing could be invented more fair and impartial, as was then thought, tho' opposed by many for several reasons. This club of Commonwealths men lasted till about Feb. 21, 1659; at which time the secluded members being restored by General Manke, all their models vanished.—After the Restoration he absconded for a time; but being seized, he was among others imprisoned, tho' soon after set at liberty.

Mi.h.

Among various publications, there is a curious book of his, in octavo, intitled, "Plato Redivivus, or a Dialogue concerning government, wherein, by observations drawn from other kingdoms and states, both antient and modern, an endeavor is used to discover the present politic distemper of our own, with the remedies." It came out first in the month of October 1680, against the resitting of the Parliament, was very much bought up by the members thereof, and admired. Soon after, in the year 1681, it was republished with additions. In that book he says, "As for our History, it will not be forgotten. One of those, who was in employment from the year 40 to 60, hath written the history of those twenty years, a person of good learning and elocution; and though he be now dead, yet his executors are very unwilling to publish it so soon, and to rub a sore that is not yet healed. But the story is writ with great truth and impartiality, although the author was engaged both in councils and arms for the Parliament."—Reader, shouldst thou be possessed of such a history, bestow it upon the Public.

* The Committee of safety having dispatched a messenger to our fleet in the Sound before the election of the Council of State, to acquaint them with the restitution of the Parliament, the officers of the several ships assembled, and sent an acknowledgment of their authority, with all possible demonstrations of satisfaction. Notwithstanding which, being highly sensible of how great importance the sea-affairs are to this nation, we ordered six frigates to be equipped with all diligence, and gave the command of them to Lawson, making him at the same time vice-admiral of the fleet. And this we did, as well to prevent an invasion from Flanders, with which the Cavalier party threatened us, as to balance the power of Montague's party, who we knew was no friend to the commonwealth. We treated also with myn heer Nieuport, ambassador from the States of Holland, that a good correspondence might be maintained between the two Commonwealths, willing to undertake this service, especially being joined with those, who he knew, would expect precedence of him who had been formerly ambassador extraordinary to Sweden alone; and therefore he endeavoured to excuse himself by reason of his old-age and infirmities: and accordingly Mr. Thomas Boone was appointed in his room. The three plenipotentiaries set out for the Sound in July following, and arrived at Elfsineur on the 21st of that month; where they were attended by admiral Montagu, afterwards earl of Sandwich, who, in prospect of a revolution in favour of Charles II. to whom he was secretly engaged, resolved to return to England the month following with the whole fleet. Colonel Sydney, who was averse to that resolution, wrote to the Council of State from Copenhagen, to complain of the admiral's conduct in that point. His letters to his father, printed from the Sydney papers, and those written by him in conjunction with the other plenipotentiaries, published among secretary Thurloe's state papers, give us a distinct account of his negotiations.

As things soon after were evidently tending to the restoration of Charles II. colonel Sydney wrote thus in the postscript of one of those letters to his father, "I doe not say any thing of my owne intentions, in relation unto
 " the changes that are fallen out already, or the others that are dayly expected. The truth is, I knowe them not; the businesse is too difficult to
 " iudge of at this distance; especially, not knowing what will be in my " power or choice. If I doe not receaue newe orders, I shall returne
 " speedily home, and shall then followe that way which your lordship
 " shall command and my best friends aduise, as farre as I can, without " breaking the rules of honour or conscience; which I am sure will
 " neuer be expected from me by your lordship, nor thoes whoes opinions
 " I confider. While I am heare, I serue England, and will, with as much " care and diligence as I can, endeauour to aduance its interests, and followe
 " the orders of thoes that gouerne it. I reserue the determination of " other points to councells upon the place."

In another letter, dated at Stockholm, June 16, 1660, he writes, 'I ' am now at the utmost point of my iourney northward, and have nothing
 ' more in my thoughts, then to returne into England with as much monwealths, and that an accord might be made between the two kings of Denmark and Sweden, who were then enemies, by the interposition of the two States; who agreeing upon equitable terms, might be able to impose them on the refuser. And this we were in hopes to accomplish the rather, because neither the Dutch nor we pretended to any more than a freedom of passing and repassing the Sound, which could not well be if the command of it were in the hands of either of those princes. The Dutch ambassador seemed very desirous to finish the treaty, but by several demands which he made in the behalf of their merchants, delayed it so long, that our agent in Holland had already concluded an agreement with the States, whereby the two commonwealths became engaged to compel that king that should refuse to accept of the conditions which they thought just and reasonable. In order to put this resolution in execution, the States of Holland appointed their plenipotentiaries, and we on our part did the same, sending thither colonel Algernon Sydney, Sir Robert Honynwood, and one Mr. Boone, a merchant, to that end.

Memoirs of Edmund Ludlow, fol. edit. p. 254.

' ex-

' expedition as I can, according to the liberty granted unto my colleague
 ' and me by the councell of state. We could not think it at all rea' sonable, to leaue the work in which wee were employed, when wee
 ' sawe a certainty of accomplishing it within a short time, unlesse wee
 ' had receaued a positieue command: now the peace is concluded, I think
 ' we may very well iustify making use of that concession. I am heare
 ' alone: my colleague intended to make the same iourney, but the gout ' confined him unto his bed. I looke upon all the powers granted unto ' us, as extinguished by the comming in of the king, and doe not take ' upon me to act any thing as a publique minister, except it be giuing no' tice unto the crownes of Sweden and Denmark, of the restitution of the ' auncient gouernment in England, and the proclaiming of the king. Vpon
 ' this occasion I accept of a publique audience, which is heare offered unto ' me; I should haue auoided it upon all other occasions. I am detained
 ' heare somme dayes longer then I did expect; the queene and senate hau-
 ' ing bin out of towne when I arriued heare.—I doe not at all knowe in ' what condition I am theare [in England], nor what effects I shall find
 ' of generall Monk his expressions of kindnesse towards me, and his re' membrance of the auncient friendship that was between us; but the lord
 ' Fleetwoods letters to the senate and priuate persons here, mention discourfes ' that he makes much to my aduantage. I doe receaue neither more nor
 ' lesse ciuility heare then is ordinary, unlesse the excuses I receaue for re-
 ' ceauing noe more may deserue that name. I am in priuate told, they feare
 ' to offend the king by any extraordinary expressions towards me: your lord' ship may easily imagine how powerfull that consideration will be, when
 ' thoes in my condition can pretend to noe ciuilityes upon any other ac' count, but as they are respects unto their superiors and masters.'

In his letter of July 22, 1660, he observes, that he and his colleague, had the day before, taken their leave of the king of Denmark; and that himself was taking his way by Hamburgh and Holland; but did not yet very well know, in what place he should stay, until he heard further from England. "I did hope," says he, to his father, "that upon such occasions
 " as thoes that haue lately befallen me, your lordship would haue bin " pleased to send me somme commands and advises how to dispose of my self,
 " more particularly then by such a one as I had sent ouer with letters."

His father's answer to him, dated at London, Aug. 30, the same year, was as follows *.

' Difuse of writing, hath made it uneasy to me; age makes it hard; and
 ' the weakness of sight and hand makes it almost impossible. This may ' excuse me to every body, and particularly to you, who have not invited

* Familiar Letters written by John late earl of Rochester, and other persons of honour and quality.

' me much unto it ; but rather, have given me cause to think, that you were ' willing to save me the labour of writing, and yourself the trouble of read' ing my letters. For after you had left me sick, solitary, and sad at Pens-
 ' hurst; and that you had resolved to undertake the employment, wherein
 ' you have lately been; you neither came to give a farewell, nor did so much
 ' as send one to me, but only writ a wrangling letter or two about money, etc.
 ' And tho', both before and after your going out of England, you writ to ' divers other persons; the first letter that I received from you, was dated, as ' I remember, the 13th of September; the second in November; wherein
 ' you take notice of your mother's death: and, if there were one more, that ' was all, until Mr. Sterry came; who made such haste from Penshurst, that ' coming very late at night, he would not stay to dine the next day, nor to ' give me time to write. It is true, that since the change of affairs here and
 ' of your condition there, your letters have been more frequent. And if I ' had not thought my silence better, both for you and myself, I would have ' written more than once or twice to you. But though for some reasons I ' did forbear, I failed not to desire others to write unto you; and with their ' own, to convey the best advice, that my little intelligence and weak judg' ment, could afford; particularly, not to expect new authorities nor orders ' from hence; nor to stay in any of the places of your negotiation; not to ' come into England; much less, to expect a ship to be sent unto you; or
 ' to think, that an account was or could be expected of you here, unless it
 ' were of matters very different from your transactions there: that it would ' be best for you, presently to divest yourself of the character of a public
 ' minister; to dismiss all your train; and to retire into some safe place, not ' very near nor very far from England, that you might hear from your ' friends sometimes. And for this I advised Hamburgh, where I hear you ' are, by your man Powel, or by them that have received letters from you,
 ' with presents of wine and fish, which I do not reproach nor envy. Your ' last letter to me had no date of time or place; but by another at the same ' time to Sir John Temple, of the 28th of July, as I remember, sent by ' Mr. Miffenden, I guess that mine was of the same date. By those that ' I have had, I perceive, that you have been misadvised; for though I
 ' meet with no effects nor marks of displeasure, yet I find no such tokens
 ' or fruits of favour, as may give me either power or credit for those un' dertakings and good offices, which perhaps you expect of me. And ' now I am again upon the point of retiring to my poor habitation; having
 ' for myself no other design, than to pass the small remainder of my days
 ' innocently and quietly; and, if it pleases God, to be gathered in peace to ' my fathers. And concerning you, what to resolve in myself, or what ' to advise you, truly I know not; for you must give me leave to remember,
 ' of how little weight my opinions and counsels have been with you, and
 ' how unkindly and unfriendly you have rejected those exhortations and ad' monitions

monitions, which, in much affection and kindness, I have given you upon many occasions, and in almost every thing, from the highest to the lowest, that hath concerned you: and this you may think sufficient to discourage me from putting my advices into the like danger. Yet somewhat I will say: and first, I think it unfit, and perhaps as yet unsafe, for you to come into England; for I believe Powell hath told you, that he heard, when he was here, that you were likely to be excepted out of the general act of pardon and oblivion: and though I know not what you have done or said here or there, yet I have several ways heard, that there is as ill an opinion of you, as of any, even of those that condemned the late king. And when I thought there was no other exception to you, than your being of the other party, I spoke to the general in your behalf, who told me, that very ill offices had been done you; but he would assist you as much as justly he could. And I intended then also to speak to somebody else; you may guess whom I mean; but since that, I have heard such things of you, that in the doubtfulness only of their being true, no man will open his mouth for you. I will tell you some passages, and you shall do well to clear yourself of them. It is said, that the university of Copenhagen brought their album unto you, desiring you to write something therein; and that you did “scribere in albo” these words,

“ ———Manus haec inimica tyrannis

“ Ense petit placidam sub libertate quietem.”

and put your name to it. This cannot chuse but be publicly known, if it be true. It is also said, that a minister, who hath married a lady Laurence, here at Chelsea, but now dwelling at Copenhagen, being there in company with you, said, “I think you were none of the late king’s judges, nor guilty of his death,” meaning our king. * “Guilty! said you, do you call that guilt? why, it was the justest and bravest action, that ever was done in England, or any-where else,” with other words to the same

[* Guilty! said you, do you call that guilt?]

—— I confesse, this were a worke, and I hope it will be found fit for the divine pen of that second Saint Peeter the Lord Bishop of London, who followed this martyred King, and King of Martyrs to that block whereon his ever blessed head made a sacred crosse, and the nearest to that whereon the celestial King dyed, since the day of his glorious sufferings.

Had that great and eminent Chronologer of Saints, Baronius, lived in these days, surely the life and death, the acts and passions of this ever blessed Saint, had alone furnished his eloquent pen with heavenly worke, to have exceeded both in weight and glory, all that canonized catalogue of Saints triumphant, which for good use and imitation he hath brought to light. For what malice is there yet remaining amongst his accursed enemies, to deny, that in life and death, this King ran in the paths, and as neare as mortall man could doe, to the example and marke of Jesus Christ, the authour and finisher of his faith and sufferings?

How he was betrayed and pursued, is witnessed by and in the yeares 1639, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, and 45. How he fled from one sinfull nation to another wicked people, is recorded to the living ‘ same effect. It is said also, that you having heard of a design to seize ‘ upon you, or to cause you to be taken prisoner, you took notice of it to living infamy of the ever trayterous Scots in the year 46. How he was sold at a price by the said accursed Scots, to his cruel and causelesse enemies the Jewish English, is registred in the year 47. How he was tossed between Herod the damned Independent, and Pilate the devilish Presbyterian; and between them againe delivered up to the tumults of the said accursed Jews to be crucified, is manifested in the year 48. How he was arraigned, condemned, buffeted, spit upon, and crucified by the conspiring skum of his own rebellious people, not once opening a mouthful of revenge against them, is yet written against them in letters of that sacred blood, which from his blessed neck hasted over his divine head to advance his everlasting title CHARLES OF BRITAINE KING OF THE JEWS. And this was engraven upon the even adamantine hearts of his bitter adversaries on that most sorrowful day to us, but ever blessed to his majesty, tuesday Jan. 30, 1648. How they parted his rayment amongst them, and cast lots upon his vesture, is witnessed by that furrier, to whom they sold his Majesties rich fables gowne, because they would not injure their own profit. Thus farre his sufferings went along with his Saviour’s, etc. etc. etc.

 ‘ the

The Royal Legacies of Charles the first of that name, of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, KING and MARTYR, to his persecutors and murderers. Being a short paraphrase upon his Majesties most christian and most charitable speech, delivered immediately before his translation. Dedicated to his Majesties loyal and disconsolate subjects. Printed in the year 1649.—in quarto.

——But now the glory is departed from (our) Israel, the arke of God is taken, and how is England become a widow? made a prey unto cruell people and skilfull to destroy, who dayly force and prostitute her unto their wicked purposes. For these things let England, (and every true hearted Englishman) say, I weep, mine eye, mine eye runneth downe with water, because the Comforter (KING CHARLES) that should relieve my soul is farre from me. The breath of our Nostrils, the Anointed of the Lord, etc.; the life of our Religion, of our Lawes, of our Liberties, is taken from us; the Image of God’s power in supreme authority, indemnity, and inviolability is taken from us; our Phisitian, our nursing Father, our Comforter, our Protector is taken from us, and, for our sins, was taken in their pits; so that now we want the wings of his protection among these Hea:hen among whom we live; we are now made very slaves unto the worst of Heathen, a people without God, without faith, without law, without rule, without reason, without humanity, without all these, and whose unruly will only, is unto all these. etc. etc. etc.

The Subjects sorrow. Or Lamentations upon the death of Britaines Josiah, KING CHARLES, most unjustly and cruelly put to death by his own people, before his Royal Palace Whitehall, Jan. 30, 1648. Expressed in a Sermon upon Lam. 4. 20. Wherein the divine and royal prerogatives, personal virtues, and theological graces of his late Majesty are briefly delivered: And that his Majesty was taken away in God’s mercy unto himselfe, and for the certaine punishment of these Kingdomes, from the parallel is clearly proved. London, printed in the yeare 1649—in quarto.

——The person that was now murdered, was not the Lord of Glory, but a glorious Lord, Christ’s own Vicar, his Lieutenant and Vicegerent here on earth, within his dominions. And therefore by all lawes divine and humane, he was privileged from any punishment that could be inflicted by men. Albeit he was as inferiour to Christ as man is unto God, the creature unto the immortall Creator; yet was his privilege of inviolability farre more clear than was Christ’s. For Christ was not a temporal Prince, his Kingdome was not of this world, and therefore when he vouchsafed to come into the world, and to become the sonne of man, he did subject himselfe unto the law; hee, who only could choose when to be borne, made choise to be borne at that time when there was a decree for taxing all the world, that so soone as he was

‘ the king of Denmark himself, and said, “ I hear there is a design to seize “ upon me; but who is it that hath that design? Est ce nôtre bandit?”
 ‘ by

was borne he might be inrolled a subject unto Caesar; he lived as a subject, payed tribute unto Caesar; he submitted unto Pilat's jurisdiction, acknowledging that hee had power given him from above. But our gracious Sovereigne was well knowne to be a temporall Prince, a free Monarch, and their undoubted Sovereigne, to whom they did all owe and had sworne allegiance; and therefore he could not be judged by any power on earth. He disclaimed their authority, as he well might; for they had no power at all over any, much lesse over him. And what power they usurped, was not de super, as Pilat's, but de subter, from beneath, even from the angell of the bottomlesse pit, whose name is Abaddon; for as he seeks the destruction of all men, so especially of Kings, because by their government peace is preserved, justice executed, and religion maintained. But from above they had no power; for God never gave unto the people power over their King: as is evident by Scripture, by the law of nature and nations, by the knowne lawes of England, by cleare and undeniable reasons, and by the constant doctrine and practice of the true, antient, and Catholic church. And yet those monstrous traytors, have sacrilegiously invaded God's throne, and usurped his office, whose peculiar it is to be judge of Kings; and so have ventured to try, judge, condemne, and execute their King, in despite of all law, reason, religion, nature and God himselfe. etc. etc. etc.

The Martyrdome of King Charles. Or his conformity with Christ in his sufferings. In a sermon on 1 Cor. 2. 8. [which none of the princes of this world knew: for had they knowne it, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory.] Preached at Bredah, before his Majesty of Great Britaine and the Princeesse of Orange. By the Bishop of Downe, June $\frac{3}{3}$ 1649. Christiani nunquam sunt inventi Cassiani. Tertull. Hage, Printed 1649—in quarto.

Extracts of Restoration, and anniversary thirtieth of January sermons, might have been likewise added; but these shall suffice.

The Parliament of England, elected by the People whom they represent, and by them trusted and authorized for the Common good, having long contended against Tyranny, and to procure the well-being of those whom they serve, and to remove oppression, arbitrary power, and all opposition to the Peace and Freedom of the Nation; do humbly and thankfully acknowledge the blessing of Almighty God upon their weak endeavors, and the hearty assistance of the well-affected in this work, whereby the enemies thereunto, both public and secret, are become unable for the present, to hinder the perfecting thereof.

And to prevent their power to revive Tyranny, Injustice, War, and all our former evils, the Parliament have been necessitated to the late Alterations in the Government, and to that Settlement, which they judge most conducive to the honor of God, and the good of the Nation, the onely end and duty of all their labors.

And that this may appear the more clearly and generally, to the satisfaction of all who are concerned in it, they have thought fit to declare and publish the Grounds of their Proceedings.

They suppose it will not be denied, that the first Institution of the Office of a King in this Nation, was by agreement of the People; who chose one to that office for the protection and good of them who chose him, and for their better government, according to such laws as they did consent unto. And let those who have observed our Stories, recollect how very few have performed the trust of that office with righteousness and due care of their Subjects good. And how many have made it their study and labor, to satisfy their particular Ambition and Power, with high pressures and miseries upon their Subjects; and with what horrid prodigality of Christian blood, upon punctilio's of their own honor, personal titles and distates. And in the whole line of them, how far hath the late King exceeded all his Predecessors, in the destruction of those whom they

‘ by which you are understood, to mean the king. Besides this, it is reported, ‘ that you have been heard to say many scornful and contemptuous things ‘ of the king’s person and family, which, unless you can justify yourself, ‘ will

they were bound to preserve; and in stead of spreading his Protection to all, scarce permitting any to escape the violence of his fury.

To manifest this truth, it will not be improper to take a view of some passages in his reign, wherein he much further out-went all his Forefathers in evil, than any example can be found of punishment. etc. etc. etc.

A Declaration of the Parliament of England, expressing the grounds of their late Proceedings, and of settling the present government in the way of A Free State. London, printed Mar. 22, 1648—in quarto.

The Parliament likewise pulled down the King’s Statues at the West end of Paul’s and in the Royal Exchange, causing the following inscription to be placed in the nich of the latter,

EXIT. TYRANUS. REGVM. VLTIMVS
 ANNO. LIBERTATIS. ANGLIAE. RESTITUTAE. PRIMO
 ANNO. DOM. MDCXXXVIII. JAN. XXX

May it please your Lordship, my Lord President, and this High Court, erected for the most comprehensive, impartial, and glorious piece of justice, that ever was acted and executed upon the theatre of England, for the trying and judging of Charles Stuart, whom God in his wrath gave to be a king to this Nation, and will, I trust, in great love for his notorious prevarications and blood-guiltiness, take him away from us; He that hath been the original of all injustice, and the principal author of more mischiefs to the free-born People of this Nation, than the best Arithmetician can well enumerate, stands now to give an account of his Stewardship, and to receive the good of Justice, for all the evil of his injustice and cruelty. Had he ten thousand lives, they could not all satisfy for the numerous, horrid, barbarous Massacres of Myriades and legions of innocent persons, which by his commands, commissions, and procurements (or at least all the world must needs say, which he might have prevented; and he that suffers any man to be killed, when he may save his life without danger of his own, is a murderer) have been cruelly slain, and inhumanely murdered, in this renowned Albion; Anglia hath been made an Aeldama, and her younger sister Ireland a land of ire and misery. But now to dissect the charge. etc. etc. etc.

King Charles his Case. Or an appeal to all rational men concerning his tryal at the High Court of Justice. Being for the most part, that which was intended to have been delivered at the bar, if the King had pleaded to the Charge, and put himself upon a fair tryal. etc. By John Cook of Gray’s Inn, Barrester. London, printed 1649.—in quarto.

—The premises from first to last considered, that doctrine which prerogativeth Kings above the stroke of human justice, upon the account of their being unaccountable unto men for whatsoever they do, (which the Parliament taketh notice in their declaration of March 17, 1648, to have been the late King’s assertion) appears to be very extravagant, and eccentric to all principles both of Reason and Religion. Such an unaccountable Officer, (as the said declaration well expresseth it) were a strange monster to be permitted by man-kind. For if the main ground of erecting public administrations of justice and courts of humane judicature, in all polities and states whatsoever, be, both in reason and religion, to secure and protect those, who live justly and peaceably, against the violence and injustice of oppressours and unjust men; it must needs be contrary unto both, to exempt such persons from the jurisdiction of these courts and administrations, who have always the greatest opportunities and temptations, and, for the most part, the

' will hardly be forgiven or forgotten; for such personal offences make ' deeper impressions, than public actions, either of war or treaty. Here is a ' resident, as he calls himself, of the king of Denmark, whose name I hear
 ' is

the strongest bent of disposition and will, to practice such unrighteousness and oppression. etc.
 etc. etc.

The Obstructors of justice. Or a defence of the honorable sentence passed upon the late King by the High Court of justice. Opposed chiefly to "The serious and faithful representation and vindication of some of the Ministers of London." As also to "The humble address of Dr. Hammond, to His Excellencie and council of Warre." etc. By John Goodwin. London, 1649—in quarto.

——— Haecenus, quod initio institueram ut meorum civium facta egregia contra insanam et lividissimam furentis sophistae rabiem, et domi et foris defenderem, ju'que Populi commune ab injusto regum dominatu assererem, non id quidem regum odio, sed tyrannorum, Deo bene juvante videor jam mihi absolvisse: neque ullum sine responso vel argumentum, vel exemplum, vel testimonium ab adversario allatum sciens praetermisi, quod quidem firmitatis in se quicquam, aut probationis vim ullam habere videretur: in alteram fortasse partem culpa propior, quod saepiusculae ineptiis quoque ejus, et argutiis tritissimis, quasi argumentis, respondendo, id iis tribuisse videar, quo dignae non erant. Unum restat, et fortasse maximum, ut vos quoque, o Cives, adversarium hunc vestrum ipsi refutetis; quod nulla ratione video posse fieri, nisi omnium maledicta vestris optimè factis exuperare perpetuo contendatis. Vota vestra et preces ardentis-simas Deus, cum servitutis haud uno genere oppressi, ad eum confugistis, benignè exaudiit.
 Quae duo in vita hominum mala sanè maxima sunt, et virtuti damnosissima, tyrannis et su-perstitio, iis, vos gentium primos, gloriosè liberavit; eam animi magnitudinem vobis injecit, ut devictum armis vestris et dedititium regem judicio inclyto judicare, et condemnatum punire primi mortalium non dubitaretis. Post hoc facinus tam illustre, nihil humile aut angustum, nihil non magnum atque excelsum et cogitare et facere debetis. Quam laudem ut assequamini, hac sola incedendum est via, si ut hostes bello domuistis, ita ambitionem, avaritiam, opes, et secunda-rum rerum corruptelas, quae subigunt caeteras gentes hominum, ostenderitis vos etiam inermes media in pace omnium mortalium fortissimè debellare; si, quam in repellenda servitute fortitudinem praestitistis, eam in libertate conservanda justitiam, temperantiam, moderationem praestiteritis. His solis argumentis et testimoniis evincere potestis, non esse vos illos, quos hic probriis insequitur, perduelles, latrones, sicarios, parricidas, fanaticos; non vos ambitionis aut alieni invadendi studio, non seditione, aut pravis ullis cupiditatibus, non amentia aut furore percitos Regem trucidasse, sed amore libertatis, religionis, justitiae, honestatis, patriae denique charitate accensos, tyrannum punisse.———

Joannis Miltoni, Angli, pro Populo Anglicano, Defensio, contra Claudii, alias Salmasii Defensionem Regiam. Londini, typis Du Gardianis, A. D. 1651, in folio, quarto, duodecimo.

——— Now therefore, Right honourable! when I look upon You, and behold You more highly intrusted than Kings, and far more nobly adorned upon a better ground than they were, with all the Rights, Interests, and Privileges of the people; when I consider how God hath wrested the Sword out of their hands, and placed it in yours for our protection, with the conservation of our Peace and Liberties, and made You the happy instruments of freeing Us from the Yoke of Kings; when I call to minde, how nobly You asserted the Rights of England against Domestic Tyrannie, upon the neck of the late King, and laid the foundation of our freedom upon the highest act of justice; (when Justice sat more gloriously enthroned than ever it did before on any earthly Tribunal) I am raised with more than ordinarie confidence, that the same spirit of Justice, which acted You in Your former achievements for our establishment by land against him and his posterity, will carry You on, as You have begun, to vindicate those rights by sea against all foreign violations and invasions. It is your honor, that God hath made You founders of

‘ is Pedcombe ; he hath visited me, and offered his readines to give you ‘ any assistance in his power or credit, with the embassador Mr. Alfield, who ‘ was then expected, and is now arrived here, and hath had his first audi‘ ence. I have not seen Mr. Pedcombe since ; but within a few days, I ‘ will put him in mind of his profession of friendship to you, and try what ‘ he can or will do. Sir Robert Honeywood is also come hither ; and as I ‘ hear, the king is graciously pleased to admit him to his presence ; which ‘ will be somewhat the better for you ; because then the exceptions against ‘ your employment and negociation, wherein you were colleagues, will be ‘ removed, and you will have no more to answer for, than your own parti‘ cular behaviour. I believe Sir Robert Honeywood will be industrious ‘ enough, to procure satisfaction to the merchants in the business of money ;
 ‘ wherein he will have the assistance of Sir John Temple, to whom I refer
 ‘ you for that and some other things. I have little to say to your complaints of the most famous and potent Republic this day in the world ; and Your felicitie, that all Your enemies have no other ground of quarrel, but that You are a Republic : for though these Netherlanders speak it not out in words, yet they have often told You so in behaviour. etc.

Of the Dominion, or Ownership of the Sea, two books. Written at first in Latin, and intituled, “ Mare Clausum, seu De Dominio Maris.” By John Selden. Translated into English ; and set forth with some additional Evidences and Discourses, by Marchamont Nedham. Published by special command. London, printed by William Du Gard, 1652, in folio.

Marchamont Nedham was author of divers curious and very scarce tracts ; and of that celebrated Journal, intituled “ Mercurius Politicus, comprising the Summe of all intelligence ; with the affairs and designs now on foot in the three nations of England, Ireland, and Scotland. In defence of the Commonwealth, and for information of the people.” It commenced June 9, 1649, went forth once a week, ended April 1660, and was published by authority of the Council of State.

The act for the Militia being passed, the command of all the forces and garisons settled on Monk, and the fleet in his power in conjunction with colonel Montague ; the pretended parliament authorized their Council of State to provide for the public safety on all emergencies, and to dispose affairs as they should think fit till the meeting of the next Parliament : which being done, and the House ready to pass the act for their own dissolution ; Mr. Crew, who had been as forward as any man in beginning and carrying on the war against the late King, moved, that before they dissolved themselves, they would bear their witness against the horrid murder, as he called it, of the King. This unexpected motion prevailed with many then present to deny their concurrence to that act against the King, tho’ not to reflect in the same manner on those who had been concerned in it : And one of them concluding his discourse with protesting, that he had neither Hand nor Heart in that affair ; Mr. Thomas Scot, who had been so much deluded by the hypocrisy of Monk, as I have already related, in abhorrence of that base spirit, said, that though he knew not where to hide his head at that time, yet he durst not refuse to own, that not only his hand but his heart also was in it : and after he had produced divers reasons to prove the justice of it, he concluded, that he should desire no greater honor in this world, than that the following inscription should be engraved on his tomb, Here lieth one who had a hand and a heart in the execution of Charles Stuart late King of England.

Memoirs of Edmund Ludlow, p. 329.

See also Toland’s life of Milton, Edit. 2. p. 84, and 245, in the Notes.

' of your sister Strangford's unequal returns to your affection and kindness ;
 ' but that I am sorry for it, and that you are well enough served for bestow-
 ' ing so much of your care where it was not due, and neglecting them to ' whom it was due ; and I hope you will be wiser hereafter. She and her ' husband have not yet paid the thousand pounds, whereof you are to have ' your part by my gift ; for so, I think, you are to understand it, though ' your mother desired it : and if, for the payment thereof, your being in ' England, or in some place not far off, be necessary, as some pretend, for
 ' the sealing of some writings, I think that and other reasons sufficient to ' persuade you to stay a while where you are, that you may hear frequently
 ' from your friends and they from you. I am wholly against your going ' into Italy as yet, till more may be known of your condition, which, for the ' present, is hard ; and I confess that I do not yet see any more than this,
 ' that either you must live in exile, or very privately here and perhaps not
 ' safely ; for though the Bill of indemnity be lately passed ; yet if there be ' any particular and great displeasure against you, as I fear there is, you may ' feel the effects thereof from the higher powers, and receive affronts from
 ' the inferior. Therefore you were best to stay at Hamburgh, which for ' a northern situation, is a good place and healthful. I will help you as ' much as I can, in discovering and informing you of what concerns you ;
 ' though, as I began, so I must end, with telling you, that writing is now
 ' grown troublesome to your affectionate Leicester."

But colonel Sydney did not continue long at Hamburgh ; for he was at Francfort upon the Main, on the 8th of September 1660, from whence he wrote to his father, being determined then for Italy ; and we find him at Rome in November following, whence he wrote likewise to his father, on the 19th of that month.

' I think the councill given me by all my freinds to keepe out of England
 ' for a while, doth too clearely appeare to have bin good, by the usage my ' companions have already receaved, and perhaps will be yet further verified
 ' by what they will find. Nothing doth seeme more certaine to me, then ' that I must either have procured my safety, * by such meanes as fir Ar' thur

* May 1660, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, one of those who were esteemed to be so maliciously active in opposition to his Majesty's government, as to be afterwards excepted in the act of indemnity from any condition of pardon, had lately come to General Monk, when he perceived the Revolution to hasten towards the Restoration of the King, and expostulated with him about it, in reference to the security of his own condition. The general was unwilling to make him desperate, because he had at that time a Regiment of horse and a Regiment of foot in the garrisons of Newcastle, Tinnmouth, Berwick, and Carlisle, under his government ; and therefore told him, if he would quietly give up his command, and retire to his house, he would endeavour to secure him in his life and estate, and doubted not to effect it. This being made known at a following conference by the House of Commons, was justified with great modesty by the Duke of Albemarle in the house of Peers, and his life was thereupon pardoned in the act ; and a small time

• thur Haselrigge is sayed to have used ; or runne the fortune of somme others, • whoe have shewed themselves more resolute. I hope my being here, will
 • in a short time shewe, that the place was not ill chofen, and that besides
 • the liberty and quiet which is generally granted to all persons here, I
 • may be admitted into that company, the knowledge of which will very well
 • recompence my iourney. I was extreamely unwilling to stay in Ham-
 • burgh or any place in Germany, finding myself too apt to fall too deepe
 • into melancholly, if I have neither businesse nor company to divert me ;
 • and I have such an aversion to the conversation and entertainments of
 • that country, that if I had stayed in it, I must have lived as a hermite,
 • though in a populous citty. I am here well enough at ease, and believe I
 • may continue soe. Unlesse somme boddy from the court of England doth
 • think it worth theire paines to disturbe me, I see nothing likely to arise
 • here to trouble me. I have already visited severall cardinalls. To mor-
 • rowe I intend to pay the same respect to the cardinal Ghigi, nephew to the
 • pope. He hath already granted me the liberty of waiting upon him,
 • which was signified unto me by an other eminent person of the same
 • robe and degree. They are all generally civill, and I ask no more.

His correspondence with his father during his stay at Rome, will be seen in the letters taken from the Sydney papers, now first added, with the letters to Mr. Savile and His Tryal, to this edition.

Several of his friends having been importunate with him for his return to England, he wrote * the following letter ; but the want of a date makes the particular time of writing it uncertain.

• S I R,

• I am sorry I cannot in all things conform myself to the advices of my • friends. If theirs had any joint concernment with mine, I should willing-
 • ly submit my interest to theirs ; but when I alone am interested, and they
 • only advise me to come over as soon as the act of indemnity is passed,
 • because they think it is best for me, I cannot wholly lay aside my own • judgment and choice. I confesse, we are naturally inclined to delight in
 • our own country, and I have a particular love to mine. I hope I have • given some testimony of it. I think that being exiled from it is a great • evil, and would redeem myself from it with the loss of a great deal of my
 • blood. But when that country of mine, which used to be esteemed a pa• radise, is now like to be made a stage of injury ; the liberty which we • hoped to establish oppressed ; luxury and lewdness set up in its height, after his estate also was, at the mediation of the Duke, granted to his heir, a man averse to his father's disloyal principles, Sir Arthur himself a while after his imprisonment dying of a fever in the Tower.

Bishop Kennet's hist. reg. p. 136.

* Familiar letters of John, late earl of Rochester, etc.

• inead.

' instead of the piety, virtue, sobriety, and modesty, which we hoped, God,
 ' by our hands, would have introduced; the best of our nation made a prey
 ' to the worst; the parliament, court, and army, corrupted; the people
 ' enslaved; all things vendible; no man safe, but by such evil and infamous
 ' means, as flattery and bribery; what joy can I have in my own country in ' this condition? Is it a pleasure to see, that all I love in the world is sold ' and destroyed? Shall I renounce all my old principles, learn the vile court-
 ' arts, and make my peace by bribing some of them? Shall their corrup' tion and vice be my safety? Ah! no; better is a life among strangers,
 ' than in my own country upon such conditions. Whilst I live, I will en' deavour to preserve my liberty; or at least, not consent to the destroy' ing of it. I hope I shall die in the same principles in which I have lived,
 ' and will live no longer than they can preserve me. I have in my life
 ' been guilty of many follies; but, as I think, of no meanness. I will not ' blot and defile that which is past, by endeavouring to provide for the fu' ture. I have ever had in my mind, that when God should cast me in-
 ' to such a condition, as that I cannot save my life but by doing an inde-
 ' cent thing, he shews me the time is come wherein I should resign it:
 ' and when I cannot live in my own country but by such means as are ' worse than dying in it, I think he shews me, I ought to keep myself out ' of it. Let them please themselves with making the king glorious, who ' think a whole people may justly be sacrificed for the interest and pleasure
 ' of one man, and a few of his followers; let them rejoice in their subtilty,
 ' who, by betraying the former powers, have gained the favour of this, not ' only preserved, but advanced themselves in these dangerous changes. Ne' vertheless, perhaps they may find, the king's glory is their shame; his ' plenty the people's misery; and that the gaining of an office or a little ' money, is a poor reward for destroying a nation, * which, if it were pre- ' served in liberty and virtue, would truly be the most glorious in the world;
 ' and that others may find, they have with much pains purchased their own
 ' shame

[* Which, if it were preserved in Liberty and Virtue,]

And now that I am fallen unawares into such profound reflections on the periods of government, and the flourishing and decay of Liberty and Letters; I can't be contented to consider merely of the enchantment which wrought so powerfully upon Mankind, when first this universal monarchy was established. I must wonder still more, when I consider how after the extinction of this Caesarian and Claudian family, and a short interval of Princes raised and destroyed with much disorder and public ruin, the Romans should regain their perishing Dominion and retrieve their sinking state, by an after race of wise and able Princes successively adopted, and taken from a private State to rule the Empire of the world. They were men who not only possessed the Military virtues, and supported that sort of Discipline in the highest degree; but as they sought the interest of the World, they did what was in their power to restore LIBERTY, and raise again the perishing ARTS, and decayed VIRTUE of Mankind. But the season was now past!
The fatal form of government was become too natural; and the world, which had bent under it, and ' shame and misery, a dear price paid for that which is not worth keep' ing, nor the life that is accompanied with it. The honour of English

 ' parliaments hath ever been in making the nation glorious and happy, not
 ' in felling and destroying the interest of it, to satisfy the lusts of one man.
 ' * Miserable nation! that from so great a height of glory, is fallen into the ' most despicable condition in the world; of having all its good depending ' upon

was become slavish and dependent, had neither power nor will to help itself. The only deliverance it could expect, was from the merciless hands of the Barbarians, and a total dissolution of that enormous Empire and despotic power, which the best hands could not preserve from being destructive to human nature. For even Barbarity and Gothicism were already entered into arts, e'er the Savages had made any impression on the Empire. All the advantage which a fortuitous and almost miraculous succession of good Princes could procure their highly favoured Arts and Sciences, was no more than to preserve, during their own time, those perishing Remains which had for a while with difficulty subsisted, after the decline of LIBERTY. Not a Statue, not a Medal, not a tolerable piece of architecture could shew itself afterwards. Philosophy, Wit and Learning, in which some of these good Princes had themselves been so renown'd, fell with them. And ignorance and darkness overspread the world, and fitted it for the Chaos and Ruin which ensued.

The Earl of Shaftesbury, in his "Advice to an Author."

From their railleries of this kind on the barbarity and misery of our Island, one cannot help reflecting, on the surprizing fate and revolutions of Kingdoms. How Rome, once the mistress of the World, the seat of arts, empire and glory, now lies sunk in sloth, ignorance and poverty; enslaved to the most cruel, as well as to the most contemptible of Tyrants, Superstition and religious imposture. While this remote Country, evidently the jest and contempt of the polite Romans, is become the happy seat of liberty, plenty, and letters; flourishing in all the arts and refinements of civil life; yet running, perhaps, the same course which Rome itself had run before it; from virtuous industry to wealth; from wealth to luxury; from luxury to an impatience of discipline and corruption of morals; till by a total degeneracy and loss of virtue, being grown ripe for destruction, it falls a prey at last to some hardy oppressor, and with the loss of Liberty, losing every thing else that is valuable, sinks gradually again into its original barbarity.

Dr. Conyers Middleton, the excellent, in "his Life of Cicero," vol. I. p. 494.

[* Miserable Nation! that from so great a height of glory,]

The English Republicans took things exactly right; and that in order to the accomplishing of a Design that would take up all their life time, (for such sort of men ought never to conceive mean ones, after the execution whereof they must be put to the trouble of projecting anew, or live lazily and be exposed to conspiracies against them,) they thought it would be their best way to begin with the ruin of the United Provinces, which lay next their coasts, and flourished in trade above any other Country in the World; and when once they had effected this, they were in hopes they should easily remove any obstacle in their way to attain the Dominion of the Seas: insomuch, that if the fortune of war should favour their first enterprizes, I do not think they have any design to make a peace with a Nation they have a mind utterly to destroy, and to whom they will propose such hard terms, that upon the refusal of them, you will at last find them prepared to make terrible descents in divers parts of Zealand and North Holland, to break the banks and the other dikes, that keep the flat Country from being drowned. There needs no more than this sort of blood-letting to make Amsterdam and all the other Cities desolate: For it would signifie little to them to seize the Brill or some other place, seeing their design is to destroy the Trade of Holland, and to transfer it into their own Country; and it would be of little importance to them that the King of Spain should recover the Seven provinces; that the Merchants of Amsterdam should remove to Antwerp, and the manufacturers of Leyden and Harlem to Ghent and Bruges: for it would require many years to settle things there, and the English

‘ upon the breath and will of the vilest persons in it! cheated and sold by ‘ them they trusted! infamous traffick, equal almost in guilt to that of Judas!’
 ‘ In

lish would have opportunity enough to hinder them from having any necessary materials but such as passed through their hands, and their manufactures to be transported any where but in English bottoms: for it would be very easy for them to stop up the mouths of the ports, and to go up the Schelde, even in sight of Antwerp, from whence nothing must come out but will be taken by their ships. By this means, and the notion I have of their designs, no Nation in the world, in a few years time, would have any Seamen, Ships, or skill in Maritime affairs, besides themselves. For Holland being intirely ruined, the Dutch must serve on board their fleets, and all the Shipwrights, Sailmakers and Ropemakers, would be obliged to go and earn their living in the Sea-port towns of England; and this they would be the more inclined to do, because there is more wages given there, and People live better. When this noble and rich Province, which within the extent of less than five and twenty leagues, contains eighteen large towns and four hundred villages, of which the Hague is the finest in the world, shall be reduced to this sad plight; it is then likely that the English will turn their arms against Denmark, in order to seize the passage of the Sundt, either by main force or rather some treaty, by which they will be willing to give the King more than the profit it brought him, but at the same time will oblige Norway to sell their wood to no other nation but the English. The cities of Emden, Bremen, Hamburg, Lubec, all the Coast of the Baltick, and the whole Kingdom of Sweden, durst appear no longer at Sea, but under English colours; and perhaps the formidable Republic will be content, in consideration of her Commissions granted to them, to receive certain duties from the goods she allows them in her name to transport, only along these northern parts. They will in time send a more powerful fleet to block up the river of Lisbon; while another sails to Brazil, Guinea, and the East Indies; with a design to spare the Portuguese merchants and the East India companies, the labour of transporting the Sugars, Silks, Spices and other commodities they come thither for, into Europe: and if Spain pretends to say any thing against them, they will, without any more ado, seize the Streights Mouth and send an hundred and fifty ships of war into the Mediterranean, out of which they can very easily drive the naval force of the other Potentates of Europe, were they all joined together against them.

The English having in this manner usurped the Dominion of the seas, the trade of all the European nations, and part of the rest of the world; all the Earth must submit to them, work for no body but them, and they will, from time to time, come into their ports, and sweep away all their treasure: every thing that is rare and all the conveniences of life, produced either by art or nature, will be reserved for England, which will be the only Country that can purchase them or possess them of her own. For, as we see, that since the settling of trade in Holland, that province is become the Store-house for Linen, Woolen, and all sorts of manufactures, though there is neither flax, wool, nor, in any manner, any other commodities which they work up, grows there, but they must have them from other Countries; so every thing that England wants at this time will abound there, and the best Artificers will flock thither, insomuch, that if they would have any fine linnen or good cloth for wear, in another Country, the flax and wool was to be sent to be manufactured in England. Pray consider then, what vast wealth this Country must acquire in less than fifty years? And how miserable must the rest of Europe be, since they can transport nothing by Sea from one nation to another but in English ships? They will always have money to receive in all the ports they come at, and never leave any of their own there. What the English want they will make compensation for by way of exchange, or readily send over into England, upon the score of the manufactures there they have occasion for; as we have seen the Dutch East India Company have pearl and precious stones, in return for some wares sent into those Countries, which they got fitted out at Amsterdam, and then sold them at very dear rates in those places from whence they were first brought, and where there is not perfection of workmanship as there is with us. Hundreds of ships richly laden will daily put into the Thames and other ports of this fortunate Island; and the General can scarce ever lose the sight of his forces, which, I may say, return every evening to lye at home; for they stay no longer in foreign parts.

‘ In all preceding ages, parliaments have been the palace of our liberty; the ‘ sure defenders of the oppressed: they, who formerly could bridle kings,
 ‘ and

parts than to refresh themselves, to vend their goods, and to take in new Cargoes. They will be no ways solicitous of making conquests by land, that they may save the charge of maintaining them, seeing they are sure of reaping the profit of them; neither will they plant any Colonies and ease their Country, as populous as it is grown, of the vast multitudes that are in it, because the whole produce of Europe is consumed there, and their great naval trade renders their stores inexhaustible. In the mean time all the neighbouring Kingdoms will, in a manner, become like the Sea-coasts of America, where our Europeans trade; there will be only tillage and some coarse manufactures for plain ware and to serve people's necessities only in the Heart of the Country, and the maritime towns will be no other than the Granaries and Magazines of England. — — — — —

There is nothing in all the Conquests of Alexander and the pomp of all the Roman Empire, that comes near this maritime dominion which I have represented to you. And this seems to be so very feasible, that if Holland be once ruined, I am afraid it will be too late to prevent it. And therefore I would have all the Potentates of Europe take it to heart in time; for if they do not quickly put an end to the war they are engaged in on the Continent, we shall run the risque, in a few ages, of becoming perfect Barbarians. For the English, by the means of their navigation, will transfer all the politeness of Europe, together with its plenty, power and conveniences of life, into their own Country.

Extract of a letter from M. Sorbiere to M. de Courcelles, at Amsterdam; dated Orange, July 1, 1652: Concerning the designs of the English in the War against the Dutch.

We have done this right unto our Monarchy.

We are now to say some thing of that Government which succeeded it. I confess it was never settled, nor put absolutely into the hands of the People. And yet if you respect its infancy and beginning, it outwent in warlike achievements all other Commonwealths. I lay before me the exploits of Sparta, Athens, Carthage, and Venice; and know that the Venetians, Switzers, and United Provinces, at this day being contemptible for territories, are those onely that appear fittest matches for the greatest Empires, namely the Turk, the German, and the Spanish house of Austria, which Monarchs had overborn large Kingdoms and Provinces, and could meet none able to measure swords with them, till these little Countries, having vindicated their Liberty, took them in hand, and not so much by their valour (for Venice was never celebrated for valour, and the United Provinces had no extraordinary name for it) but by the excellency of their Government and prudent carriage, have been able to force them to become peaceable and quiet neighbours, and keep themselves within narrower bounds than otherwise they would willingly have done. I know also, Rome, the onely mistress of the World, was justly celebrated for large conquests. And yet none of these States gave such starts, and made such acquisitions at their rise, as our English Commonwealth. Certainly so many advantages conduced to its greatness and increase; and at its first appearing, so large were its proper Territories, that it may well be affirmed, never was Commonwealth, in that respect, laid on so large and strong a foundation as that then had: and if in our conceits, we should give it an answerable growth, we could not assign it less than the whole globe at last for its portion.

At first, if you will judge by the affections of the People, it had not the hundredth part of England itself, and was to go through difficulties that would have confounded any but a free State. But how quickly had it brought the Nation to somewhat a better understanding, and a fair way of settlement? So that there are some that question, whether any natural Prince of England had ever been assisted on any occasion, with so great forces, so suddenly and with such alacrity raised, as that was at Worcester? And on the other side, how few went over to the King of the Scots, though looked on as a rightful Prince, deserves consideration.

It lived not out a Lustre, yet conquered Scotland (introducing more Liberty and greater Priviledges than they had before) Ireland and several other smaller Islands; made other nations feel its force, as the French and Portugals; and was going on in such a career of action as was not to be stopt by

‘ and keep the balance equal between them and the people, are now be‘ come instruments of all our oppressions, and a sword in his hand to de‘ stroy

by a human power. This Government began a war with the Dutch, which it had ended with an absolute conquest or slain in the attempt; and after this probably it would have entered on more honorable enterprizes, and not suffered the Nation to grow effeminate by ease and vice. In a word, it had brought in an instant, the Nation to a full glory and such a splendor, as cast a darkness, as is affirmed by some, on the greatest actions of former times. This is certain, that the neighbouring States trembled at its sudden and prodigious greatness; and remote Potentates did court and seek a good understanding from its hands, and its dissolution brought no ordinary content to those that had cause to fear it. The Agent from the Stuarts, as a late writer reports, at the first appearance of this Free State, urged the United Provinces, “That if England were free, it would be formidable to them, not onely by interrupting their fishing and all other maritime advantages, but by robbing them of traffick as they had done the Venetians; and not onely so, but give law to all Christendom, by reason of the commodiousness of its harbours and multitudes of its ships.”

This Commonwealth, how imperfect soever in itself, was yet too strong in all likelihood for any human power or strength to break. It was onely capable of being ruined by God and itself. It was indeed quickly dissolved and gone; yet had it this to boast of, that having all along attempted the boldest enterprizes, it met with no ill success in any of its great undertakings while it was in being. But

— Laetis hunc numina rebus,
 Crescendi posuere modum—

Where is the stability of human glory? Who now will not believe, that the firmest, the most splendid and most illustrious fabrick that is human, is capable of dissolution? God in whose hands all Nations are but as clay in the hands of a potter, and to whom the strongest and proudest Governments are as contemptible as the lowest and meanest, if not more, undertook this Commonwealth, and laid it in the dust with those other glorious States of Rome, Athens, Sparta, Carthage.

— Valet ima summis
 Mutare, et insignem attenuat Deus
 Obscura promens ———

I will make no apology for what I have delivered of this Government; for as I think, I have spoken the truth and that moderately, having rejected much matter that offered itself to my hands on this occasion. I never received any particular advantage by that Government, nor so much as subscribed the engagement; and therefore I thought I might with the greater freedom and ingenuity say thus much of it, which yet I submit to better judgments.

It remains now, that I should speak something of the present Government; but the Petition of Advice coming out since I had finished this discourse, I am forced to put it off till I shall have another opportunity, which, if ever it happen, I shall, God assisting, cheerfully set on it and in a particular manner discourse thereof.

A Discourse on the national excellencies of England.
 By R. H. London printed 1658. in duod.

I shall conclude with two material passages, which though they relate not immediately to our Author, or his own particular concerns; yet in regard they hapned during his public employ, and consequently fell most especially under his cognisance, it will not be amiss here to subjoin.

The first was this. Before the war broke forth between the States of England and the Dutch, the Hollanders sent over three Embassadors in order to an accommodation; but they returning re infecta, the Dutch sent away a Plenipotentiary to offer peace upon much milder terms or at least to gain more time.

But this Plenipotentiary could not make such haste, but that the Parliament had procured a copy of their Instructions in Holland, which were delivered by our author to his kinsman that ‘stroy us; they themselves led by a few interested persons, who are willing ‘to buy offices for themselves, by the misery of the whole nation and the ‘blood

was with him to translate for the Council to view, before the said Plenipotentiary had taken shipping for England; and an answer to all he had in charge lay ready for him before he made his public entry into London.

In the next place, there came a person with a very sumptuous train, pretending himself an Agent from the Prince of Condé, then in arms against Cardinal Mazarin. The Parliament mistrusting him, set their instrument so busily at work, that in four or five days they had procured intelligence from Paris, that he was a spy from K. Charles; whereupon, the very next morning, our author's kinsman was sent to him with an order of Council, commanding him to depart the kingdom within three days or expect the punishment of a spy.

By these two remarkable passages we may clearly discern the industry and good intelligence of those times.

The Life of John Milton [by John Philips his nephew] prefixed to his Letters of State, printed 1694, in duod.

At a Committee of the Councell of State at Whitehall, Aug. 16, 1649. Ordered, that a Committee bee appointed, to take into consideration the buisnesse of the coyne and the par betweene it and other nations; and how the coyne of this nation may bee kept from being carried out; and likewise to consider of some meanes whereby the mint may be set to worke; and they are to speak with any persons they think good about it.

The names of the Committee for the mint, Dec. 20, 1649.

The Lord President Bradshaw, Sir James Harrington, [who had the Chair] Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir William Constable, Master Scot, Master Bond, Colonel Purefoy, Colonel Jones, Master Thomas Chaloner, Sir Henry Mildmay, Colonel Morley, Master Allen, Master Cornelius Holland, Master Neville; or any two of them.

— The Council of State being willing to prevent the said disorders, were desirous of having the Monie of this Commonwealth WELL COYNED; and therefore having seen the patterns of coyn made after a new invention [the screw press and mill] by the said Blondeau, and having treated by letters about the quantitie of pieces that could be coyned in a week and what they might cost; the said Council caused the said Blondeau, the inventor of that way of coyning, to come [from France] to London, to treat with him by word of mouth, and to agree about the price of coyning the money of this Commonwealth after his way. He being then arrived at London, Sept. 3, 1649, the said Council bestowed on him forty pounds Sterling; and the late Mr. Frost, then secretary to the said Council, told him before witnesses, that if the State could not agree with him about the price and that therefore he should be necessitated to retire himself, the State would indemnifie him for his journie, both coming and returning, and for the time he should have lost, and would bestow on him such a present that he would return satisfied. A while after the said Council of State ordered the Committee of the Council of State for the mint, to hear the said Blondeau's proposition and report it.

The Committee for the mint accordingly took into consideration, whether the said Blondeau should be admitted to coyn the monie of this Commonwealth; and having debated it, they resolved and approved that he should be admitted thereunto, provided his coyn and his proposition should be advantageous to the State.

Afterwards the said Committee having seriously considered and examined all the circumstances of the way of coyning propounded by the said Blondeau; and having heard all the objections that could be alledged against it, both by the Master of the Mint or by any other of those who appeared in the buisness; upon debate of the whole, the Committee concluded and voted, that the said way of coyning propounded by the said Blondeau, was better, more advantageous, and more HONORABLE for the State, than that which is used now in this Commonwealth.

‘ blood of the most worthy and eminent persons in it. Detestable bribes, ‘ worse than the oaths now in fashion in this mercenary court! I mean to ‘ owe

The Master, the Officers, and the Workmen of the mint, told the Committee, it was not likely the said Blondeau had don himself the pieces sent by him to the Council of State. Besides, that it was an old invention which they themselves knew, and that such pieces were only made for curiosity, with very long time and great expence, and that it was impossible that that way might bee used about the ordinary coyn which is thin. They desired, that the said Blondeau might be commanded to make a trial of his skill by making some other pieces, and that they would do as much as the said Blondeau. Therefore the said Committee ordered, both the said Blondeau and the said workmen, to make their patterns and propositions respectively; and that hee that would make it with most advantage to the State should have the employment.

At the time appointed, the workmen brought to the Committee som pieces made after the old way which is known to them, and some big pieces of silver stuffed within with copper; but they had drawn no propositions.

Likewise the said Blondeau brought in about 300 pieces, som half-crowns of the ordinary weight and bigness, som shillings, six pences, and some gold pieces, and presented his proposition; which having been reformed according to the pleasure of the said Committee, it was received and accepted of by the whol Committee, who ordered it to be reported to the Council of State, according to the order of the said Council.

The said Committee having then taken into consideration the big pieces of silver at the outside and stuffed within with copper, made with the engines at the Tower, and well understood, that the said pieces, becaus they are made of several pieces at the top one of another, will give no sound, so that a blinde man can easily discern that they are false; and having weighed the long time and great cost required for coyning of each piece, because they are made of four pieces, namely one of copper, and one of silver at the top, another underneath and one about, which ought to be adjusted and sodered together, besides several other fashions, which cost more than the price of the lawful pieces; having also considered the great and heavie engines and great number of tools and men required for making of one piece, the great charges for the engines and tools and several other things required for making of those counterfeited pieces; they acknowledged, that it would be enough to dissuade any one from undertaking it, the rich not being willing and the poor being unable, and that though they should undertake it they could not do it without being discovered. Besides, that the mony coyned after the way of the said Blondeau was so thin, that it cannot be so counterfeited.

Whereupon it is observable, that the said workmen of the mint, although they made use of the great and heavie engines that are in the Tower; yet for making of some tools they had need of and for the other charges of coining about a dozen of pieces they made then for a pattern, have spent a hundred pound sterling, as hee that pretends to have laid out the money hath said before witnesses.

Afterwards, another order was given by the said Committee, and some time limited to the said workmen, to draw and present their proposition for coyning of the monie marked upon the thickness or edge, as that of the said Blondeau is. But after the expiration of the long time demanded by them, they brought such a proposition, that the said Committee having read it over and over, could not understand it nor the sense of it; and even those that brought it could not explain it: whereby it was apparent to the said Committee, that they were not able to make their proposition good, much less to coyn the mony after that way, which they avowed themselves before the said Committee. Yet they intreated the Committee to allow them the time of som months more, to finde, if possible, the new invention; and that the said Blondeau's proposition should be communicated unto them, upon which they might frame their own. They further demanded, that the said Blondeau and the Graver [Thomas Simon, the celebrated T. Simon] should have order to bring in all the pieces made by the said Blondeau for a tryal, with the stamps or dices used for making them; all which was granted them upon that condition,

'owe neither my life nor liberty to any such means. When the innocence of my actions will not protect me, I will stay away till the storm
' be

that if within the time allowed them, they could find out the means to coyn the monie after the said Blondeau's way, and thereupon he should be sent back, he should be indemnified: which was agreed by all. But they could never find out the said new invention for coyning the thin and weak pieces after that way with expedition requisite. Yet for all that, they made their propositions, which are in the hands of the Chairman of the Committee; as are also the said Blondeau's propositions and patterns, about a year and a half since, to be reported by him to the Council of State. etc. etc. etc.

A most humble memorandum from Peter Blondeau. Concerning the offers by him made to this Commonwealth, for the coyning of the monie, by a new invention not yet practised in any State of the world; the which will prevent counterfeiting, casting, washing and clipping the same. Which coin shall be marked on both the flat sides and about the thickness or the edge, of a like bigness and largeness as the ordinary coyn is; and will cost no more than the ordinarie unequall coyn which is used now.

Master David Ramadge,

Whitehall, June 14, 1651.

These are to authorise you, to make some patterns as broad as a shilling, a half-crown, a twenty-shillings peece of gold, in a mill; and if you can do it, with letters about the edge or otherwayes, according to Queen Elizabeth's patterns of mill-money or any other modell or peeces you are to make; that so the Committee of the mint may see your several peeces, and thereupon consider what is fittest to present to the Councell of State, for the more handsome making of the monies for the HONOR of this Commonwealth.

James Harrington
Tho. Chaloner

At the desire of Sir James Harrington, and Mr. Thomas Chaloner, and others of the honorable Committee for the Mint, I [Thomas Violet] did write to Holland for all the principal Coynes in Christendom; and did deliver many of them to the officers of the mint to make an assay of them: which several pieces of forrain gold and silver were assayed in the presence of the Committee of the mint, they being there at the Tower several dayes to make these tryals, where I attended them. And I sent into Holland, France and Flanders for all their several Placards; and did procure the lawes and ordinances for regulating their respective mints, with the several standards and weights for their coyns, gold or silver, to be translated. And thereupon the Committee of the mint caused the principal of these forrain coynes to be ingraven, with the weight and fineness of every piece, according to the standard of each mint, both gold and silver, what it ought to weigh; with a just calculation of the vallue what all the several species would make in the Tower of London, and the penny-weight and graines that everie such forrain species or coin would make in the Tower of London, and what proportion our gold and silver held with the mint of Flanders, France and Holland. And this was exactly calculated by the officers of the mint and myself, in the year 1651 and 1652; and all the proceedings thereupon, after many months time, and the several coynes graven on copper plates, were delivered into the custody of Sir James Harrington, Chairman of that Committee, to report them unto the Hous. But the Parliament being dissolved April 20, 1653, the act against the transporters of gold, and all the proceedings concerning the regulation of the mint were stopped for that time.

The above notes relating to the coin, have been taken from Thomas Violet's publications. More of this matter, with specimens of some of the ELEGANT and very scarce pattern-pieces before mentioned, may be seen in "the works of Thomas Simon," published London 1753 in quarto, by that ingenious, diligent, faithful English Antiquarie, the late Mr. George Vertue.

Cromwell

' be over-passed. In short, * where Vane, Lambert, Haselrigge cannot live ' in safety, I cannot live at all. If I had been in England, I should have ' expected

Cromwell having thrust out the Parliament, his Masters, Patrons, by his soldiers, as see a singular account of it in Whitelocke, p. 554; he thought proper, in the suite of his ambition, to coin monies, following exactly the rules which had been instituted by the Committee of Parliament in their wisdom, and employing the workmen which they had formed, but stamping on those monies IMPUDENTLY his own effigies and arms.

Further, concerning the intended regulation of the Law, the Universities, Commerce, and the general scheme of civil government and views of this MASTER Parliament; the curious reader will consult "Husband's collections" 1643 in quarto, 1646 in folio, "Scobell's collections" in folio, and the other State papers of those times.

[* Where Vane, Lambert, Haselrigge cannot live in safety,]

Aug. 21, 1660, the Act of indemnity was sent from the Lords to the Commons with several alterations, to which the Commons were very unwilling to agree; for they had subjected twenty that were not the King's judges to be liable to such pains and penalties not extending to life, as should be inflicted by another act to be passed in this Parliament: Whereas the Lords finding the King's inclinations to tend towards the pardoning of all but such as were his father's judges or otherwise actors in his murder, they disagreed to that part of the act, as to all those named by the Commons, except Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Sir Henry Vane, Colonel John Lambert, who were esteemed to be so maliciously active in opposition to his Majesties government, as to be excepted from any conditions of pardon. The Commons for some time adhered to their first resolution, but after several conferences, they agreed with the Lords in all things except some little alterations in the frame of the act; Vane and Lambert were excepted, but Haselrigge remained liable to such pains, penalties and forfeitures, as should be inflicted on him, not extending to life; and the rest of those put under the same qualifications by the Commons that were not of the King's judges, were made only with others incapable of offices.

Kennet's hist. register, p. 236.

Sir Henry Vane, whose blood seems to have been demanded by the peculiar vengeance of heaven, had been most deeply engaged in the darkest scenes of the late calamities, which he carried on with infinite subtlety and artifice, to the deception of incredible numbers in the Nation; and though he cunningly kept himself from the impious court that condemned the King, it was sufficiently known that none contributed more to the bringing him thither; and after, that none more zealously promoted the establishment of the new Commonwealth, and his actions daily discovered so much of republican rancour, that it was impossible for him to live in quiet under any resemblance of monarchy. So after the restoration, having been found tampering with some malecontents of the army and others, in order to fresh disturbances, the government thought fit to confine him: and though he with Lambert was particularly excepted in the act of indemnity, yet he found so much favour afterwards from the house of Commons in the same Parliament, that they petitioned the King, in which they were joined by the house of Peers, that he might yet be exempt from suffering the pains of death; to which, as his friends alledge, his Majesty consented. This was looked upon as a sufficient security; yet either upon the account of his own behaviour or that of his party or some private resentment, the present house of Commons thought fit to address the King to bring him, together with Colonel John Lambert to their tryals. Accordingly June 4, 1662, they were both arraigned at the King's bench bar, before Sir Robert Forster, Lord chief justice, and other judges; and Sir Henry indicted for imagining and compassing the death of the King, and for taking upon him and usurping the government: and Colonel Lambert for levying war against the King in several parts of the kingdom. The carriage and behaviour of Vane was very extraordinary, for being charged by the King's council with a continued

‘ expected a lodging with them; or though they may be the first, as being ‘ more eminent than I, I must expect to follow their example in suffering
 ‘ as

tinued series of treasons, from the King's murder to the Restoration, without insisting upon the Rebellion with which they might have begun, he absolutely denied they had any power to try him, and declared, “ that neither the King's death, nor the members themselves could dissolve the Long Parliament, whereof he being one, no inferior court could call him in question.”—His whole behaviour was so assuming and insolent, that the Court and King's council told him, that his own defence was a fresh charge against him and the highest evidence of his inward guilt, had there not been such a cloud of witnesses to prove the particulars.—The Jury after a very short stay brought him in guilty of high treason. Colonel Lambert's behaviour was quite contrary, full of submission and discretion.—He was likewise condemned; but when he was to receive sentence with Sir Henry Vane, he was by the King's favor reprieved at the bar, upon the report that the judges had given of his submissive and handsome deportment at his tryal: upon which he desired the judges to return to his Majesty his most humble thanks for his so unexpected mercy, which the judges said might have been, and was once thought to be extended to Sir Henry, if his forwardness and contemptuous behaviour had not precluded the way to it. The Colonel was confined during life in the Isle of Guernsey, where he continued a patient and discreet prisoner for above thirty years.

Archdeacon Echard and Bishop Kennet; as see the hist. register, p. 704, 5.

And since it hath pleased God, who separated me from the womb to the knowledge and service of the gospel of his Son, to separate me also to this hard and difficult service at this time, and to single me out to the defence and justification of this his cause, I could not consent by any words or actions of mine, that the innocent blood that hath been shed in the defence of it throughout the whole war, the guilt and moral evil of which must and does certainly lye somewhere, did lye at my door, or at theirs, that have been the faithful adherers to this cause. This is with such evidence upon my heart, that I am most freely and chearfully willing to put the greatest seal to it I am capable, which is, the pouring out of my very blood in witness to it; which is all I shall need to say in this place and at this time, having spoken at large to it in my defence at my tryal, intending to have said more the last day, as what I thought was reasonable for arrest of judgment, but I was not permitted then to speak it; both which may, with time and God's providence, come to publick view. And I must still assert, that I remain wholly unsatisfied, that the course of proceedings against me at my tryal were according to law; but that I was run upon and destroyed, contrary to right and the liberties of Magna charta, under the form only of justice, which I leave to God to decide, who is the judge of the whole world, and to clear my innocency. In the mean time I beseech him to forgive them and all that had a hand in my death; and that the Lord, in his great mercy, will not lay it unto their charge. etc.

The tryal of Sir Henry Vane knt. at the King's bench, Westminster, June 2, and 6, 1662. Together with what he intended to have spoken the day of his sentence, June 11, for arrest of judgment, had he not been interrupted and over-ruled by the Court, and his bill of exceptions. With other occasional speeches, etc. Also his speech and prayer, etc. on the scaffold. Printed in the year 1662, in quarto, p. 90.

Sonnet to Sir Henry Vane.

Vane, young in years, but in sage counsels old,
 Than whom a better senator ne'er held
 The helm of Rome, when gotons not arms repell'd
 The fierce Epirot, and the African bold,
 Whether to settle peace, or to unfold

The

‘ as I have been their companion in acting. I am most in a maze at the ‘ mistaken informations, that were sent to me by my friends, full of expecta‘ tions

The drift of hollow states, hard to be spell'd;
 Then to advise how war may best upheld,
 Move by her two main nerves, iron and gold,
 In all her equipage: besides to know
Both spiritual and civil, what each means,
What serves each, thou hast learn'd; which few have done.
 The bounds of either sword to thee we owe;
 Therefore on thy right hand religion leans
 In peace, and reckons thee her eldest son.

John Milton.

The cases cited by the learned judge [Hale] do not in the least shake the principle already advanced, that the Throne being full, any person out of possession but claiming title, be his pretensions what you please, is no King within the statute of treasons.

I am aware of the judgment of the Court of King's bench in the case of Sir Henry Vane, “That King Charles the Second, though kept out of the exercise of the Kingly office, yet was still a King both De facto and De Jure; and that all acts done to the keeping him out were high treason.”

Sir Henry Vane's, was a very singular case, and the transactions in which he bore a part, happened in a conjuncture of affairs which never did exist before and I hope never will again. An usurpation founded in the dissolution of the antient legal government, and the total subversion of the Constitution.

I will therefore say nothing to the merits of the question more, than that the rule laid down by the Court involved in the guilt of treason, every man in the Kingdom who had acted in a public station under a government possessed IN FACT for twelve years together of sovereign power; but under various forms at different times, as the enthusiasm of the herd or the ambition of their leaders dictated.

But this resolution hath not in the least shaken the principle I contend for; it doth in reality suppose the truth of it. For if Charles the Second was King De facto from the death of his Father, every thing done from that time in prejudice of his right was undoubtedly high treason.

The only difficulty is, what did the Court mean by a King De facto? They could not mean, what every soul before themselves understood, a King in the actual and full exercise of the regal power. They meant, I presume, as his Lordship upon another occasion is pleased to express himself, one QUASI in possession of the Crown; since during the usurpation, no other person did claim to act under the regal title.

The distinction between De Jure and De Facto Kings was taken up by the House of York to serve the purposes of ambition and revenge. By the former, they meant those who are presumed to have succeeded to the crown in a regular course of descent. By the latter, those who have not had that claim to it. The former were in their estimation the only rightful Kings. The latter, not excepting such as have claimed under a parliamentary settlement, no better than fortunate usurpers.

This doctrine perfectly suited the views of that faction. For the Crown having been entailed by act of Parliament on Henry the Fourth and his Issue, the House of York saw itself totally excluded, unless its pretensions could be supported by a title Paramount to the power of Parliament. Proximity in blood was its only refuge, and to that the partizans of that House resorted. And in so doing they brought upon themselves, in my opinion, the whole guilt of that deluge of blood, which was afterwards spilt in the unnatural war between the two Houses.

It is not to be wondered at, that men whose ambition suggested to them the hope of overturning an establishment, to which themselves, their ancestors, and the whole Nation had submitted for more than half a century, should endeavour to convince mankind of the rectitude of their

' tions of favours and employments. Who can think that they who im' prison them would employ me, or suffer me to live when they are put ' to death? If I might live and be employed, can it be expected that I ' should serve a government that seeks such detestable ways of establishing ' itself? Ah! no; I have not learnt to make my own peace, by persecut' ing and betraying my brethren, more innocent and worthy than myself.
 ' I must live by just means, and serve to just ends, or not at all. After ' such a manifestation of the ways by which it is intended the king shall ' govern, I should have renounced any place of favour, into which the ' kindness and industry of my friends might have advanced me, when I ' found those, that were better than I, were only fit to be destroyed. I ' had formerly some jealousies; the fraudulent proclamation for indemnity
 ' increased them; the imprisoning of those three men, and turning out of ' all the officers of the army, contrary to promise, confirmed me in my re' solutions not to return. To conclude, the tide is not to be diverted nor
 ' the oppressed delivered; but God, in his time, will have mercy on his ' people. He will save and defend them, and avenge the blood of those ' who shall now perish, upon the heaps of those, who, in their pride, think their intentions, and the justice of their claim. Nor is it at all surprizing, that their followers, in the heat of the times, should suffer themselves to be easily convinced. For in the ferment of parties, Leaders never blush and the Herd of the Party seldom think. But, that persons who are placed at a happy distance from these disastrous times, should in cool blood revive and adopt a doctrine, which hath once laid their country waste, is not so easily accounted for.

But since this hath been done by learned men, among whom Lord Chief Justice Hale's name must be mentioned with all just regard, I will endeavour to point out what I take to have been the radical mistake, which led them into a train of specious but false reasoning upon this subject.

They seem not to have sufficiently attended to the nature and ends of civil power, whereof the regal dignity is a principal branch. They seem to have considered the crown and royal dignity meerly as a descendable property; as an estate or interest vested in the possessor for the emo-lument and grandeur of himself and heirs, in a regular invariable course of descent. And therefore in questions touching the succession, they constantly resort to the same narrow rules and maxims of law and justice, by which questions of meer property, the title to a pigstye or a laystall, are governed. And thence conclude, that the Legislature itself cannot, without manifest injustice, interrupt the antient, legal, established order of succession. It cannot, say they, without injustice, give to one branch of the royal family, what by right of blood belongeth to another.

Thus they argue. And if I could conceive of the Crown as of an inheritance of meer pro- perty, I should be tempted to argue in the same manner. But had they considered the crown and royal dignity, as a descendable OFFICE, as a TRUST for millions, and extending its influence to generations yet unborn; had they considered it in that light, they would soon have discovered the principle upon which the right of the Legislature to interpose in cases of necessity is manifestly founded. And that is the SALVS POPVLI already mentioned [p. 382] upon a like occasion. etc.
 etc. etc. which the ingenuous reader should pursue.

Observations on some passages in the writings of L. C. J. Hale; relative to the principles on which the Revolution and present HAPPY Establishment are founded. By [that faithful judge and friend to liberty] Sir Michael Foster.

There is an original and good picture of this extraordinary but unfortunate Gentleman, Sir Henry Vane, in the British Musaeum.

‘ nothing is able to oppose them. Happy are those, whom God shall make ‘ instruments of his justice in so blessed a work ! If I can live to see that ‘ day, I shall be ripe for the grave, and able to say with joy, “ Lord, now ‘ lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.” Farewel. My thoughts as to ‘ king and state depending upon their actions, no man shall be a more faith‘ ful servant to him than I, * if he make the good and prosperity of his ‘ people

[* If he make the good and prosperity of his people his glory;]

Of a tall stature and of fable hue
 Much like the son of Kish that lofty Jew ;
 Twelve years compleat he suffer'd in exile,
 And kept his father's asses all the while.
 At length by wonderful impulse of fate,
 The people call him home to mend the state ;
 And, what is more, they send him money too,
 And cloath him all, from head to foot, anew.
 Nor did he such small favors then disdain,
 Who in his thirtieth year began his reign.
 In a flash'd doublet then he came ashore,
 And dubb'd poor Palmer's wife his royal whore.
 Bishops, and Deans, Peers, Pimps, and Knights he made, Things highly fitting for a Monarch's trade !
 With women, wine, and viands of delight,
 His jolly vassals feast him day and night.
 etc. etc. etc.

An historical poem by A. Marvell.

—D'où les Anglois remontant au souvenir de la puissance de leurs flottes du temps d'Olivier ; de la gloire qu'elles ont remportées sur toutes les mers ; les alliances, que toute la terre recherchoit avec eux ; de la pompe de la République, vers laquelle il venoit des ambassadeurs de tous costez ; ils ne peuvent s'empêcher de faire des comparaisons odieuses, et de temoigner quelque disposition à des nouveaux desordres. Ils veulent bien un roi pour la gloire de leur pays. Ils aiment ce tiltre, et preferent cette sorte de gouvernement à toutes les autres. Mais ils reconnoissent, que leur humeur un peu trop libre et arrogante a besoin de ce caveçon ; ils ne veulent point aussi le souffrir trop rude, et ils pretendent que leur Roi se doit appliquer uniquement à maintenir la tranquillité publique, à faire vivre heureusement son peuple, et à porter au dehors le plus avant qu'il peut l'honneur et la reputation de sa patrie. Ils disent que c'est pour cela qu'ils l'entretiennent splendidement, et leurs Estats, dans lesquelles proprement reside la puissance Souveraine, ne lui refuseront jamais rien de ce qu'il leur demandera pour satisfaire à ses intentions. Mais qu'il leur fache de voire commettre une chose si importante au soins d'un Ministre, qui toujours a des interests particuliers, contraires à ceux du public ; qu'il est sensible au peuple de se saigner inutilement, et de voir employer son argent en choses superflues, ou mesme en despences des-bonnetes ; [rendered in the translation of 1709, “ upon base lusts ;”] qu'il n'est pas juste que quelques sang-suës de cour en soient remplies elles seules, et que l'on ne navige ou ne laboure, qu'on ne travaille sur mer et sur terre, que pour mettre bien à leur aise un petit nombre de personnes oisives, qui abuseront de la facilité d'un prince. Ces pensées et ces discours sont conformes à l'humeur arrogante des Anglois, et à la jalousie avec laquelle ils regardent les prosperitez d'autrui. Mais outre la particuliere inclination que la nature leur donne à former des raisonnemens si peu respectueux, ils se sont nourris de longue main dans cette mauvaise habitude par la liberté de leurs Parlemens, d'ont il faut que Je vous raconte l'histoire, telle qu'il m'en souvient ou que Je me la suis figurée. etc. etc. etc.

“ Relation d'un voyage en Angleterre.” By Mons.
 Sorbier. Printed at Cologne, 1666, in duod. p. 107.

E

It

people his glory; none more his enemy, if he doth the contrary. To my

It was hoped and expected, that this prodigious and universal calamity, [the fire of London] for the effects of it covered the whole kingdom, would have made some impression and produced some reformation in the licence of the court. For as the pains the King had taken night and day during the fire, and the dangers he had exposed himself to, even for the saving of the citizens goods, had been notorious and in the mouths of all men with many good wishes and prayers for him, so his majesty had been heard during that time to speak with great piety and devotion of the displeasure that God was provoked to. And no doubt the deep sense of it did raise many good thoughts and purposes in his royal breast. But he was narrowly watched and looked to, that such melancholick thoughts might not long possess him, the consequence and effect whereof was like to be more grievous than that of the fire itself; of which, that loose company that was too much cherished, even before it was extinguished, discoursed as of an argument for mirth and wit to describe the wildness of the confusion all people were in; in which the scripture itself was used with equal liberty, when they could apply it to their profane purposes. And Mr. May presumed to assure the King, "that this was the greatest blessing, that God had ever conferred upon him, his Restoration only excepted: for the walls and gates being now burned and thrown down of that rebellious city, which was always an enemy to the Crown, his Majesty would never suffer them to repair and build them up again, to be a bit in his mouth and a bridle upon his neck; but would keep all open, that his troops might enter upon them whenever he thought necessary for his service, there being no other way to govern that rude multitude but by force."

The continuation of the life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, vol. 3. p. 674.——See other passages of a like kind in that work. [Midhurst. Baptist May Esq. privy purse, L 1000 a year allowance. Got besides in boons for secret service L 40000. This is he that sayd, "Five hundred pounds a year was enough for a Country Gentleman to drink ale, eat beef, and stink with." etc. A seasonable argument, etc.]

Such unanimity appeared in the proceedings of the new Parliament, or Convention as it came afterwards to be called because it was not summoned by the King's writ, that there was not the least dispute among them but upon one single point; yet that was a very important one. Hale, afterwards the famous Chief Justice, moved, "That a Committee might be appointed to look into the propositions that had been made, and the concessions that had been offered by the late King during the war, particularly at the treaty of Newport, that from thence they might digest such propositions as they should think fit to be sent over to the King." This was seconded, but I do not remember [pity it is that he did not!] by whom. It was foreseen that such a motion might be set on foot, so Monk was instructed how to answer it, whensoever it should be proposed. He told the House, that there was yet, beyond all mens hope, an universal quiet all over the nation; but there were many incendiaries still on the watch, trying where they could first raise the flame. He said, he had such copious informations sent him of these things, that it was not fit they should be generally known: He could not answer for the peace either of the Nation or of the Army, if any delay was put to the sending for the King: What need was there of sending propositions to him? Might they not as well prepare them and offer them to him when he should come over? He was to bring neither army nor treasure with him either to fright them or corrupt them. So he moved, that they would immediately send commissioners to bring over the King: And said, that he must lay the blame of all the blood or mischief that might follow on the heads of those, who should still insist on any motion that might delay the present settlement of the Nation. This was echo'd with such a shout over the House, that the motion was no more insisted on.

This was indeed the great service that Monk did. It was chiefly owing to the post he was in and to the credit he had gained; for as to the Restoration itself, the tide run so strong, that he only went into it dexterously enough, to get much fame and great rewards, for that which will have still a great appearance in history. If he had died soon after, he might have been

‘ my particular friends I shall be constant in all occasions, and to you a most affectionate servant.’

After

been more justly admired, because less known and seen only in one advantageous light: But he lived long enough to make it known, how false a judgment men are apt to make upon outward appearance. To the King's coming in without conditions may be well imputed all the errors of his reign. And when the Earl of Southampton came to see what he was likely to prove, he said once in great wrath to Chancellor Hyde, “ It was to him they owed all they either felt or feared; for if he had not possessed them in all his letters with such an opinion of the King, they would have taken care to have put it out of his power either to do himself or them any mischief, which was like to be the effect of their trusting him so entirely.” Hyde answered, “ That he thought the King had so true a judgment and so much good nature, that when the age of pleasure should be over, and the idleness of his exile which made him seek new diversions for want of other employment was turned to an obligation to mind affairs, then he would have shaken off those entanglements.” Burnet's hist. of his own times, vol. I. p. 89.

A colony of French possess the Court;
Pimps, priests, buffoons, in privy chamber sport.
Such slimy monsters ne'er approached a throne
Since Pharaoh's days, nor so defil'd a crown.
In sacred ear tyrannic arts they croak,
Pervert his mind, and good intentions choak;
Tell him of golden Indies, fairy lands,
Leviathan, and absolute commands.

Britannia and Raleigh; a poem by A. Marvell.

The secret of the King and Duke's being so eager and hearty in their resolutions to break with France at this juncture, [July 1678] was as follows.

France, in order to break the force of the Confederacy, and elude all just conditions of a general peace, resolved by any means to enter into separate measures with Holland; to which end it was absolutely necessary to engage the good offices of the King of England, who was looked upon to be master of the peace whenever he pleased. The bargain was struck for three or four hundred thousand pounds. But when all was agreed, Monsieur Barillon, the French ambassador, told the King, “ that he had orders from his master, before payment, to add a private article, by which his Majesty should be engaged, never to keep above eight thousand men of standing troops in his three kingdoms.” This unexpected proposal put the King in a rage, and made him say, “ —d's fish! Does my brother of France think to serve me thus? Are all his promises to make me absolute master of my—— come to this? Or does he think that a thing to be done with eight thousand men?”

Temple's works, vol. II. p. 464. in a note, edit. 1720.

——By this means came in Charles the second, a luxurious effeminate prince, a deep disssembler, and if not a papist himself, yet a great favourer of them: but the People had suffered so much from the army, that he was received with the utmost joy and transport. The Parliament, in the Hymncon, passed what laws he pleased, gave a vast revenue for life, being three times as much as any of his predecessors enjoyed, and several millions besides to be spent in his pleasures. This made him conceive vast hopes of arbitrary power than any that went before him, and in order to it he debauched and enervated the whole kingdom. His Court was a scene of adulteries, drunkenness and irreligion, appearing more like stews or the feasts of Bacchus, than the family of a chief magistrate. And in a little time the contagion spread through the whole Nation, that it was out of the fashion not to be lewd, and scandalous not to be a public enemy.” etc. etc. etc.

“ A short hist. of standing armies in England.” [by John Trenchard.] London, 1698. in quarto.
E 2 ————Ruffel

After he had continued some time in Italy, he thought proper to draw nearer

—— Ruffel the painter related to or connected with the Olivers, told Vertue a remarkable story. The greater part of the collection of King Charles being dispersed in the troubles, among which were several pictures of the Olivers, Charles II who remembered and was desirous of recovering them, made many inquiries about them after the restoration. At last he was told by one Rogers of Isleworth, probably Progers, well known for being employed in the King's private pleasures, that both father and son were dead, but that the son's widow was living at Isleworth and had many of their works. The King went privately and unknown with Rogers to see them. The widow showed several finished and unfinished, with many of which the King being pleased, asked if she would sell them; she replied, she had a mind the King should see them first, and if he did not purchase them, she should think of disposing of them. The King discovered himself; on which she produced some more pictures which she seldom showed. The King desired her to set a price; she said she did not care to make a price with his Majesty, she would leave it to him: but promised to look over her husband's books and let his Majesty know what prices his father the late King had paid. The King took away what he liked, and sent Rogers to Mrs. Oliver with the option of a thousand pounds or an annuity of three hundred pounds for her life. She chose the latter. Some years afterwards, it happened, that the King's mistresses having begged all or most of these pictures, Mrs. Oliver, who probably was a prude and apt to express herself like a prude, said, on hearing it "that if she had thought the King would have given them to such whores and strumpets and bastards, he never should have had them." This reached the Court; the poor woman's annuity was stopped and she never received it afterwards.

Anecdotes of painting in England, with some account of the principal artists; etc. collected by the late Mr. George Vertue, and now digested and published by Mr. Horace Walpole. Strawberry hill, printed 1762, [FROM HIS OWN PRESS, mark that ye Nobles, Gentry,] in two vol. quarto, vol. 2. p. 14.

One other extract from this author, to whom the public are variously obliged, cannot be improper in the Memoirs of A. Sydney. It is taken from the second volume of the above work, p. 147.

"The whole fabric [the intended palace of Whitehall by Inigo Jones] was so glorious an idea, that one forgets for a moment, in the regret for its not being executed, the confirmation of our liberties obtained by a melancholy scene that passed before the windows of that very banquetting-house."

Alfred was of person comlier than all his brethren, of pleasing tongue and graceful behaviour, ready wit and memory; yet through the fondness of his parents towards him, had not been taught to read till the twelfth year of his age; but the great desire of learning which was in him, soon appeared, by his conning of Saxon poems day and night, which with great attention he heard by others repeated. He was besides, excellent at hunting and the new art then of hawking, but more exemplary in devotion, having collected into a book certain prayers and psalms which he carried ever with him in his bosom to use on all occasions. He thirsted after all liberal knowledge, and oft complained, that in his youth he had no teachers, in his middle age so little vacancy from wars and the cares of his kingdom; yet leisure he found sometimes, not only to learn much himself, but to communicate thereof what he could to his people, by translating books out of Latin into English, Orosius, Boethius, Beda's history and others; permitted none unlearn'd to bear office, either in Court or Commonwealth. At twenty years of age, not yet reigning, he took to wife Egelswitha the daughter of Ethelred a Mercian Earl. The extremities which befell him in the first of his reign, Neothan Abbot told him, were justly come upon him for neglecting in his younger days the complaints of such as injured and oppressed repaired to him, as then second person in the kingdom for redress; which neglect were it such indeed, were yet excusable in a youth, through jollity of mind unwilling perhaps to be detained long with sad and sorrowful narrations; but from the time of his undertaking regal charge, no man more patient in hearing causes, more inquisitive in examining, more exact in doing justice, and providing good laws which are yet extant; more severe in punishing unjust judges or obstinate offenders. Thieves especially and robbers, to the terror nearer home, that if an opportunity should offer, "he might not,"

as

terror of whom in cross waies were hung upon a high post certain chains of gold, as it were daring any one to take them thence; so that justice seemed in his daies not to flourish only but to triumph. No man then bee more frugal of two pretious things in man's life, his time and his revenue; no man wiser in the disposal of both. His time, the day and night he distributed by the burning of certain tapours into three equal portions; the one was for devotion, the other for public or private affairs, the third for bodily refreshment: how each hour past, he was put in minde by one who had that office. His whole annual revenue, which his first care was should be justly his own, he divided into two equall parts. The first he imploied to secular uses, and subdivided those into three; the first to pay his souldiers, household-servants and guard, of which divided into three bands one attended monthly by turn; the second was to pay his architects and workmen, whom he had got together of severall nations, for he was also an elegant builder, above the custome and conceit of Englishmen in those days: the third he had in readiness to releive or honor strangers according to their worth, who came from all parts to see him, and live under him. The other equal part of his yearly wealth he dedicated to religious uses, those of fower forts. The first to releive the poor; the second to the building and maintenance of two monasteries; the third of a school, where he had perswaded the sons of many noblemen to study sacred knowledge and liberal arts, some say at Oxford; the fourth was for the releif of foreign churches as far as India to the shrine of St. Thomas, sending thether Sigelm bishop of Sherburn, who both returned safe and brought with him many rich gems and spices: guifts also and a letter he received from the Patriarch of Jerusalem, sent many to Rome, and for them received reliques. Thus far, and much more might be said of his NOBLE minde, which rendered him the mirror of Princes. His body was diseased in his youth with a great soreness in the seige, and that ceasing of itself, with another inward pain of unknown cause, which held him by frequent fits to his dying day; yet not disinabled to sustain those many glorious labors of his life both in peace and war.

The history of Britain, that part especially now called England, from the first traditional beginning to the Norman conquest. By John Milton. London printed 1671, in quarto.

The Reader will forgive the following digression, if it be a digression, respecting good and bad ministers, which makes part of Milton's inimitable prayer, in his first prose tract, intituled "Of Reformation" etc. printed London 1641, in quarto.

"Then amidst the hymns and halleluiahs of Saints, some one may perhaps bee heard offering at high strains in new and lofty measures, to sing and celebrate thy divine mercies and marvelous judgements in this land throughout all ages; whereby this great and warlike nation instructed and inured to the fervent and continuall practice of truth and righteousness, and casting farre from her the rags of her old vices, may presse on hard to that high and happy emulation to be found the soberest, wisest, and most christian people, at that day when thou the eternall and shortly-expected King shalt open the clouds to judge the severall kingdoms of the world, and distributing national honors and rewards to religious and just Commonwealths, shalt put an end to all earthly Tyrannies, proclaiming thy universal and milde Monarchy through heaven and earth. Where they undoubtedly, that by their labors, counsels and prayers, have been earnest for the common good of religion and their Countrey, shall receive above the inferior orders of the blessed, the regall addition of principalities, legions and thrones into their glorious titles, and in supereminence of beatific vision progressing the datelesse and irrevoluble circle of Eternity, shall clasp inseparable hands with joy and blisse, in over-measure for ever. But they contrary, that by the impairing and diminution of the true faith, the distresses and servitude of their Countrey, aspire to high dignity, rule and promotion here, after a shamefull end in this life, WHICH GOD GRANT THEM, shall be throwne downe eternally into the darkest and deepest gulfe of hell, where under the despightfull controule, the trample and spurne of all the other damned, that in the anguish of their torture shall have no other ease then to exercise a raving and bestiall tyranny over them as their slaves and negro's, they shall remaine in that plight for ever, the basest, the lowermost, the most dejected, most underfoot and downe-trodden vassals of perdition."

Me-

as * general Ludlow observes, "be wanting to his duty and the public service." In his way he visited that general and his friends, in their retirement in Switzerland; assuring them of his affection and friendship, and no-way declining to own them and the cause for which they suffered. He staid with them about three weeks; and designing to go for Flanders, where he resolved to pass the ensuing winter, he took his journey by the way of Berne, † doing all the good offices he could for general Ludlow and his friends, with the advoyer and other principal magistrates of that city. He was at Brussels in the end of the year 1663, whence he wrote to his father, with relation to transporting a body of the best officers and soldiers of the old army into the service of the emperor.

In 1665, upon the breaking out of the war between England and the United Provinces, ten persons were sent by king Charles II. to Augsburg in Germany ‡ to assassinate colonel Sydney; and probably might have effected their design, if he, having undertaken a journey to Holland, upon business relating to the public, had not removed from that city before their arrival.

He continued abroad till the year 1677, when he procured leave to return to England; and obtained a particular pardon, || according to bishop Sprat, "upon repeated promises of constant quiet and obedience for the future." Bishop Burnet affirms, that 'he came back when the parliament ' was pressing the king into a war. The court of France obtained leave ' for him to return. He did all he could to divert people from the war;

* Memoirs, p. 384, folio edit.

† Edmund Ludlow, Knight of the shire for the County of Wilts, in the Parliament which began Nov. 3, 1640; one of the Council of State; Lieutenant General of Horse and Commander in chief of the Forces in Ireland. An honest man by the confession of his enemies. His seat was Maiden Bradley, with a paternal estate, it is said, of upwards of L. 3000 a year belonging to it. During his retirement in Switzerland, he wrote his "Memoirs," and several curious valuable tracts.

It may not be improper here, to give an extract of a letter from Philip, Lord Viscount Lisle, to his father Robert, earl of Leicester, dated Nov. 6, 1649, taken from the Sydney State papers; as it accounts, in part, for the kindness and attention shewn afterwards in Switzerland to the Commonwealth party which sheltered themselves there. "The Parliament's declaration made since the change of the government, hath been, as the Council is informed, much approved of, in many parts of the Swisses Countrey; and the Ministers there, do publicly give God thanks for the establishment of the Republic and pray for it: upon which I believe an Agent will shortly be sent thither."

The Declaration, the Latin edition of it, was printed Mar. 22, 1648, in quarto, under this title, "Parliamenti Angliae declaratio. In qua Res nuperum gestae, et Decretum de Statu Angliae Regio in liberam Rempublicam vertendo, asseruntur." And the following order was placed before the title, "Die Sabbathi 17 Martii, 1648. Comitibus Populi Parliamentariis decernitur, hanc Declarationem typis esse ilico mandandam. Hen. Scobell Cleric. Parliamenti."

‡ Memoirs of Edmund Ludlow, p. 404.

|| Hist. of the Rye-house plot.

so that § some took him for a pensioner of France. But he said, our court was in an entire confidence in France, and had no other design in this shew of a war, but to raise an army and keep it beyond-sea till it was trained and modelled. But it is evident from a letter of his * to Henry Savile, the English ambassador in France, that it was that gentleman who obtained

[§ Some took him for a Pensioner of France.]

The following anecdote having been communicated to Dr. Hutcheson of Glasgow, was frequently related by him to his friends, "That during Mr. Sydney's stay in France, one day hunting with the French King, and being mounted on a fine English horse, whose form and spirit caught the King's eye, he received a message that he would please to oblige the King with his horse at his own price. He answered that he did not chuse to part with him. The King determined to have no denial, and gave orders to tender him money or to seize the horse; which being made known to Mr. Sydney, he instantly took a pistol and shot him, saying, That his horse was born a free creature, had served a free man, and should not be mastered by a King of slaves."

[* To Henry Savile, the English ambassador in France,]

Mr. Savile is said to have replied to a Frenchman, who exulted upon the fine writings of his countrymen, That there were but two subjects in nature worth a wise man's thoughts, namely religion and government, and they durst speak of neither.

The Independent Whig, numb. I.

The celebrated Monf. Voltaire, in his "Ode sur la mort de Madame de Bareith, avec une lettre, etc." seems to have entertained, nearly, the same idea as Mr. Savile; and fixes the superiority of the English Nation, where alone it centers, UPON ITS LIBERTY.

"Les Italiens, ces peuples ingénieux, ont craint de penser; les Français n'ont osé penser qu'à demi, et les Anglais qui ont volé jusqu'au ciel, PARCE QU'ON NE LEVR A POINT COUPE LES AILES, sont devenus les précepteurs des nations. Nous leur devons tout, depuis les loix primitives de la gravitation, depuis le calcul de l'infini et la connaissance précise de la lumière si vainement combattues, jusqu'à la nouvelle charue, et à l'insertion de la petite vérole, combattues encore."

Il Signor Martinelli, has a note also to the same effect in his elegant edition of the "Decamerone di Giovanne Boccacio."

"La lingua Toscana, può dirsi il miracolo delle lingue sì morte come viventi. Ella nacque, si può dir, come rosa infra le spine della persecuzione; perche Dante e il Petrarca le loro belle opere in esilio composero, e il Boccaccio il suo Decamerone terminò, siccome nel proemio alla quarta giornata dichiara, saettato dall'invidia e dalla calunnia. Il Machiavelli fù martoriato dalla fazione dei Medici, per essersi ingegnato d'impedir loro d'occupare la tirannide della sua patria. Il Guicciardini si prese un volontario esilio in una sua villa, per non vedere spirare la libertà della Repubblica Fiorentina nelle mani di Cosimo primo, e quivi terminò di scrivere la sua Istoria d'Italia. Al Segni e al Varchi, proibirono i Granduchi di pubblicare le loro Istorie di Firenze. Il Galileo, tra le persecuzioni con le quali convenne combattere, ebbe quella d'Impostore che si arrogarono le sue mirabili invenzioni, con le quali ha aperto ai mortali la via d'indagare l'indole e movimenti de' corpi celesti; e finalmente l'Ariosto visse povero e Torquato Tasso morì poverissimo."

Parlando dei Latini, Ennio fù produzione del favore di Caton maggiore, Terenzio di quello di Scipione, Lucrezio fù l'ammirazione e la delizia dei Grandi, e Cavalier riguardevole egli stesso, e Cicerone fù l'Arbitro un tempo della Repubblica; Virgilio e Orazio ebbero uno Augusto che gli colmò di benefizj, e Cornelio Tacito ebbe l'Imperator Traiano per protettore e per amico.

E ve-

obtained leave for him to return. The letter is dated from Nerac, December 28, 1682, but the year erroneously printed.

* He was at Penshurst on the 13th of November, 1677, and then gave a discharge to the executors of his father's will, Robert earl of Sunderland, Henry Sydney his brother, and Sir John Pelham, bart. for the legacy left him therein of 5000 and 100 l.

The year following, he stood candidate for the town of Guildford in Surrey; but the court opposing his election, he lost it: and though he drew up an account of the irregular proceedings in it, yet he did not think proper to pursue his claim. In 1679, he stood likewise candidate for the borough of Bramber, in Suffex; but was not chose, the interest being before made by Sir John Pelham and the Sydney family, fearing the ardour and intrepidity of his temper in such times, for his brother Henry Sydney, afterwards earl of Romney.

In 1683, he was accused of being concerned in the Rye-house plot; and after the lord Russel had been examined, he was brought before the king and council. † He told them, that he would make the best defence he could, if they had any proof against him, but he would not fortify their evidence by any thing he should say; so that his examination was very short. He lay sometime in the tower, and was brought thence by habeas corpus, on the 7th of November 1683, to the king's-bench-bar, where he was arraigned on an indictment of high-treason. On the 21st of November he was tried. For the particulars of the tryal, the reader will be pleased to refer to it.

The colonel being found guilty, when he was brought into court to receive sentence, he repeated his objections to the evidence against him; ‡ in which judge Withins interrupted him, and by a strange indecency gave him the lye in open court, which he bore patiently.

His execution was respited for three weeks; the tryal being universally exclaimed against, as a piece of most enormous injustice. After conviction he sent to the lord Halifax, who was his nephew by marriage, a paper to be laid before the king, containing the main points of his defence, upon which he appealed to his majesty, and desired he would review the whole matter. Whereupon the lord chief justice Jefferies, who had tryed him, said,

E venendo alle lingue viventi, la lingua Francese ebbe varj governi, che premiarono grandemente quelli scrittori che in essa in qualche maniera si distinsero; nondimeno non oltrepasò, il figurar nel Teatro, e divenire la lingua franca di alcune Nazioni d'Europa per il militare e la mercatura: e se la lingua Inglese è divenuta la lingua della filosofia e di ogni altra scienza lo deve AL GENIO LIBERO e inquisitivo della Nazione, secondato dalle vastissime ricchezze che le ha somministrate il commercio, mezzo efficacissimo a condur gl'ingegni a gran cose non meno che alla corruzione."

* Collins's Memoirs.

† Burnet, vol. i. p. 548.

‡ See the note in the Tryal; p. 118.

‘ That

* 'That either Sydney must die or he must die.' During his imprisonment, he sent for some independent preachers, and expressed to them a deep remorse for his past sins and a great confidence in the mercies of God. When he saw the warrant for execution he expressed no concern at it, and the change that was in his temper amazed all who went to him. † He told the sheriffs who brought the warrant, that he would not expostulate upon any thing on his account, for the world was now nothing to him, but he desired they would consider, how guilty they were of his blood, who had not returned a fair jury but one pack'd and as they were directed by the king's solicitor; he spoke this to them, not for his own sake but for their sake. One of the sheriffs was struck with this and wept. He wrote a long vindication of himself, which bishop Burnet says he had read; and that he

* Burnet, vol. i. p. 572.

† " This indenture made the seventh day of December, in the five and thirtieth year of the reign of our sovereign Lord Charles the Second, by the grace of God king of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, etc. and in the year of our Lord 1683, between the honourable Thomas Cheeke Esq. Lieutenant of his Majesty's Tower of London of the one part, and Peter Daniel Esq. and Samuel Dashwood Esq. Sheriffs of the county of Middlesex of the other part: Whereas Algernoon Sydney, Esq. by warrant of the Right Honourable Sir Leolin Jenkins, Knight, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State, bearing date at Whitehall the five and twentieth day of June, in the five and thirtieth year of the reign of King Charles the Second aforesaid, was committed to the custody of the said Lieutenant of the Tower for High Treason in compassing the death of the King, and conspiring to levy war against him, by him the said Lieutenant to be safely kept until he should be delivered by due course of law; and whereas, by writ issuing out of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench, under the seal of the said Court, bearing date the eight and twentieth day of November last past, reciting the judgment of the said Court against the said Algernoon Sydney for divers high treasons touching his Majesty's person, whereof he then stood convicted and attainted, the said Lieutenant of the Tower was commanded, that upon Friday the seventh day of December then next coming, he the said Lieutenant should meet the Sheriffs of Middlesex at Tower-Hill, and there cause the said Algernoon Sydney to be delivered to the said Sheriffs, to the intent that the said Sheriffs might cause execution to be made of him the said Algernoon Sydney, in such manner as in the said writ is recited. Now this indenture witnesseth, that the said Thomas Cheeke, in obedience to the said writ, and in performance of his Majesty's command therein specified, doth, the day of the date of these present indenture, deliver unto the said Peter Daniel and Samuel Dashwood, the body of the said Algernoon Sydney, in the said writ mentioned, according to the form and effect of the said writ; and the said Peter Daniel and Samuel Dashwood do hereby acknowledge to have received, on the day of the date of this present indenture, of and from the said Thomas Cheeke, the body of the said Algernoon Sydney, and of him do acquit and discharge the said Thomas Cheeke by these presents; in witness whereof the parties to these presents have hereunto interchangeably set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

Peter Daniel.
Samuel Dashwood.

Sealed and delivered in the presence of

Rich. Bradborne.
Ob. Reynolds.

F

summed

summed up the substance of it in the paper which he gave to the sheriffs: and suspecting they might suppress it, he gave a copy of it to a friend. It was a fortnight before it was printed; though the speeches of those who had died for the popish plot, were published the very next day: and it would not have been suffered to have been printed, but that written copies were daily dispersed. He met death with an unconcernedness which became one, who had set up Marcus Brutus for his pattern. He was but a few minutes on the scaffold on Tower-hill; he spake little and his prayer was very short; and his head was cut off at one blow, on the 7th of December 1683, aged about sixty-one years. The next day his body was interred with his ancestors at Penshurst. The paper which he delivered to the sheriffs, sets forth his innocence and the violent treatment which he had undergone with such force, that it deserves to be inserted here at full length.

Men, Brethren, and Fathers; Friends, Countrymen, and Strangers!

It may be expected, that I should now say some great matters unto you; but the rigour of the season, and the infirmities of my age, increased by a close imprisonment of above five months, do not permit me.

Moreover, we live in an age that makes truth pass for treason: I dare not say any thing contrary unto it, and the ears of those that are about me will probably be found too tender to hear it. My tryal and condemnation doth sufficiently evidence this.

West, Rumsey, and Keyling, who were brought to prove the plot, said no more of me, than that they knew me not; and some others, equally unknown to me, had used my name and that of some others, to give a little reputation to their designs. The lord Howard is too infamous by his life, and the many perjuries not to be denied or rather sworn by himself, to deserve mention; and being a single witness, would be of no value, though he had been of unblemished credit, or had not seen and confessed, that the crimes committed by him would be pardoned only for committing more; and even the pardon promised could not be obtained till the drudgery of swearing was over.

This being laid aside, the whole matter is reduced to the papers said to be found in my closet by the king's officers, without any other proof of their being written by me, than what is taken from suppositions upon the similitude of an hand that is easily counterfeited, and which hath been lately declared, in the lady Car's case, to be no lawful evidence in criminal causes.

But, if I had been seen to write them, the matter would not be much altered. They plainly appear to relate to a large treatise written long since in answer to Filmer's book, which by all intelligent men is thought to be grounded upon wicked principles, equally pernicious to magistrates and people.

If he might publish to the world his opinion, That all men are born under a necessity derived from the laws of God and nature, to submit to an absolute

absolute kingly government, which could be restrained by no law, or oath; and that he that has the power, whether he came to it by creation, election, inheritance, usurpation, or any other way, had the right; and none must oppose his will, but the persons and estates of his subjects must be indispensably subject unto it; I know not why I might not have published my opinion to the contrary, without the breach of any law I have yet known.

I might, as freely as he, publicly have declared my thoughts, and the reasons upon which they were grounded; and I am persuaded to believe, that God had left nations to the liberty of setting up such governments as best pleased themselves.

That magistrates were set up for the good of nations, not nations for the honour or glory of magistrates.

That the right and power of magistrates in every country was that which the laws of that country made it to be.

That those laws were to be observed, and the oaths taken by them, having the force of a contract between magistrate and people, could not be violated without danger of dissolving the whole fabric.

That usurpation could give no right; and the most dangerous of all enemies to kings were they, who raising their power to an exorbitant height, allowed to usurpers all the rights belonging unto it.

That such usurpations being seldom compassed without the slaughter of the reigning person or family, the worst of all villanies was thereby rewarded with the most glorious privileges.

That if such doctrines were received, they would stir up men to the destruction of princes with more violence than all the passions that have hitherto raged in the hearts of the most unruly.

That none could be safe, if such a reward were proposed to any that could destroy them.

That few would be so gentle as to spare even the best, if, by their destruction, a wild usurper could become God's anointed, and by the most execrable wickedness invest himself with that divine character.

This is the scope of the whole treatise; the writer gives such reasons, as at present did occur unto him, to prove it. This seems to agree with the doctrines of the most revered authors of all times, nations and religions. The best and wisest of kings have ever acknowledged it. The present king of France has declared, that kings have that happy want of power, that they can do nothing contrary to the laws of their country; and grounds his quarrel with the king of Spain, anno 1667, upon that principle. King James, in his Speech to the Parliament, anno 1603, doth in the highest degree assert it: the scripture seems to declare it. If nevertheless the writer was mistaken, he might have been refuted by law, reason and scripture; and no man for such matters was ever otherwise punished, than by being made to see his error ; and it has not, as I think, been ever known that they had been referred to the judgment of a jury, composed of men utterly unable to comprehend them.

But there was little of this in my case : the extravagance of my prosecutors goes higher : the above-mentioned treatise was never finished, nor could be in many years, and most probably would never have been. So much as is of it was written long since, never reviewed, nor shewn to any man ; and the fiftieth part of it was not produced, and not the tenth of that offered to be read. That which was never known to those who are said to have conspired with me, was said to be intended to stir up the people in prosecution of the designs of those conspirators.

When nothing of particular application to time, place or person, could be found in it, as has ever been done by those who endeavoured to raise insurrections, all was supplied by innuendo's.

Whatsoever is said of the expulsion of Tarquin ; the insurrection against Nero ; the slaughter of Caligula or Domitian ; the translation of the crown of France from Meroveus his race to Pepin and from his descendants to Hugh Capet and the like ; was applied by innuendo to the king.

They have not considered, that if such acts of state be not good, there is not a king in the world that has any title to the Crown he wears ; nor can have any unless he could deduce his pedigree from the eldest son of Noah, and shew that the succession had still continued in the eldest of the eldest line, and been so deduced to him.

Every one may see what advantage this would be to all the kings of the world ; and whether, that failing, it were not better for them to acknowledge they had received their crowns by the consent of willing nations, or to have no better title to them than usurpation and violence ; which, by the same ways, may be taken from them.

But I was long since told, that I must die or the plot must die.

Left the means of destroying the best protestants in England should fail, the bench must be filled with such as had been blemishes to the bar.

None but such as these would have advised with the king's council of the means of bringing a man to death ; suffered a jury to be packed by the king's solicitors and the under-sheriff ; admit of jurymen who are not freeholders ; receive such evidence as is above-mentioned ; refuse a copy of an indictment, or suffer the statute of 46 Edw. III. to be read, that doth expressly enact, It should in no case be denied to any man, upon any occasion whatsoever ; over-rule the most important points of law without hearing. And whereas the statute, 25 Edw. III. upon which they said I should be tried, doth reserve to the parliament all constructions to be made in points of treason, they could assume to themselves not only a power to make constructions, but such constructions as neither agree with law, reason or common sense.

By

By these means I am brought to this place. The Lord forgive these practices, and avert the evils that threaten the nation from them! The Lord sanctify these my sufferings unto me! and though I fall as a sacrifice to idols, suffer not idolatry to be established in this land! Bless thy people, and save them. Defend thy own cause, and defend those that defend it. Stir up such as are faint; direct those that are willing; confirm those that waver; give wisdom and integrity unto all. Order all things so, as may most redound to thine own glory. Grant that I may die glorifying thee for all thy mercies; and that at the last thou hast permitted me to be singled out as a witness of thy truth, and even by the confession of my opposers, for that * OLD CAUSE in which I was from my youth engaged, and for which thou hast often and wonderfully declared thyself.

Upon † the revolution, such regard was had to his innocence and the justice due to his memory, that the parliament made it one of their first acts to

* Col. Sydney bore this only motto, without figure, on the Parliament's part in the late war, SANCTVS. AMOR. PATRIAE. DAT. ANIMVM

The art of making devises. etc. London, 1650, in quarto.

—— — Atque Sidneium, quod ego illustre nomen nostris semper adhaesisse partibus laetor. Johannis Miltoni, Angli, pro Populo Anglicano defensio secunda.

[† Upon the Revolution.]

See "A letter humbly addrest to the most excellent father of his Country, the wise and victorious Prince, King William III. By a dutiful and well-meaning subject [the Rev. Mr. Stephens, Rector of Sutton in Surrey.] London, printed by J. Darby, 1698."—in quarto.

—— Nothing therefore could determine that unfortunate King [James II.] to depart once and again, but the fixt resolution I have already mentioned, to carry through his scheme by force; for otherwise and if he had been resolved to give up that scheme, after he saw such manifest proofs of the aversion of the whole nation and of his own family to it, it is easy and obvious to see what must have been his conduct: He would have remained in his palace and granted all the demands of the Prince of Orange's declaration; and agreed to the very thing which You now promise by yours, namely, to refuse nothing that a free Parliament could have asked, for the security of the religion, laws and liberties of his people.

Now, as he might and ought to have done this and did not do it, which was the only method of retaining his crown consistent with that security of the religion and liberties of his people, it is evident, that he did indeed abdicate his Crown.

And in respect of the many essential miscarriages by him committed and persisted in, the people had undeniable reasons to declare the Throne vacant; and having thus far done themselves justice, and provided for their own security against the evils of popery and slavery with which they had been threatened, it remained for them to provide for the future government of this kingdom by making A NEW SETTLEMENT.

Here it was, that the wisdom and moderation of the leading men of this nation, at that time, was discovered: it was a regal government though limited by laws, and they resolved that it should continue such, justly dreading a relapse into the anarchy and confusions, and the despotic government of the usurper, which had succeeded the abolition of the royal authority about the middle of that century.

It was a hereditary kingdom, though not indefeasibly such; and therefore they departed as little as possible from the regular course of succession in the royal family, and no farther than was necessary to repeal his attainder, on the 13th of February, 1688-9, the preamble to the act being in the following words,

‘Whereas Algernon Sydney, Esq. in the term of St. Michael, in the five-and-thirtieth year of the reign of our late sovereign lord king Charles the necessary for securing the liberties of the subject. They acted as any wise and good man would do, who is master of his own estate. If his eldest son proves unworthy, and merits being disinherited, he will settle his estate on his second son and his issue in their order. And thus we settled the crown on the eldest daughter of the abdicated prince; and in default of her issue on the second daughter; in default of her issue on the Prince of Orange himself, who was the next in succession, if he should have any by another wife than the Princess Mary; and when the prospect of successors failed amongst the protestant descendants of King Charles the First, the Nation looked out for the next protestant heir, who was a grandchild of King James the First, and settled the crown upon her and the heirs of her body, being protestants.

Thus was the constitution maintained, and the government re-established in its natural and regular state of a limited and hereditary monarchy, which fell afterwards by succession, upon the death of Queen Anne to the late King George; a prince who was born of a dignity next to the regal; whose family have been remarkable for affording good princes over their subjects, whom they are intitled to govern absolutely; who was himself, as mild and amiable a Monarch as ever reigned. He was succeeded by our present Sovereign, whom all the world must allow to be remarkably possessed of two virtues the most deserving of esteem amongst mankind, probity and magnanimity: and for the mildness of his government, let this singular circumstance bear witness; that we are now in the 19th year of his reign, and hitherto not one drop of blood shed for a state crime, even in the legal methods of trial, though there have not been wanting occasions, even before You was pleased to make us a visit, for just severities of that kind.

Of this Prince, now reigning, the Nation is blessed with a numerous and hopeful issue; whereof the greater part have been born and educated amongst ourselves.

And the case so standing, in respect to the abdication of your grandfather, and the succeeding NEW SETTLEMENT of the crown in the protestant line of the royal family, which has already taken effect during the space of fifty-seven years, which you mention as the duration of the exile of your family, and urge as being more than sufficient atonement for the miscarriages of your grandfather; You come, Sir, a great deal too late with your professions of repentance and promises of amendment: for as I began with the question of expediency, I am now considering the question of right and strict justice, and by this You are cut off, independent of the former.

This is indeed the true state of the question, where the right and title now lies; and upon this I maintain, that supposing a great deal which is not true, that your family was not still popish, bred at Rome, and favour'd by FRANCE THE NATURAL ENEMY OF GREAT BRITAIN and the common enemy of the liberties of Europe; supposing You were sincere in your promises, and that your religion did not authorize and require You to break them; and supposing You personally, as I am willing to believe, possessed of many good qualities becoming a Prince, still You come too late; we cannot listen to your declaration, though You should lift up your voice like Esau and cry, Have you but one blessing O my People? For it is true that we have but one, and that is already conferred and settled upon thy Protestant Brother; and we cannot with justice deprive him of it, supposing we could do it with prudence, or consistently with the security of our religion, laws and liberties.

And to make You sensible of the force of this consideration, if You can see the truth when it is repugnant to your own interest and wishes, suffer me, etc. etc. etc.

The occasional writer [a very fine Liberty-tract] Or an answer to the second manifesto of the Pretender's eldest son, which bears dated at the Palace of Holy-Rood-House Oct. 10, 1745; containing reflections political and historical upon the last Revolution, and the progress of the present Rebellion in Scotland. Tandem triumphans, Motto to the Pretender's standard. Nondum immemores, Answer. The second edition corrected. London, printed for A. Millar, 1746—in octavo.

The

‘ the Second, in the court of King’s bench at Westminster, by means of an ‘ unlawful return of Jurors, and by denial of his lawful challenges to divers of ‘ them, for want of freehold, and without sufficient legal evidence of any ‘ treasons committed by him; there being at that time produced a paper, ‘ found in the closet of the said Algernon, supposed to be his hand-writing;
 ‘ which was not proved by the testimony of any one witness, to be written ‘ by him; but the jury was directed to believe it, by comparing it with ‘ other writings of the said Algernon: and besides that paper so produced,
 ‘ there was but one single witness to prove any matter against the said Al-‘ gernon; and by a partial and unjust construction, of the statute, declar‘ ing what was his treason, was most unjustly and wrongfully convicted and ‘ attainted, and afterwards executed for high treason: may it therefore please ‘ your most excellent majesties, at the humble petition and request of the ‘ right honourable Philip earl of Leicester, brother and heir of the said Al-‘ gernon Sydney, and of the right honourable Henry viscount Sydney of ‘ Sheppey, the other brother of the said Algernon, that it be declared and ‘ enacted, etc. That the said conviction and attainder be repealed, reversed, ‘ etc. And to the end that right be done to the memory of the said Al-‘ gernon Sydney, deceased, be it further enacted, That all records and pro‘ ceedings relating to the said attainder be wholly cancelled and taken off
 ‘ the file, or otherwise defaced and obliterated, to the intent that the same

The NEW SETTLEMENT before mentioned, seems to have been gratefully perpetuated by that excellent Prince, George I. in the following medals or rather Medaglions, which, it is apprehended, were struck at Hanover by his orders.

I] MATILDA · FILIA · H · II · R · ANGL · VX · H · LEON · D · BAV · ET · SAX ·
 MATER · OTT · IV · IMP · PRIVS · DVCIS · AQUIT · H · PAL · RHEN · D · S · WILH ·
 SATORIS · DOMVS · BRVNS Bust of the Empress, in profile.

SOPHIA · EX · STIRPAE · EL · PAL · NEPT · IAC · I · REG · M · BRIT · VIDVA · ERN ·
 AVG · EL · BRVNS · ET · L · ANGLIAE · PRINCEPS · AD · SVCCCESS · NOMINATA ·
 MDCCI Bust of the Princess, in profile.

II] SOPHIA · D · G · EX · STIRPE · EL · PAL · ELECT · VID · BR · ET · LVN · MAG ·
 BRIT · HAERES Bust of the Princess, in profile.

TRANSMISSA · LVCE · REFVLGET The setting sun, with a view of the garden of Herren-hausen. In the exurge, OBIIT · VIII · IVN · MDCCXIV

III] GEORGIVS · D · G · MAG · BRIT · FR · ET · HIB · REX Bust of the King, in profile.
 PRINC · OPT · RELIGIONIS · ET · LIBERTATIS · CVSTODI Britannia presenting the Regalia to the King, who is accompanied by Religion and Liberty. In the exurge, PVBLICA ·
 AVCTORITATE · PROCLAMATO · $\frac{1}{2}$ AUG · ANNO · MDCCXIII

XII

Three smaller medals, about the sizes of a crown, half crown and shilling, were likewise struck by him; the faces of which agree with medal II, but the reverses bear only the following inscription. NATA · XIII · OCT · MDCXXX · NVPTA · MENSE · SEPT · MDCLVIII ·
 AD · SVCCCESSIONEM · M · BRIT · NOMINATA · MDCCI · SVB · VESPERAM ·
 VIII · IVNII · MDCCXIV · IN · HORTIS · HERRENHAUSANIS · ADHVC · VEGETO · ET · FIRMO · PASSV · DEAMBVLANS · SVBITA · ET · PLACIDA · MORTE · EREPTA

‘ may

‘ may not be visible in after-ages: and that the records and proceedings ‘ relating to the said conviction, judgment and attainder, in the court of ‘ King’s-bench, now remaining, shall and be forthwith brought into the ‘ court this present Easter term, and then and there be taken off the file ‘ and cancelled.’

Bishop Burnet’s character of him is, ‘ That he was a man of most extra‘ ordinary courage; a steady man even to obstinacy; sincere but of a rough ‘ and boisterous temper that could not bear contradiction. He seemed to ‘ be a christian, but in a particular form of his own; he thought it was to ‘ be like a divine philosophy in the mind: but he was against all public ‘ worship and every thing that looked like a church. He was stiff to all ‘ republican principles, and such an enemy to every thing that looked like a ‘ monarchy, that he set himself in high opposition against Cromwell, when ‘ he was made protector. * He had studied the history of government in all its ‘ branches, beyond any man I ever knew. He had a particular way of insinuating

[* He had studied the history of government, in all its branches, beyond any man I ever knew.]

Lords and Commons of England, consider what Nation it is wherof ye are, and wherof ye are the governours: a Nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious, and piercing spirit, acute to invent, suttle and finewy to discours, not beneath the reach of any point the highest that human capacity can soar to. Therefore the studies of learning in her deepest sciencies have bin so ancient, and so eminent among us, that writers of good antiquity, and ablest judgement have bin perswaded that ev’n the school of Pythagoras and the Persian wisdom took beginning from the old philosophy of this island. And that wise and civill Roman, Julius Agricola, who govern’d once here for Caesar, preferr’d the naturall wits of Britain, before the labour’d studies of the French.—Behold now this vast city; a city of refuge, the mansion house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with his protection; the shop of warre hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed justice in defence of beleaguer’d truth, then there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and idea’s wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty the approaching Reformation: others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and convincement. What could a man require more from a Nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge. What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant soile, but wise and faithful labourers, to make a knowing people, a Nation of prophets, of sages, and of worthies.—

Areopagitica. A speech of John Milton for the liberty of unlicenc’d printing. [GUARD
 IT YE BRITONS!] To the Parliament of England. London, printed in the yeare 1644—in quarto.

Cromwell seemeth to be distinguished in the most eminent manner, with regard to his abilities, from all other great and wicked men, who have overturned the liberties of their country.
 The times in which others succeeded in this attempt, were such as saw the spirit of liberty suppressed and stifled by a general luxury and venality: but Cromwell subdued his Country, when this spirit was at its height, by a successful struggle against court-oppression; and while it was conducted and supported by a set of the greatest geniuses for government the world ever saw.

The very eminent Prelate, Dr. Warburton, in his notes on Pope’s Essay on man.

Cromwell

‘nuating himself into people, that would hearken to his * notions, and not contradict him.’

Cromwell was one of those geniuses who are oftentimes buried in obscurity, through want of occasion of being known. Thousands spend their lives in retirement, who are capable of greater things than most of those whose names are tossed from every tongue and voic’d for wise, skilful, able, valiant. In times of peace these men are little known or notic’d. They are overlook’d among the herd, or treated with a coolness or disregard, that damps their ambition and establishes their virtue. etc.

The Rev. William Harris, a sensible, candid writer, in his “Historical and critical account of the life of O. Cromwell.”

The Parliament of Nov. 3, 1640, that MASTER Parliament having singularly promoted learning, witness their pupils, who figur’d in all professions down to and beyond the Revolution, and obtained it too; the following note, taken from Dr. John Wallis’s “Account of some passages of his own life,” who, in the Year 1644, was one of the Secretaries to the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and in the year 1649, became publick Professor of Geometry, of the foundation of Sir Henry Savile, at Oxford, may not be unacceptable.

“About the year 1645, while I lived in London, at a time, when, by our civil wars, academical studies were much interrupted in both our Universities, beside the conversation of divers eminent Divines, as to matters theological; I had the opportunity of being acquainted with divers worthy persons, inquisitive into natural philosophy and other parts of humane learning: and particularly of what hath been called the new philosophy or experimental philosophy.

We did by agreement, divers of us, meet weekly in London, on a certain day, to treat and discourse of such affairs. Of such number were Dr. John Wilkins, afterward Bishop of Chester, Dr. Jonathan Goddard, Dr. George Ent, Dr. Glisson, Dr. Merret, doctors in physick, Mr. Samuel Foster, then professor of astronomy at Gresham College; Mr. Theodore Haak, a German of the Palatinate and then resident in London (who, I think, gave the first occasion and first suggested those meetings) and many others.

These meetings we held sometimes at Dr. Goddard’s lodgings in Woodstreet, or some convenient place near, on occasion of his keeping an operator for grinding glasses for telescopes and microscopes; and sometimes at a convenient place in Cheapside; sometimes at Gresham College or some place near adjoining.

Our business was, precluding matters of theology and state affairs, to discourse and consider of philosophical enquiries, and such as related thereunto; as physick, anatomy, geometry, astronomy, navigation, staticks, magneticks, chymicks, mechanicks and natural experiments, with the state of these studies, as then cultivated, at home and abroad. — — —

About the year 1648, 1649, some of us being removed to Oxford, first Dr. Wilkins, then I, and soon after Dr. Goddard, our company divided. Those in London continued to meet there, as before, and we with them, when we had occasion to be there. And those of us at Oxford, with Dr. Ward, since bishop of Salisbury, Dr. Ralph Bathurst, now president of Trinity College in Oxford, Dr. Petty, since Sir William Petty, Dr. Willis, then an eminent Physician in Oxford, and divers others, continued such meetings in Oxford, and brought those studies into fashion there; meeting first at Dr. Pettie’s lodgings in an apothecary’s house, because of the convenience of inspecting drugs, and the like, as there was occasion; and after his remove to Ireland, tho’ not so constantly, at the lodgings of Dr. Wilkins, then warden of Wadham college, and after his removal to Trinity College in Cambridge, at the lodgings of the honourable Mr. Robert Boyle, then resident for divers years in Oxford.

Those meetings in London continued; and, after the King’s return in 1660, were increased with the accession of divers worthy and honorable persons; and were afterwards incorporated by the name of the Royal Society, etc. and so continue to this day.”

* Notions! a strange word after what had been just before declared. But the character is roughly, inaccurately drawn. Would it had been drawn at large, by Mr. Pelham! [See the note in the tryal, p. 131.] this magnanimous character!

G

Several

* Several manuscript treatises of his in Latin and Italian, and an "Essay on virtuous love" in English, are still extant among the papers of his family at Penshurst: but his "Discourses concerning Government" alone will immortalize his name, and are sufficient to supply the loss of Cicero's six books "De Republica," which has been so much regretted by men of sense and probity. In short, † it is one of the noblest books that ever the mind of man pro-

* In the year 1744, a work was published in 2 vol. oct. intitled, "Of the Use and Abuse of Parliaments; in two historical discourses, viz. I. A general view of Government in Europe. II. A Detection of the Parliaments of England, from the Year 1660." To that work the following advertisement is prefixed. "As an act of justice to the memory of a great man, it is necessary to acquaint the Reader, that he stands indebted for the first of the following discourses, to the celebrated Algernon Sydney."

[† It is one of the noblest books that ever the mind of man produced.]

Many circumstances at present loudly call upon us to exert ourselves. Venality and corruption have well nigh extinguished all principles of liberty. The bad books also that this age hath produced, have ruined our youth. The novels and romances which are eagerly purchased and read, emasculate the mind, and banish every thing grave and manly. One remedy for these evils is, to revive the reading of our old writers, of which we have good store, and the study whereof would fortify our youth against the blandishments of pleasure and the arts of corruption.

MILTON in particular ought to be read and studied by all our young gentlemen as an oracle.

He was a great and noble genius, perhaps the greatest that ever appeared amongst men; and his learning was equal to his genius. He had the highest sense of liberty, glorious thoughts, with a strong and nervous style. His works are full of wisdom, a treasure of knowledge. In them the Divine, the Statesman, the Historian, the Philologist, may be all instructed and entertained. It is to be lamented that his divine writings are so little known. Very few are acquainted with them, many have never heard of them. The same is true, with respect to another great writer, contemporary with Milton, and an advocate for the same glorious cause; I mean ALGERNON SYDNEY, whose Discourses concerning Government are the most precious legacy to these Nations.

All Antiquity cannot shew two writers equal to these. They were both great masters of reason, both great masters of expression. They had the strongest thoughts, and the boldest images, and are the best models that can be followed. The style of Sydney is always clear and flowing, strong and masculine. The great Milton has a style of his own, one fit to express the astonishing sublimity of his thoughts, the mighty vigour of his spirit, and that copia of invention, that redundancy of imagination, which no writer before or since hath equalled. In some places, it is confessed, that his periods are too long, which renders him intricate, if not altogether unintelligible to vulgar readers; but these places are not many. In the book before us his style is for the most part free and easy, and it abounds both in eloquence and wit and argument. I am of opinion that the style of this work is the best and most perfect of all his prose writings. Other men have commended the style of his History as matchless and incomparable, whose malice could not see or would not acknowledge the excellency of his other works. It is no secret whence their aversion to Milton proceeds; and whence their caution of naming him as any other writer than a Poet. Milton combated superstition of every form, and in every degree. Against them he employed his mighty strength, and, like a BATTERING RAM, beat down all before him. But notwithstanding these mean arts either to hide or to disparage him, a little time will make him better known; and the more he is known, the more he will be admired. His works are not like the fugitive short-lived things of this age, few of which survive their authors: they are substantial, durable, eternal writings, which will never die, never perish, whilst reason, truth and liberty have a being in these Nations.

The Editor's preface to Eikonoklastes, printed for A. Millar, 1756, in quarto.
There

produced; and we cannot wish a greater or more extensive blessing to the world, than that it may be every where read, and its principles universally received and propagated.

There is a long and singular passage in the Leviathan, edit. 1651, p. 110, under this marginal head, "the libertie which writers praise is the libertie of Sovereigns not of private men" which concludes in the following manner, "And by reading of these Greek and Latine authors, men from their childhood have gotten a habit, under a false shew of libertie, of favouring tumults and of licentious controlling the actions of their Sovereigns; and again of controlling those controllers; with the effusion of so much blood, as I think I may truly say, there never was any thing so deerly bought, as these western parts have bought the learning of the greek and latine tongues."

The accomplished, beneficent Earl of Shaftesbury, in his "Essay on the freedom of wit and humour" remarks on this passage, "And yet an able and witty Philosopher of our Nation was, we know, of late years, so possess'd with a horror of this kind, that both with respect to Politics and Morals, he directly acted in this spirit of MASSACRE. The fright he took upon the sight of the then governing powers, who unjustly assumed the authority of the People, gave him such an abhorrence of all popular government, and of the very notion of liberty itself; that to extinguish it for ever, he recommends the very extinguishing of letters, and exhorts Princes not to spare so much as an antient Roman or Greek historian. Is not this in truth somewhat Gothick? And has not our Philosopher, in appearance, something of the savage, that he should use Philosophy and Learning as the Scythians are said to have used Anacharsis and others, for having visited the Wise of Greece and learnt the manners of a polite People?" And, in the notes, he adds, "By this reasoning of Mr. Hobbes it should follow, that there can never be any tumults or deposing of Sovereigns at Constantinople or in Mogol."

CONTENTS OF THE DISCOURSES

CONTENTS OF THE DISCOURSES

CHAP. I

- Section 1. The Introduction. Page 3.
- Sect. 2. The common notions of liberty are not from school-divines, but from nature. p. 5.
- Sect. 3. Implicit faith belongs to fools; and truth is comprehended by examining principles. p. 8.
- Sect. 4. The rights of particular nations cannot subsist, if general principles contrary to them are received as true. p. 11.
- Sect. 5. To depend upon the will of a man is slavery. p. 12.
- Sect. 6. God leaves to man the choice of forms in government; and those who constitute one form may abrogate it. p. 14.
- Sect. 7. Abraham and the patriarchs were not kings. p. 17.
- Sect. 8. Nimrod was the first king during the life of Cush, Cham, Shem and Noah. p. 19.
- Sect. 9. The power of a father belongs only to a father. p. 22.
- Sect. 10. Such as enter into society, must in some degree diminish their liberty. p. 23.
- Sect. 11. No man comes to command many, unless by consent or by force. p. 24.
- Sect. 12. The pretended paternal right is divisible or indivisible: if divisible, it is extinguished; if indivisible, universal. p. 25.
- Sect. 13. There was no shadow of a paternal kingdom amongst the Hebrews, nor precept for it. p. 27.
- Sect. 14. If the paternal right had included dominion, and was to be transferred to a single heir, it must perish, if he were not known; and could be applied to no other person. p. 30.
- Sect. 16. The antients chose those to be kings, who excelled in the virtues that are most beneficial to civil societies. p. 36.
- Sect. 17. God, having given the government of the world to no one man nor declared how it should be divided, left it to the will of man. p. 41.
- Sect. 18. If a right of dominion were esteemed hereditary according to the law of nature, a multitude of destructive and inextricable controversies would thereupon arise. p. 45.
- Sect. 19. Kings cannot confer the right of father upon princes, nor princes upon kings. p. 48.
- Sect. 20. All just magistratical power is from the people. p. 54.

CHAP. II

- Sect. 1. That it is natural for nations to govern, or to chuse governors; and that virtue only gives a natural preference of one man above another, or reason why one should be chosen rather than another. p. 59.

CONTENTS OF THE DISCOURSES.

- Sect. 2. Every man that hath children hath the right of a father, and is capable of preferment in a society composed of many. p. 67.
- Sect. 3. Government is not instituted for the good of the governor but of the governed; and power is not an advantage but a burden. p. 70.
- Sect. 4. The paternal right devolves to, and is inherited by, all the children. p. 71.
- Sect. 5. Free men join together and frame greater or lesser societies, and give such forms to them as best pleases themselves. p. 75.
- Sect. 6. They who have a right of chusing a king, have the right of making a king. p. 83.
- Sect. 7. The laws of every nation are the measure of magistratical power. p. 87.
- Sect. 8. There is no natural propensity in man or beast to monarchy. p. 94.
- Sect. 9. The government instituted by God over the Israelites was aristocratical. p. 96.
- Sect. 10. Aristotle was not simply for monarchy or against popular government; but approved or disapproved of either according to circumstances. p. 102.
- Sect. 11. Liberty produceth virtue, order and stability: slavery is accompanied with vice, weakness and misery. p. 104.
- Sect. 12. The glory, virtue and power of the Romans, began and ended with their liberty. p. 112.
- Sect. 13. There is no disorder or prejudice in changing the name or number of magistrates, whilst the root and principle of their power continues intire. p. 117.
- Sect. 14. No sedition was hurtful to Rome, till, thro' their prosperity, some men gained a power above the laws. p. 120.
- Sect. 15. The empire of Rome perpetually decayed, when it fell into the hands of one man. p. 123.
- Sect. 16. The best governments of the world have been composed of monarchy, aristocracy and democracy. p. 130.
- Sect. 17. Good governments admit of changes in the superstructures, whilst the foundations remain unchangeable. p. 134.
- Sect. 18. Xenophon, in blaming the disorders of democracies, favours aristocracies not monarchies. p. 138.
- Sect. 19. That corruption and venality which is natural to courts, is seldom found in popular governments. p. 145.
- Sect. 20. Man's natural love to liberty is tempered by reason, which originally is his nature. p. 151.
- Sect. 21. Mixed and popular governments, preserve peace and manage wars, better than absolute monarchies. p. 154.
- Sect. 22. Commonwealths seek peace or war, according to the variety of their constitutions. p. 159.

Sect.

CONTENTS OF THE DISCOURSES.

- Sect. 23. That is the best government, which provides best for war. p. 165.
Sect. 24. Popular governments are less subject to civil disorders than monarchies; manage them more ably and more easily recover out of them. p. 172.
Sect. 25. Courts are more subject to venality and corruption than popular governments. p. 200.
Sect. 26. Civil tumults and wars are not the greatest evils that befall nations. p. 206.
Sect. 27. The mischiefs and cruelties proceeding from tyranny, are greater than any that can come from popular or mixed governments. p. 210.
Sect. 28. Men living under popular or mixed governments, are more careful of the public good than in absolute monarchies. p. 215.
Sect. 29. There is no assurance, that the distempers of a state shall be cured by the wisdom of a prince. p. 223.
Sect. 30. A monarchy cannot be well regulated, unless the powers of the monarch are limited by law. p. 229.
Sect. 31. The liberties of nations are from God and nature, not from kings. p. 242.
Sect. 32. The contracts made between magistrates and the nations that created them, were real, solemn and obligatory. p. 247.

C H A P. III

- Section 1. Kings, not being fathers of their people, nor excelling all others in virtue, can have no other just power than what the laws give; nor any title to the privileges of the Lord's anointed. p. 250.
Sect. 2. The kings of Israel and Judah were under a law not safely to be transgressed. p. 262.
Sect. 3. Samuel did not describe to the Israelites the glory of a free monarchy, but the evils the people should suffer; that he might divert them from desiring a king. p. 264.
Sect. 4. No people can be obliged to suffer from their kings what they have not a right to do. p. 266.
Sect. 5. The mischiefs suffered from wicked kings are such, as render it both reasonable and just for all nations that have virtue and power to exert both in repelling them. p. 270.
Sect. 6. It is not good for such nations as will have kings, to suffer them to be glorious, powerful, or abounding in riches. p. 273.
Sect. 7. When the Israelites asked for such a king as the nations about them had, they asked for a tyrant, though they did not call him so. p. 277.
Sect. 8. Under the name of tribute, no more is understood, than what the law of each nation gives to the supreme magistrate for the defraying of public charges; to which the customs of the Romans or sufferings of the Jews have no relation. p. 283.

Sect.

CONTENTS OF THE DISCOURSES.

- Sect. 9. Our own laws confirm to us the enjoyment of our native rights. p. 288.
- Sect. 10. The words of St. Paul, injoining obedience to higher powers, favour all sorts of government no less than monarchy. p. 292.
- Sect. 11. That which is not just is not law; and that which is not law ought not to be obeyed. p. 300.
- Sect. 12. The right and power of a magistrate depends upon his institution not upon his name. p. 302.
- Sect. 13. Laws were made to direct and instruct magistrates, and, if they will not be directed, to restrain them. p. 305.
- Sect. 14. Laws are not made by kings; not because they are busied in greater matters than doing justice, but because nations will be governed by rule and not arbitrarily. p. 309.
- Sect. 15. A general presumption that king's will govern well, is not a sufficient security to the people. p. 314.
- Sect. 16. The observation of the laws of nature is absurdly expected from tyrants, who set themselves up against all laws; and he that subjects kings to no other law than what is common to tyrants, destroys their being. p. 317.
- Sect. 17. Kings cannot be the interpreters of the oaths they take. p. 322.
- Sect. 18. The next in blood to deceased kings cannot generally be said to be kings till they are crowned. p. 330.
- Sect. 19. The greatest enemy of a just magistrate is he, who endeavours to invalidate the contract between him and the people, or to corrupt their manners. p. 341.
- Sect. 20. Unjust commands are not to be obeyed; and no man is obliged to suffer for not obeying such as are against law. p. 345.
- Sect. 21. It cannot be for the good of the people, that the magistrate have a power above the law: and he is not a magistrate who has not his power by law. p. 348.
- Sect. 22. The rigour of the law is to be temper'd by men of known integrity and judgment; and not by the prince, who may be ignorant or vicious. p. 354.
- Sect. 23. Aristotle proves, that no man is to be trusted with an absolute power, by shewing that no one knows how to execute it, but such a man as is not to be found. p. 358.
- Sect. 24. The power of Augustus Cæsar was not given but usurped. p. 360.
- Sect. 25. The regal power was not the first in this nation; nor necessarily to be continued though it had been the first. p. 361.
- Sect. 26. That the king may be entrusted with the power of chusing judges; yet that by which they act is from the law. p. 369.
- Sect. 27. Magna charta was not the original, but a declaration of the English liberties. The king's power is not restrained, but created by that
- H
- and

CONTENTS OF THE DISCOURSES.

- and other laws; and the nation that made them, can only correct the defects of them. p. 376.
- Sect. 28. The English nation has always been governed by itself or its representatives. p. 379.
- Sect. 29. The king was never master of the soil. p. 391.
- Sect. 30. Henry the First was king of England by as good a title as any of his predecessors or successors. p. 395.
- Sect. 31. Free nations have a right of meeting when and where they please, unless they deprive themselves of it. p. 399.
- Sect. 32. The powers of kings are so various, according to the constitutions of several states, that no consequence can be drawn to the prejudice or advantage of any one merely from the name. p. 404.
- Sect. 33. The liberty of a people is the gift of God and nature. p. 406.
- Sect. 34. No veneration paid or honour conferred upon a just and lawful magistrate, can diminish the liberty of a nation. p. 409.
- Sect. 35. The authority given by our law to the Acts performed by a king de facto, detract nothing from the people's right of creating whom they please. p. 411.
- Sect. 36. The general revolt of a nation cannot be called a rebellion. p. 413.
- Sect. 37. The English government was not ill constituted; the defects more lately observed proceeding from the change of manners and the corruption of the times. p. 418.
- Sect. 38. The power of calling and dissolving parliaments is not simply in the king. The variety of customs in chusing parliament-men and the errors a people may commit, neither prove that kings are or ought to be absolute. p. 421.
- Sect. 39. Those kings only are heads of the people, who are good, wise, and seek to advance no interest but that of the public. p. 426.
- Sect. 40. Good laws prescribe easy and safe remedies against the evils proceeding from the vices or infirmities of the magistrate; and when they fail, they must be supplied. p. 432.
- Sect. 41. The people for whom and by whom the magistrate is created, can only judge whether he rightly performs his office or not. p. 436.
- Sect. 42. The person that wears the crown cannot determine the affairs which the law refers to the king. p. 440.
- Sect. 43. Proclamations are not laws. p. 445.
- Sect. 44. No people that is not free can substitute delegates. p. 450.
- Sect. 45. The legislative power is always arbitrary, and not to be trusted in the hands of any who are not bound to obey the laws they make. p. 455.
- Sect. 46. The coercive power of the law proceeds from the authority of parliament. 457.
- *

DISCOURSES CONCERNING GOVERNMENT

DISCOURSES CONCERNING GOVERNMENT

DISCOURSES CONCERNING GOVERNMENT.

CHAP. I.

SECTION I.

INTRODUCTION.

HAVING lately seen a book, intituled "Patriarcha," written by Sir Robert Filmer, concerning the universal and undistinguished right of all kings, I thought a time of leisure might be well employed in examining his doctrine, and the questions arising from it; which seem so far to concern all mankind, that, besides the influence upon our future life, they may be said to comprehend all that in this world deserves to be cared for. If he say true, there is but one government in the world that can have any thing of justice in it: and those who have hitherto been esteemed the best and wisest of men, for having constituted commonwealths or kingdoms; and taken much pains so to proportion the powers of several magistracies, that they might all concur in procuring the public good; or so to divide the powers between the magistrates and people, that a well-regulated harmony might be preserved in the whole; were the most unjust and foolish of all men. They were not builders, but over-throwers of governments: their business was to set up aristocratical, democratical, or mixed governments, in opposition to that monarchy, which, by the immutable laws of God and nature, is imposed upon mankind; or presumptuously to put shackles upon the monarch, who, by the same laws, is to be absolute and uncontrouled: they were rebellious and disobedient sons, who rose up against their father; and not only refused

SECT. I.

CHAP. I. to hearken to his voice, but made him bend to their will. In their opinion, such only deserved to be called good men, who endeavoured to be good to mankind, or to that country to which they were more particularly related: and inasmuch as that good consists in a felicity of estate, and perfection of person, they highly valued such as had endeavoured to make men better, wiser, and happier. This they understood to be the end for which men entered into societies: and tho' Cicero says, that commonwealths were instituted for the obtaining of justice, he contradicts them not, but comprehends all in that word; because 'tis just, that whosoever receives a power, should employ it wholly for the accomplishment of the ends for which it was given. This work could be performed only by such as excelled in virtue: but lest they should deflect from it, no government was thought to be well constituted, unless the laws prevailed above the commands of men; and they were accounted as the worst of beasts, who did not prefer such a condition before a subjection to the fluctuating and irregular will of a man.

Potentiora
legum quam
hominum
imperia.
Liv. 1.2. c. 1.

If we believe Sir Robert, all this is mistaken. Nothing of this kind was ever left to the choice of men. They are not to inquire what conduces to their own good: God and nature have put us into a way from which we are not to swerve: we are not to live to him, nor to ourselves, but to the master that he hath set over us. One government is established over all, and no limits can be set to the power of the person that manages it. This is the prerogative, or, as another author of the same stamp calls it, "The royal charter" granted to kings by God. They all have an equal right to it: women and children are patriarchs; and the next in blood, without any regard to age, sex, or other qualities of the mind or body, are fathers of as many nations as fall under their power. We are not to examine, whether he or she be young or old, virtuous or vicious, sober-minded or stark-mad; the right and power is the same in all. Whether virtue be exalted or suppressed; whether he that bears the sword be a praise to those that do well, and a terror to those that do evil, or a praise to those that do evil, and a terror to such as do well, it concerns us not; for the king must not lose his right, nor have his power diminished, on any account. I have been sometimes apt to wonder, how things of this nature could enter into the head of any man: or, if no wickedness or folly be so great, but some may fall into it, I could not well conceive why they should publish it to the world. But these thoughts ceased when I considered, that a people from all ages in love with liberty, and desirous to maintain their own privileges, could never be brought to resign them; unless they were made to believe, that in conscience they ought to do it: which could not be, unless they were also persuaded to believe, that there was a law set to all mankind, which none might transgress, and which put the examination of all those matters out of their power. This is our author's work. By this it will appear whose throne he seeks to advance, and whose servant he is, whilst he pretends to serve the king. And that it may be evident he hath made use of means suitable to the ends proposed for the service of his great master, I hope to shew that he hath not used one argument that is not false, nor cited one author whom he hath not perverted perverted and abused: Whilst my work is so to lay open these snares, that the most simple may not be taken in them, I shall not examine how Sir Robert came to think himself a man fit to undertake so great a work, as to destroy the principles, which from the beginning seem to have been common to all mankind; but only weighing the positions and arguments that he alledgeth, will, if there be either truth or strength in them, confess the discovery comes from him that gave us least reason to expect it; and that, in spite of the ancients, there is not in the world a piece of wood, out of which a Mercury may not be made.

S E C T. II.

The common notions of liberty are not from school divines, but from nature.

IN the first lines of this book he seems to denounce war against mankind, endeavouring to overthrow the principle of liberty in which God created us, and which includes the chief advantages of the life we enjoy, as well as the greatest helps towards the felicity, that is the end of our hopes in the other. To this end he absurdly imputes to the school divines that which was taken up by them as a common notion, written in the heart of every man, denied by none, but such as were degenerated into beasts, from whence they might prove such points as of themselves were less evident. Thus did Euclid lay down certain axioms, which none could deny that did not renounce common sense, from whence he drew the proofs of such propositions as were less obvious to the understanding; and they may with as much reason be accused of paganism, who say that the whole is greater than a part, that two halves make the whole, or that a strait line is the shortest way from point to point, as to say, that they who in politics lay such foundations, as have been taken up by schoolmen and others as undeniable truths, do therefore follow them, or have any regard to their authority. Tho' the schoolmen were corrupt, they were neither stupid nor unlearned: they could not but see that which all men saw, nor lay more approved foundations, than, that man is naturally free; that he cannot justly be deprived of that liberty without cause; and that he doth not resign it, or any part of it, unless it be in consideration of a greater good, which he proposes to himself. But if he doth unjustly impute the invention of this to school divines, he in some measure repairs his fault in saying, "This hath been fostered by all succeeding papists for good divinity: the divines of the reformed churches have entertained it, and the common people every-where tenderly embrace it." That is to say, all christian divines, whether reformed or unreformed, do approve it, and the people every-where magnify it, as the height of human felicity. But Filmer, and such as are like him, being neither reformed nor unreformed christians, nor

CHAP. I. of the people, can have no title to christianity; and, inasmuch as they set themselves against that which is the height of human felicity, they declare themselves enemies to all that are concerned in it, that is, to all mankind.

But, says he, "they do not remember, that the desire of liberty was the first cause of the fall of man." And I desire it may not be forgotten, that the liberty asserted is not a licentiousness of doing what is pleasing to every one against the command of God; but an exemption from all human laws, to which they have not given their assent. If he would make us believe there was any thing of this in Adam's sin, he ought to have proved, that the law which he transgressed was imposed upon him by man, and, consequently, that there was a man to impose it; for it will easily appear, that neither the reformed or unreformed divines, nor the people following them, do place the felicity of man in an exemption from the laws of God, but in a most perfect conformity to them. Our Saviour taught us "not to fear such as could kill the body, but him that could kill, and cast into hell:" and the apostle tells us, that "we should obey God rather than man." It hath been ever hereupon observed, that they who most precisely adhere to the laws of God, are least solicitous concerning the commands of men, unless they are well grounded; and those who most delight in the glorious liberty of the sons of God, do not only subject themselves to him, but are most regular observers of the just ordinances of man, made by the consent of such as are concerned, according to the will of God.

The error of not observing this may perhaps deserve to be pardoned in a man that had read no books, as proceeding from ignorance; if such as are grossly ignorant can be excused, when they take upon them to write of such matters as require the highest knowledge: But in Sir Robert it is prevarication and fraud to impute to schoolmen and puritans that which in his first page he acknowledged to be the doctrine of all reformed and unreformed christian churches, and that he knows to have been the principle in which the Grecians, Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, Germans, and Britons, and all other generous nations ever lived, before the name of Christ was known in the world; inasmuch that the base effeminate Asiatics and Africans, for being careless of their liberty, or unable to govern themselves, were by Aristotle and other wise men called "slaves by nature," and looked upon as little different from beasts.

This which hath its root in common sense, not being to be overthrown by reason, he spares his pains of seeking any; but thinks it enough to render his doctrine plausible to his own party, by joining the Jesuits to Geneva, and coupling Buchanan to Doleman as both maintaining the same doctrine; tho' he might as well have joined the puritans with the Turks, because they all think that one and one makes two. But whoever marks the proceedings of Filmer and his masters, as well as his disciples, will rather believe, that they have learned from Rome and the Jesuits to hate Geneva, than that Geneva and Rome can agree in any thing farther than as they are obliged to submit to the evidence of truth; or that Geneva and Rome can concur in any design or interest that is not common to mankind.

"These

“ These men allowed to the people a liberty of deposing their princes. This SECT. 2. “ is a desperate opinion. Bellarmine and Calvin look askint at it.” But why is this a desperate opinion? If disagreements happen between king and people, why is it a more desperate opinion to think the king should be subject to the censures of the people, than the people subject to the will of the king? Did the people make the king, or the king make the people? Is the king for the people, or the people for the king? Did God create the Hebrews, that Saul might reign over them? or did they, from an opinion of procuring their own good, ask a king that might judge them, and fight their battles? If God’s interposition, which shall be hereafter explained, do alter the case, did the Romans make Romulus, Numa, Tullus Hostilius, and Tarquinius Priscus kings? or did they make or beget the Romans? If they were made kings by the Romans, ’tis certain they that made them fought their own good in so doing: and if they were made by and for the city and people, I desire to know, if it was not better, that when their successors departed from the end of their institution, by endeavouring to destroy it, or all that was good in it, they should be censured and ejected, than be permitted to ruin that people for whose good they were created? Was it more just that Caligula or Nero should be suffered to destroy the poor remains of the Roman nobility and people, with the nations subject to that empire, than that the race of such monsters should be extinguished, and a great part of mankind, especially the best, against whom they were most fierce, preserved by their deaths?

I presume our author thought these questions might be easily decided; and that no more was required to shew the fore-mentioned assertions were not all desperate, than to examine the grounds of them: but he seeks to divert us from this inquiry, by proposing the dreadful consequences of subjecting kings to the censures of their people; whereas no consequence can destroy any truth; and the worst of this is, that if it were received, some princes might be restrained from doing evil; or punished, if they will not be restrained. We are therefore only to consider, whether the people, senate, or any magistracy made by and for the people, have, or can have, such a right; for if they have, whatsoever the consequences may be, it must stand: and as the one tends to the good of mankind in restraining the lusts of wicked kings, the other exposes them without remedy to the fury of the most savage of all beasts. I am not ashamed in this to concur with Buchanan, Calvin, or Bellarmine; and without envy leave Filmer, and his associates, the glory of maintaining the contrary.

But notwithstanding our author’s aversion to truth, he confesses, “ That “ Hayward, Blackwood, Barclay, and others, who have bravely vindicated “ the right of kings in this point, do with one consent admit as an un- “ questionable truth, and assent unto the natural liberty and equality of man- “ kind, not so much as once questioning or opposing it.” And indeed I believe, that tho’ since the sin of our first parents the earth hath brought forth briars and brambles, and the nature of man hath been fruitful only in vice and wickedness; neither the authors he mentions, nor any others, have had impudence enough to deny such evident truth as seems to be planted in the hearts of CHAP. I. of all men; or to publish doctrines so contrary to common sense, virtue, and humanity, till these times. The production of Laud, Manwaring, Sibthorp, Hobbs, Filmer, and Heylin, seems to have been reserved as an additional curse to complete the shame and misery of our age and country. Those who had wit and learning, with something of ingenuity and modesty, tho' they believed, that nations might possibly make an ill use of their power, and were very desirous to maintain the cause of kings, as far as they could put any good colour upon it; yet never denied, that some had suffered justly (which could not be, if there were no power of judging them); nor ever asserted any thing that might arm them with an irresistible power of doing mischief, animate them to persist in the most flagitious courses, with assurance of perpetual impunity, or engage nations in an inevitable necessity of suffering all manner of outrages. They knew, that the actions of those princes, who were not altogether detestable, might be defended by particular reasons drawn from them, or the laws of their country; and would neither undertake the defence of such as were abominable, nor bring princes, to whom they wished well, into the odious extremity of justifying themselves by arguments that favoured Caligula and Nero, as well as themselves, and that must be taken for a confession, that they were as bad as could be imagined; since nothing could be said for them that might not as well be applied to the worst that had been, or could be. But Filmer, Heylin, and their associates, scorning to be restrained by such considerations, boldly lay the ax to the root of the tree, and rightly enough affirm, "That the whole fabric of that which they call popular iedition would fall to the ground, if the principle of natural liberty were removed." And on the other hand, it must be acknowledged, that the whole fabric of tyranny will be much weakened, if we prove, That nations have a right to make their own laws, constitute their own magistrates; and that such as are so constituted owe an account of their actions to those by whom, and for whom, they are appointed.

S E C T. III.

Implicit faith belongs to fools; and truth is comprehended by examining principles.

W Hilst Filmer's business is to overthrow liberty and truth, he, in his passage, modestly professeth "not to meddle with mysteries of state," or "arcana imperii." He renounces those inquiries thro' an implicit faith, which never entered into the head of any but fools, and such as, through a carelessness of the point in question, acted as if they were so. This is the foundation of the papal power; and it can stand no longer than those that compose the Roman church can be persuaded to submit their consciences to the word of the priests, and esteem themselves discharged from the necessity of searching searching the scriptures in order to know whether the things that are told them SECT. 3.

 are true or false. This may shew whether our author or those of Geneva do best agree with the Roman doctrine: but his instance is yet more sottish than his profession. "An implicit faith," says he, "is given to the meanest artificer." I wonder by whom! Who will wear a shoe that hurts him, because the shoemaker tells him it is well made? or who will live in a house that yields no defence against the extremities of weather, because the mason or carpenter assures him it is a very good house? Such as have reason, understanding, or common sense, will, and ought to make use of it in those things that concern themselves, and their posterity, and suspect the words of such as are interested in deceiving or persuading them not to see with their own eyes, that they may be more easily deceived. This rule obliges us so far to search into matters of state, as to examine the original principles of government in general, and of our own in particular. We cannot distinguish truth from falsehood, right from wrong, or know what obedience we owe to the magistrate, or what we may justly expect from him, unless we know what he is, why he is, and by whom he is made to be what he is. These perhaps may be called "mysteries of state," and some would persuade us they are to be esteemed
 "arcana;" but whosoever confesses himself to be ignorant of them must acknowledge that he is incapable of giving any judgment upon things relating to the superstructure; and in so doing evidently shews to others, that they ought not at all to hearken to what he says.

His argument to prove this is more admirable. "If an implicit faith," says he, "is given to the meanest artificer in his craft, much more to a prince in "the profound secrets of government." But where is the consequence? If I trust to the judgment of an artificer, or one of a more ingenuous profession, it is not because he is of it, but because I am persuaded he does well understand it, and that he will be faithful to me in things relating to his art. I do not send for Lower or Micklethwait when I am sick, nor ask the advice of Mainard or Jones in a suit of law, because the first are physicians, and the other lawyers; but because I think them wise, learned, diligent, and faithful, there being a multitude of others who go under the same name, whose opinion I would never ask. Therefore if any conclusion can be drawn from thence in favour of princes, it must be of such as have all the qualities of ability and integrity, that should create this confidence in me; or it must be proved, that all princes, inasmuch as they are princes, have such qualities.
 No general conclusion can be drawn from the first case, because it must depend upon the circumstances, which ought to be particularly proved: and if the other be asserted, I desire to know whether Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Vitellius, Domitian, Commodus, Heliogabalus, and others not unlike to them, had those admirable endowments, upon which an implicit faith ought to have been grounded; how they came by them; and whether we have any promise from God, that all princes should for ever excel in those virtues, or whether we by experience find that they do so. If they are or have been wanting in any, the whole falls to the ground; for no man enjoys as a prince that which is not common to all princes: and if every prince have not wisdom to understand these

CHAP. I. these profound secrets, integrity to direct him, according to what he knows to be good, and a sufficient measure of industry and valour to protect me, he is not the artificer, to whom the implicit faith is due. His eyes are as subject to dazle as my own. But it is a shame to insist on such a point as this. We see princes of all sorts; they are born as other men: the vilest flatterer dares not deny, that they are wise or foolish, good or bad, valiant or cowardly, like other men: and the crown doth neither bestow extraordinary qualities, ripen such as are found in princes sooner than in the meanest, nor preserve them from the decays of age, sickness, or other accidents, to which all men are subject: and if the greatest king in the world fall into them, he is as incapable of that mysterious knowledge, and his judgment is as little to be relied on, as that of the poorest peasant.

This matter is not mended by sending us to seek those virtues in the ministers, which are wanting in the prince. The ill effects of Rehoboam's folly could not be corrected by the wisdom of Solomon's counsellors: he rejected them; and such as are like to him will always do the same thing. Nero advised with none but musicians, players, chariot-drivers, or the abominable ministers of his pleasures and cruelties. Arcadius's senate was chiefly composed of buffoons and cooks, influenced by an old rascally eunuch. And it is an eternal truth, that a weak or wicked prince can never have a wise council, nor receive any benefit by one that is imposed upon him, unless they have a power of acting without him; which would render the government in effect aristocratical, and would probably displease our author as much as if it were so in name also. Good and wise counsellors do not grow up like mushrooms: great judgment is required in chusing and preparing them. If a weak or vicious prince should be so happy to find them chosen to his hand, they would avail him nothing. There will ever be variety of opinions amongst them; and he that is of a perverted judgment will always chuse the worst of those that are proposed, and favour the worst men, as most like to himself. Therefore, if this implicit faith be grounded upon a supposition of profound wisdom in the prince, the foundation is overthrown, and it cannot stand; for to repose confidence in the judgment and integrity of one that has none, is the most brutish of all follies. So that if a prince may have or want the qualities, upon which my faith in him can be rationally grounded, I cannot yield the obedience he requires, unless I search into the secrets relating to his person and commands, which he forbids. I cannot know how to obey, unless I know in what, and to whom: nor in what, unless I know what ought to be commanded: nor what ought to be commanded, unless I understand the original right of the commander, which is the great arcanum. Our author, finding himself involved in many difficulties, proposes an expedient as ridiculous as any thing that had gone before, being nothing more than an absurd begging the main question, and determining it without any shadow of proof. He enjoins an active or passive obedience, before he shews what should oblige or persuade us to it. This indeed were a compendious way of obviating that which he calls popular sedition, and of exposing all nations, that fall under the power of tyrants, to be destroyed utterly by them. Nero or Domitian would have desired no more,

more, than that those who would not execute their wicked commands, should SECT. 4.
 patiently have suffered their throats to be cut by such as were less scrupulous:
 and the world that had suffered those monsters for some years, must have continued under their fury, till all that was good and virtuous had been abolished. But in those ages and parts of the world, where there hath been any thing of virtue and goodness, we may observe a third sort of men, who would neither do villanies, nor suffer more than the laws did permit, or the consideration of the public peace did require. Whilst tyrants with their slaves, and the instruments of their cruelties, were accounted the dregs of mankind, and made the objects of detestation and scorn, these men, who delivered their countries from such plagues were thought to have something of divine in them, and have been famous above all the rest of mankind to this day. Of this sort were Pelopidas, Epaminondas, Thrasibulus, Harmodius, Aristogiton, Philopemen, Lucius Brutus, Publius Valerius, Marcus Brutus,
 C. Cassius, M. Cato, with a multitude of others amongst the ancient heathens.
 Such as were instruments of the like deliverances amongst the Hebrews, as Moses, Othniel, Ehud, Barak, Gideon, Samson, Jephthah, Samuel, David, Jehu, the Maccabees and others, have from the scriptures a certain testimony of the righteousness of their proceedings, when they neither would act what was evil, nor suffer more than was reasonable. But least we should learn by their examples, and the praises given to them, our author confines the subject's choice to acting or suffering, that is, doing what is commanded, or lying down to have his throat cut, or to see his family and country made desolate. This he calls giving to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's; whereas he ought to have considered, that the question is not whether that which is Cæsar's should be rendered to him, for that is to be done to all men; but who is Cæsar, and what doth of right belong to him, which he no way indicates to us: so that the question remains intire, as if he had never mentioned it, unless we do in a compendious way take his word for the whole.

S E C T. IV.

The rights of particular nations cannot subsist, if general principles contrary to them are received as true.

Notwithstanding this, our author, if we will believe him, "doth not "question or quarrel at the rights or liberties of this or any other "nation." He only denies they can have any such, in subjecting them necessarily and universally to the will of one man; and says not a word that is not applicable to every nation in the world, as well as to our own. But as the bitterness of his malice seems to be most especially directed against England, I am inclined to believe he hurts other countries only by accident, as the C famous

CHAP. I. famous * French lady intended only to poison her father, husband, brother, and some more of her nearest relations; but rather than they should escape, ^{* The Marchioness of Brinvilliers.} destroyed many other persons of quality, who at several times dined with them: and if that ought to excuse her, I am content he also should pass uncensured, though his crimes are incomparably greater than those for which she was condemned, or than any can be which are not of a public extent.

S E C T. V.

To depend upon the will of a man is slavery.

THIS, as he thinks, is farther sweetened, by asserting, that he doth not inquire what the rights of a people are, but from whence; not considering, that whilst he denies they can proceed from the laws of natural liberty, or any other root than the grace and bounty of the prince, he declares they can have none at all. For as liberty solely consists in an independency upon the will of another, and by the name of slave we understand a man, who can neither dispose of his person nor goods, but enjoys all at the will of his master: there is no such thing in nature as a slave, if those men or nations are not slaves, who have no other title to what they enjoy, than the grace of the prince, which he may revoke whensoever he pleaseth. But there is more than ordinary extravagance in his assertion, that "the greatest liberty in the world is for a people to live under a monarch," when his whole book is to prove, that this monarch hath his right from God and nature, is endowed with an unlimited power of doing what he pleaseth, and can be restrained by no law. If it be liberty to live under such a government, I desire to know what is slavery. It has been hitherto believed in the world, that the Assyrians, Medes, Arabs, Egyptians, Turks, and others like them, lived in slavery, because their princes were masters of their lives and goods: whereas the Grecians, Italians, Gauls, Germans, Spaniards, and Carthaginians, as long as they had any strength, virtue, or courage amongst them, were esteemed free nations, because they abhorred such a subjection. They were, and would be governed only by laws of their own making: "Potentiora erant legum quam hominum imperia." Even their princes had the authority or credit of persuading, rather than the power of commanding. But all this was mistaken; these men were slaves, and the Asiatics were freemen. By the same rule the Venetians, Switzers, Grisons, and Hollanders, are not free nations: but liberty in its perfection is enjoyed in France and Turkey. The intention of our ancestors was, without doubt, to establish this amongst us by magna charta, and other preceding or subsequent laws; but they ought to have added one clause, that the contents of them should be in force only so long as it should please the king. King Alfred, upon whose laws magna charta was grounded, when he said the English nation was as free as the internal thoughts of a man, did only mean, that it should be so as long as it pleased pleased their master. This it seems was the end of our law, and we who are born under it, and are descended from such as have so valiantly defended their rights against the encroachments of kings, have followed after vain shadows, and without the expence of sweat, treasure, or blood, might have secured their beloved liberty, by casting all into the king's hands.

Discourses concerning Government.

I 3

SECT. 5.

We owe the discovery of these secrets to our author, who, after having so gravely declared them, thinks no offence ought to be taken at the freedom he assumes of examining things relating to the liberty of mankind, because he hath the right which is common to all: but he ought to have considered, that in asserting that right to himself, he allows it to all mankind. And as the temporal good of all men consists in the preservation of it, he declares himself to be a mortal enemy to those who endeavour to destroy it. If he were alive, this would deserve to be answered with stones rather than words. He that oppugns the public liberty, overthrows his own, and is guilty of the most brutish of all follies, whilst he arrogates to himself that which he denies to all men.

I cannot but commend his modesty and care "not to detract from the worth of learned men." But it seems they were all subject to error, except himself, who is rendered infallible thro' pride, ignorance, and impudence. But if Hooker and Aristotle were wrong in their fundamentals concerning natural liberty, how could they be in the right when they built upon it? Or if they did mistake, how can they deserve to be cited? or rather, why is such care taken to pervert their sense? It seems our author is by their errors brought to the knowledge of the truth. "Men have heard of a dwarf standing upon the shoulders of a giant, who saw farther than the giant:" but now that the dwarf standing on the ground sees that which the giant did overlook, we must learn from him. If there be sense in this, the giant must be blind, or have such eyes only as are of no use to him. He minded only the things that were far from him. These great and learned men mistook the very principle and foundation of all their doctrine. If we will believe our author, this misfortune befel them because they too much trusted to the schoolmen. He names Aristotle; and, I presume, intends to comprehend Plato, Plutarch, Thucydides, Xenophon, Polybius, and all the ancient Grecians, Italians, and others, who asserted the natural freedom of mankind, only in imitation of the schoolmen, to advance the power of the pope; and would have compassed their design, if Filmer, and his associates, had not opposed them. These men had taught us to make the unnatural distinction between Royalist and Patriot, and kept us from seeing, "That the relation between king and people is so great, that their well-being is reciprocal." If this be true, how came Tarquin to think it good for him to continue king at Rome, when the people would turn him out? or the people to think it good for them to turn him out, when he desired to continue in? Why did the Syracusians destroy the tyranny of Dionysius, which he was not willing to leave, till he was pulled out by the heels? How could Nero think of burning Rome? Or why did Caligula wish the people had but one neck, that he might strike it off at one blow, if their welfare was thus reciprocal? 'Tis not enough to say, These were wicked or mad men; for other princes may be so

CHAP. I. also; and there may be the same reason of differing from them. For if the proposition be not universally true, 'tis not to be received as true in relation to any, till it be particularly proved; and then 'tis not to be imputed to the quality of prince, but to the personal virtue of the man.

I do not find any great matters in the passages taken out of Bellarmine, which, our author says comprehend the strength of all that ever he had heard, read, or seen produced for the natural liberty of the subject: but he not mentioning where they are to be found, I do not think myself obliged to examine all his works, to see whether they are rightly cited or not: however, there is certainly nothing new in them: we see the same, as to the substance, in those who wrote many ages before him, as well as in many that have lived since his time, who neither minded him, nor what he had written. I dare not take upon me to give an account of his works, having read few of them: but, as he seems to have laid the foundation of his discourses in such common notions as were assented to by all mankind, those who follow the same method have no more regard to jesuitism and popery, tho' he was a jesuit and cardinal, than they who agree with Faber, and other jesuits, in the principles of geometry, which no sober man did ever deny.

S E C T. VI.

God leaves to man the choice of forms in government;
and those who constitute one form may abrogate it.

BUT Sir Robert "desires to make observations on Bellarmine's words, " before he examines or refutes them." And indeed it were not possible to make such stuff of his Doctrine as he does, if he had examined or did understand it. First, he very wittily concludes, " That if, by " the law of God, the power be immediately in the people, God is the author " of a democracy." And why not, as well as of a tyranny? Is there any thing in it repugnant to the being of God? Is there more reason to impute to God Caligula's monarchy, than the democracy of Athens? Or is it more for the glory of God, to assert his presence with the Ottoman or French monarchs, than with the popular governments of the Switzers and Grisons? Is pride, malice, luxury, and violence so suitable to his being, that they who exercise them are to be reputed his ministers? And is modesty, humility, equality, and justice so contrary to his nature, that they who live in them should be thought his enemies? Is there any absurdity in saying, that since God in goodness and mercy to mankind hath, with an equal Hand, given to all the benefit of liberty, with some measure of understanding how to employ it, 'tis lawful for any nation, as occasion shall require, to give the exercise of that power to one or more men, under certain limitations and conditions; or to retain it to themselves, if they think it good for them? If this may be done, we are at an end of all controversies concerning one form of government established blished by God, to which all mankind must submit; and we may safely con-clude, that having given to all men, in some degree, a capacity of judging what is good for themselves, he hath granted to all likewise a liberty of inventing such forms as please them best, without favouring one more than another. SECT. 6.

His second observation is grounded upon a falsity in matter of fact. Bellarmine does not say, that democracy is an ordinance of God more than any other government; nor that the people have no power to make use of their right; but that they do, that is to say ordinarily, transmit the exercise of it to one or more. And it is certain they do sometimes, especially in small cities, retain it in themselves. But whether that were observed or not by Bellarmine, makes nothing to our cause, which we defend, and not him.

The next point is subtle; and he thinks thereby to have brought Bellarmine, and such as agree with his principle, to a nonplus. He doubts who shall judge of the lawful cause of changing the government; and says, It is a "pestilent conclusion to place that power in the multitude." But why should this be esteemed pestilent? or to whom? If the allowance of such a power to the senate was pestilent to Nero, it was beneficial to mankind; and the denial of it, which would have given to Nero an opportunity of continuing in his villainies, would have been pestilent to the best men, whom he endeavoured to destroy, and to all others that received benefit from them. But this question depends upon another: for if governments are constituted for the pleasure, greatness, or profit of one man, he must not be interrupted; for the opposing of his will, is to overthrow the institution. On the other side, if the good of the governed be sought, care must be taken that the end be accomplished, tho' it be with the prejudice of the governor. If the power be originally in the multitude, and one or more men, to whom the exercise of it, or a part of it, was committed, had no more than their brethren, till it was conferred on him or them, it cannot be believed, that rational creatures would advance one or a few of their equals above themselves, unless in consideration of their own good; and then I find no inconvenience in leaving to them a right of judging, whether this be duly performed or not. We say in general, "He that institutes, may also abrogate;" most especially when the institution is not only by, but for himself. If the multitude therefore do institute, the multitude may abrogate; and they themselves, or those who succeed in the same right, can only be fit judges of the performance of the ends of the institution. Our author may perhaps say, The public peace may be hereby disturbed: but he ought to know, There can be no peace, where there is no justice; nor any justice, if the government instituted for the good of a nation be turned to its ruin. But in plain English, the inconvenience with which such as he endeavour to affright us, is no more than that he or they, to whom the power is given, may be restrained or chastised, if they betray their trust; which I presume will displease none, but such as would rather subject Rome, with the best part of the world depending upon it, to the will of Caligula or Nero, than Caligula or Nero to the judgment of the senate and people; that is, rather to expose many great and brave nations to be destroyed by the rage of

Cujus est instituire, ejus est abrogare.

CHAP. I. of a savage beast, than subject that beast to the judgment of all, or the choicest men of them, who can have no interest to pervert them, or other reason to be severe to him, than to prevent the mischiefs he would commit, and to save the people from ruin.

In the next place he recites an argument of Bellarmine, That "it is evident in Scripture God hath ordained powers; but God hath given them to no particular person, because by nature all men are equal; therefore he hath given power to the people or multitude." I leave him to untie that knot, if he can; but, as it is usual with impostors, he goes about by surmises to elude the force of his argument, pretending that in some other place he had contradicted himself, and acknowledged that every man was prince of his posterity; "because, that if many men had been created together, they ought all to have been princes of their posterity." But it is not necessary to argue upon passages cited from authors, when he that cites them may be justly suspected of fraud, and neither indicates the place nor treatise, lest it should be detected; most especially when we are no-way concerned in the authors credit. I take Bellarmine's first argument to be strong; and if he in some place did contradict it, the hurt is only to himself: but in this particular I should not think he did it, tho' I were sure our author had faithfully repeated his words; for in allowing every man to be prince of his posterity, he only says, every man should be chief in his own family, and have a power over his children, which no man denies: but he does not understand Latin, who thinks that the word "princeps" doth in any degree signify an absolute power, or a right of transmitting it to his heirs and successors, upon which the doctrine of our author wholly depends. On the contrary, The same law that gave to my father a power over me, gives me the like over my children; and if I had a thousand brothers, each of them would have the same over their children. Bellarmine's first argument therefore being no-way enervated by the alledged passage, I may justly insist upon it, and add, That God hath not only declared in Scripture, but written on the heart of every man, that as it is better to be cloathed, than to go naked; to live in a house, than to lie in the fields; to be defended by the united force of a multitude, than to place the hopes of his security solely in his own strength; and to prefer the benefits of society, before a savage and barbarous solitude; he also taught them to frame such societies, and to establish such laws as were necessary to preserve them. And we may as reasonably affirm, that mankind is for ever obliged to use no other cloaths than leather breeches, like Adam; to live in hollow trees, and eat acorns, or to seek after the model of his house for a habitation, and to use no arms except such as were known to the patriarchs, as to think that all nations for ever obliged to be governed as they governed their families. This I take to be the genuine sense of the scripture, and the most respectful way of interpreting the places relating to our purpose. It is hard to imagine, that God, who hath left all things to our choice, that are not evil in themselves, should tie us up in this; and utterly incredible that he should impose upon us a necessity of following his will, without declaring it to us. Instead of constituting a government over his people, consisting of many parts, which we take

take to be a model fit to be imitated by others, he might have declared in a SECT. 7. word, that the eldest man of the eldest line should be king; and that his will ought to be their law. This had been more suitable to the goodness and mercy of God, than to leave us in a dark labyrinth, full of precipices; or rather, to make the government given to his own people, a false light to lead us to destruction. This could not be avoided, if there were such a thing as our author calls a "lord paramount over his childrens children to all generations." We see nothing in scripture, of precept or example, that is not utterly abhorrent to this chimera. The only sort of kings mentioned there with approbation, is such a one "as may not raise his heart above his brethren." If God had constituted a lord paramount with an absolute Deut. xvii. power, and multitudes of nations were to labour and fight for his greatness and pleasure, this were to raise his heart to a height, that would make him forget he was a man. Such as are versed in scripture, not only know, that it neither agrees with the letter or spirit of that book; but that it is unreasonable in itself, unless he were of a species different from the rest of mankind. His exaltation would not agree with God's indulgence to his creatures, tho' he were the better for it; much less when probably he would be made more unhappy, and worse, by the pride, luxury, and other vices, that always attend the highest fortunes. It is no less incredible, that God, who disposes all things in wisdom and goodness, and appoints a due place for all, should, without distinction, ordain such a power, to every one succeeding in such a line, as cannot be executed; the wise would refuse, and fools cannot take upon them the burden of it, without ruin to themselves, and such as are under them: or expose mankind to a multitude of other absurdities and mischiefs; subjecting the aged to be governed by children; the wise, to depend on the will of fools; the strong and valiant, to expect defence from the weak or cowardly; and all in general to receive justice from him, who neither knows nor cares for it.

S E C T. VII.

Abraham and the patriarchs were not kings.

IF any man say, that we are not to seek into the depth of God's counsels; I answer, that if he had, for reasons known only to himself, affixed such a right to any one line, he would have set a mark upon those who come of it, that nations might know to whom they owe subjection; or given some testimony of his presence with Filmer and Heylin, if he had sent them to reveal so great a mystery. Till that be done, we may safely look upon them as the worst of men, and teachers only of lyes and follies. This persuades me little, to examine what would have been, if God had at once created many men, or the conclusions that can be drawn from Adam's having been alone. For nothing can be more evident, than that if many had been

CHAP. I. been created, they had been all equal, unless God had given a preference to one. All their sons had inherited the same right after their death; and no dream was ever more empty, than his whimsy of Adam's kingdom, or that of the ensuing patriarchs. To say the truth, it is hard to speak seriously of Abraham's kingdom, or to think any man to be in earnest who mentions it. He was a stranger, and a pilgrim in the land where he lived, and pretended to no authority beyond his own family, which consisted only of a wife and slaves. He lived with Lot as with his equal, and would have no contest with him, because they were brethren. His wife and servants could neither make up, nor be any part of a kingdom, inasmuch as the despotical government, both in practice and principle, differs from the regal. If his kingdom was to be grounded on the paternal right, it vanished away of itself; he had no child: Eliezer of Damascus, for want of a better, was to be his heir: Lot, tho' his nephew, was excluded: he durst not own his own wife: he had not one foot of land, till he bought a field for a burying place: his three hundred and eighteen men were servants (bought according to the custom of those days), or their children; and the war he made with them, was like to Gideon's enterprize; which shews only that God can save by a few as well as by many, but makes nothing to our author's purpose. For if they had been as many in number as the army of Semiramis, they could have no relation to the regal, much less to the paternal power; for a father doth not buy, but beget children.

Notwithstanding this, our author bestows the proud title of lord paramount upon him, and transmits it to Isaac, who was indeed a king like his father, great, admirable, and glorious in wisdom and holiness, but utterly void of all worldly splendor or power. This spiritual kingdom was inherited by Jacob, whose title to it was not founded on prerogative of birth, but election, and peculiar grace; but he never enjoyed any other worldly inheritance, than the field and cave which Abraham had bought for a burying place, and the goods he had gained in Laban's service.

The example of Judah's sentence upon Thamar is yet farther from the purpose, if it be possible; for he was then a member of a private family, the fourth son of a father then living; neither in possession, nor under the promise of the privileges of primogeniture, tho' Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, fell from it by their sins. Whatsoever therefore the right was, which belonged to the head of the family, it must have been in Jacob; but as he professed himself a keeper of sheep, as his fathers had been, the exercise of that employment was so far from regal, that it deserves no explication. If that act of Judah is to be imputed to a royal power, I have as much as I ask: he, tho' living with his father, and elder brothers, when he came to be of age to have children, had the same power over such, as were of, or came into his family, as his father had over him; for none can go beyond the power of life and death: the same, in the utmost extent, cannot at the same time equally belong to many. If it be divided equally, it is no more than that universal liberty which God hath given to mankind, and every man is a king, till he divest himself of his right, in consideration of something that he thinks better for him.

S E C T. VIII.

Nimrod was the first king, during the life of Cush, Cham, Shem, and Noah.

THE creation is exactly described in the scripture; but we know so little of what passed between the finishing of it and the flood, that our author may say what he pleases, and I may leave him to seek his proofs where he can find them. In the mean time I utterly deny, that any power did remain in the heads of families after the flood, that does in the least degree resemble the regal in principle or practice. If in this I am mistaken, such power must have been in Noah, and transmitted to one of his sons. The scripture says only, that he built an altar, sacrificed to the Lord, was a husbandman, planted a vineyard, and performed such offices as bear nothing of the image of a king, for the space of three hundred and fifty years. We have reason to believe, that his sons after his death continued in the same manner of life, and the equality properly belonging to brethren. It is not easy to determine, whether Shem or Japhet were the elder; but Ham is declared to be the younger; and Noah's blessing to Shem seems to be purely prophetic and spiritual, of what should be accomplished in his posterity; with which Japhet should be persuaded to join. If it had been worldly, the whole earth must have been brought under him, and have for ever continued in his race, which never was accomplished, otherwise than in the spiritual kingdom of Christ, which relates not to our author's lord paramount. Gen. ix.

As to earthly kings, the first of them was Nimrod, the sixth son of Cush the son of Ham, Noah's younger and accursed son. This kingdom was set up about a hundred and thirty years after the flood, whilst Cush, Ham, Shem, and Noah, were yet living; whereas if there were any thing of truth in our author's proposition, all mankind must have continued under the government of Noah whilst he lived; and that power must have been transmitted to Shem, who lived about three hundred and seventy years after the erection of Nimrod's kingdom; and must have come to Japhet, if he was the elder; but could never come to Cham, who is declared to have been certainly the younger, and condemned to be a servant to them both; much less to the younger son of his son, whilst he, and those to whom he and his posterity were to be subjects, were still living.

This rule therefore, which the partizans of absolute monarchy fancy to be universal and perpetual, falling out in its first beginning, directly contrary to what they assert; and being never known to have been recovered; were enough to silence them, if they had any thing of modesty, or regard to truth. But the matter may be carried farther: for the scripture doth not only testify, that this kingdom of Nimrod was an usurpation, void of all right, proceeding from the most violent and mischievous vices, but exercised with the utmost

CHAP. I.  fury, that the most wicked man of the accursed race, who set himself up against God, and all that is good, could be capable of. The progress of this kingdom was suitable to its institution: that which was begun in wickedness, was carried on with madness, and produced confusion. The mighty hunter, whom the best interpreters call a cruel tyrant, receding from the simplicity and innocence of the patriarchs, who were husbandmen or shepherds, arrogating to himself a dominion over Shem, to whom he and his fathers were to be servants, did thereby so peculiarly become the heir of God's curse, that whatsoever hath been said to this day, of the power that did most directly set itself against God and his people, hath related literally to the Babel that he built, or figuratively to that which resembles it in pride, cruelty, injustice, and madness.

But the shameless rage of some of these writers is such, that they rather chuse to ascribe the beginning of their idol to this odious violence, than to own it from the consent of a willing people; as if they thought, that as all action must be suitable to its principle, so that which is unjust in its practice, ought to scorn to be derived from that which is not detestable in its principle. It is hardly worth our pains to examine whether the nations, that went from Babel after the confusion of languages, were more or less than seventy-two, for they seem not to have gone according to families, but every one to have associated himself to those that understood his speech; and the chief of the fathers, as Noah and his sons, were not there, or were subject to Nimrod; each of which points doth destroy, even in the root, all pretence to paternal government. Besides, it is evident in scripture, that Noah lived three hundred and fifty years after the flood; Shem five hundred; Abraham was born about two hundred and ninety years after the flood, and lived one hundred seventy-five years: he was therefore born under the government of Noah, and died under that of Shem: he could not therefore exercise a regal power whilst he lived, for that was in Shem: so that in leaving his country, and setting up a family for himself that never acknowledged any superior, and never pretending to reign over any other, he fully shewed he thought himself free, and to owe subjection to none: and, being as far from arrogating to himself any power upon the title of paternity, as from acknowledging it in any other, left every one to the same liberty.

The punctual enumeration of the years, that the fathers of the holy seed lived, gives us ground of making a more than probable conjecture, that they of the collateral lines were, in number of days, not unequal to them; and if that be true, Ham and Cush were alive when Nimrod set himself up to be king. He must therefore have usurped this power over his father, grandfather, and great grandfather; or, which is more probable, he turned into violence and oppression the power given to him by a multitude; which, like a flock without a shepherd, not knowing whom to obey, set him up to be their chief. I leave to our author the liberty of chusing which of these two doth best suit with his paternal monarchy; but as far as I can understand, the first is directly against it, as well as against the laws of God and man; the other, being from the consent of the multitude, cannot be extended farther than they would would have it, nor turned to their prejudice, without the most abominable SECT. 8. ingratitude and treachery, from whence no right can be derived, nor any { justifiable example taken.

Nevertheless, if our author resolve that Abraham was also a king, he must presume that Shem did emancipate him, before he went to seek his fortune. This was not a kingly posture; but I will not contradict him, if I may know over whom he reigned. Paternal monarchy is exercised by the father of the family over his descendents, or such as had been under the dominion of him, whose heir he is. But Abraham had neither of these: those of his nearest kindred continued in Mesopotamia, as appears by what is said of Bethuel and Laban. He had only Lot with him, over whom he pretended no right: he had no children till he was an hundred years old (that is to say, he was a king without a subject); and then he had but one. I have heard, that * “sovereigns do impatiently bear competitors;” but now I find subjection also doth * Omnisque potestas impatiens confortis erit. Lucan. l. 1. v. 92.
admit of none. Abraham’s kingdom was too great when he had two children; and, to disburden it, Ishmael must be expelled soon after the birth of Isaac. He observed the same method after the death of Sarah: he had children by Keturah; but he gave them gifts, and sent them away, leaving Isaac like a stoical king reigning in and over himself, without any other subject till the birth of Jacob and Esau. But his kingdom was not to be of a larger extent than that of his father: the two twins could not agree: Jacob was sent away by his mother; he reigned over Esau only, and it is not easy to determine who was the heir of his worldly kingdom; for tho’ Jacob had the birthright, we do not find he had any other goods, than what he had gotten in Laban’s service. If our author say true, the right of primogeniture, with the dominion perpetually annexed by the laws of God and nature, must go to the eldest: Isaac therefore, tho’ he had not been deceived, could not have conferred it upon the younger; for man cannot overthrow what God and nature have instituted. Jacob, in the court language, had been a double rebel, in beguiling his father, and supplanting his brother. The blessing of being lord over his brethren could not have taken place. Or if Isaac had power, and his act was good, the prerogative of the elder is not rooted in the law of God or nature, but is a matter of conveniency only, which may be changed at the will of the father, whether he know what he does or not. But if this paternal right to dominion were of any value, or dominion over men were a thing to be desired, why did Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, content themselves with such a narrow territory, when, after the death of their ancestors, they ought, according to that rule, to have been lords of the world? All authors conclude, that Shem was the eldest by birth, or preferred by the appointment of God, so as the right must have been in him, and from him transmitted to Abraham and Isaac; but if they were so possessed with the contemplation of a heavenly kingdom, as not to care for the greatest on earth; it is strange, that Esau, whose modesty is not much commended, should so far forget his interest, as neither to lay claim to the empire of the world, nor dispute with his brother the possession of the field and cave bought by Abraham, but rather to fight for a dwelling on mount Seir, that was neither possessed by, nor promised to his fathers.

CHAP. I. fathers. If he was fallen from his right, Jacob might have claimed it: but God was his inheritance; and, being assured of his blessing, he contented himself with what he could gain by his industry, in a way that was not at all suitable to the pomp and majesty of a king. Which way soever therefore the business be turned, whether, according to Isaac's blessing, Esau should serve Jacob, or our author's opinion, Jacob must serve Esau; neither of the two was effected in their persons: and the kingdom of two being divided into two, each of them remained lord of himself.

S E C T. IX.

The power of a father belongs only to a father.

THIS leads us to an easy determination of the question, which our author thinks insoluble? "If Adam was lord of his children, he doth not see how any can be free from the subjection of his parents." For as no good man will ever desire to be free from the respect that is due to his father, who did beget and educate him, no wise man will ever think the like to be due to his brother or nephew, that did neither. If Esau and Jacob were equally free; if Noah, as our author affirms, divided Europe, Asia, and Africa, amongst his three sons, tho' he cannot prove it; and if seventy-two nations under so many heads or kings went from Babylon to people the earth, about a hundred and thirty years after the flood, I know not why, according to the same rule and proportion, it may not be safely concluded, that in four thousand years kings are so multiplied, as to be in number equal to the men that are in the world; that is to say, they are, according to the laws of God and nature, all free, and independent upon each other, as Shem, Ham, and Japhet were. And therefore, tho' Adam and Noah had reigned alone, when there were no men in the world, except such as issued from them, that is no reason why any other should reign over those that he hath not begotten. As the right of Noah was divided amongst the children he left, and when he was dead, no one of them depended on the other, because no one of them was father of the other; and the right of a father can only belong to him that is so; the like must for ever attend every other father in the world. This paternal power must necessarily accrue to every father: he is a king by the same right as the sons of Noah; and how numerous soever families may be upon the increase of mankind, they are all free, till they agree to recede from their own right, and join together in or under one government, according to such laws as best please themselves.

S E C T. X.

Such as enter into society, must in some degree diminish their liberty.

REASON leads them to this: no one man or family is able to provide that which is requisite for their convenience or security, whilst every one has an equal right to every thing, and none acknowledges a superior to determine the controversies, that upon such occasions must continually arise, and will probably be so many and great, that mankind cannot bear them. Therefore tho' I do not believe, that Bellarmine said, a commonwealth could not exercise its power; for he could not be ignorant, that Rome and Athens did exercise theirs, and that all the regular kingdoms in the world are commonwealths; yet there is nothing of absurdity in saying, that man cannot continue in the perpetual and entire fruition of the liberty that God hath given him. The liberty of one is thwarted by that of another; and whilst they are all equal, none will yield to any, otherwise than by a general consent. This is the ground of all just governments; for violence or fraud can create no right; and the same consent gives the form to them all, how much soever they differ from each other. Some small numbers of men, living within the precincts of one city, have as it were, cast into a common stock, the right which they had of governing themselves and children, and by common consent joining in one body, exercised such power over every single person as seemed beneficial to the whole; and this men call perfect "democracy." Others chose rather to be governed by a select number of such as most excelled in wisdom and virtue; and this, according to the signification of the word, was called "aristocracy:" or when one man excelled all others, the government was put into his hands under the name of "monarchy." But the wisest, best, and far the greatest part of mankind, rejecting these simple species, did form governments mixed or composed of the three, as shall be proved hereafter, which commonly received their respective denomination from the part that prevailed, and did deserve praise or blame, as they were well or ill proportioned.

It were a folly hereupon to say, that the liberty for which we contend, is of no use to us, since we cannot endure the solitude, barbarity, weakness, want, misery, and dangers, that accompany it whilst we live alone, nor can enter into a society without resigning it; for the choice of that society, and the liberty of framing it according to our own wills, for our own good, is all we seek. This remains to us whilst we form governments, that we ourselves are judges how far it is good for us to recede from our natural liberty; which is of so great importance, that from thence only we can know whether we are free-men or slaves; and the difference between the best government and the worst, doth wholly depend upon a right or wrong exercise of that power. If men are

CHAP. I. are naturally free, such as have wisdom and understanding will always frame { good governments: but if they are born under the necessity of a perpetual slavery, no wisdom can be of use to them; but all must for ever depend on the will of their lords, how cruel, mad, proud, or wicked, soever they be.

S E C T. XI.

No man comes to command many, unless by consent or by force.

BUT because I cannot believe God hath created man in such a state of misery and slavery as I just now mentioned; by discovering the vanity of our author's whimsical patriarchal kingdom, I am led to a certain conclusion, that every father of a family is free and exempt from the domination of any other, as the seventy-two that went from Babel were. It is hard to comprehend how one man can come to be master of many, equal to himself in right, unless it be by consent, or by force. If by consent, we are at an end of our controversies: governments, and the magistrates that execute them, are created by man. They who give a being to them, cannot but have a right of regulating, limiting, and directing them as best pleaseth themselves; and all our author's assertions concerning the absolute power of one man, fall to the ground: if by force, we are to examine how it can be possible or justifiable.
 This subduing by force we call conquest; but as he that forceth must be stronger than those that are forced, to talk of one man who in strength exceeds many millions of men, is to go beyond the extravagance of fables and romances. This wound is not cured by saying, that he first conquers one, and then more, and with their help others; for as to matter of fact, the first news we hear of Nimrod is, that he reigned over a great multitude, and built vast cities; and we know of no kingdom in the world, that did not begin with a greater number than any one man could possibly subdue. If they who chose one to be their head, did under his conduct subdue others, they were fellow-conquerors with him; and nothing can be more brutish, than to think, that by their virtue and valour they had purchased perpetual slavery to themselves, and their posterity. But if it were possible, it could not be justifiable; and whilst our dispute is concerning right, that which ought not to be is no more to be received, than if it could not be. No right can come by conquest, unless there were a right of making that conquest, which, by reason of the equality that our author confesses to have been amongst the heads of families, and as I have proved goes into infinity, can never be on the aggressor's side.
 No man can justly impose any thing upon those who owe him nothing. Our author therefore, who "ascribes the enlargement of Nimrod's kingdom to "usurpation and tyranny," might as well have acknowledged the same in the beginning, as he says all other authors have done. However, he ought not

not to have imputed to Sir Walter Raleigh an approbation of his right, as lord SECT. 12.
 or king over his family; for he could never think him to be a lord by the right of a father, who by that rule must have lived and died a slave to his fathers that over-lived him. Whosoever therefore like Nimrod grounds his pretensions of right upon usurpation and tyranny, declares himself to be, like Nimrod, an usurper and a tyrant, that is, an enemy to God and man, and to have no right at all. That which was unjust in its beginning, can of itself never change its nature. "Tempus in se," saith Grotius, "nullam habet vim ef"fectricem." He that persists in doing injustice, aggravates it, and takes upon Lib. 2. c. 4.
 himself all the guilt of his predecessors. But if there be a king in the world, § 1.
 that claims a right by conquest, and would justify it, he might do well to tell Duratio whom he conquered, when, with what assistance, and upon what reason he temporis na-undertook the war; for he can ground no title upon the obscurity of an un- tutam rei searchable antiquity; and if he does it not, he ought to be looked upon as an non immuusurping Nimrod. tat. Lib. 1.
c. 3. § 11.
n. 2.

S E C T. XII.

The pretended paternal right is divisible or indivisible: if divi-fible, it is extinguished; if indivisible, universal.

THIS paternal right to regality, if there be any thing in it, is divisible or indivisible; if indivisible, as Adam hath but one heir, one man is rightly lord of the whole world, and neither Nimrod nor any of his successors could ever have been kings, nor the seventy-two that went from Babylon: Noah survived him near two hundred years: Shem continued one hundred and fifty years longer. The dominion must have been in him, and by him transmitted to his posterity for ever. Those that call themselves kings in all other nations, set themselves up against the law of God and nature: this is the man we are to seek out, that we may yield obedience to him. I know not where to find him; but he must be of the race of Abraham. Shem was preferred before his brethren: the inheritance that could not be divided must come to him, and from him to Isaac, who was the first of his descendents that outlived him.
 It is pity that Jacob did not know this, and that the lord of all the earth, through ignorance of his title, should be forced to keep one of his subjects sheep for wages; and strange, that he who had wit enough to supplant his brother, did so little understand his own bargain, as not to know, that he had bought the perpetual empire of the world. If in conscience he could not take such a price for a dish of pottage, it must remain in Esau: however, our lord paramount must come from Isaac. If the deed of sale made by Esau be good, we must seek him amongst the Jews: if he could not easily divest himself of his right, it must remain amongst his descendants, who are Turks.
 We need not scruple the reception of either, since the late Scots act tells us,
 "that

CHAP. I. “ that kings derive their royal power from God alone; and no difference of religion, &c. can divert the right of succession.” But I know not what we shall do, if we cannot find this man; for “de non apparentibus & non existentibus eadem est ratio.” The right must fall if there be none to inherit: if we do not know who he is that hath the right, we do not know who is near to him: all mankind must inherit the right, to which every one hath an equal title; and that which is dominion, if in one, when it is equally divided among all men, is that universal liberty which I assert. Wherefore I leave it to the choice of such as have inherited our author’s opinions, to produce this Jew or Turk that ought to be lord of the whole earth, or to prove a better title in some other person, and to persuade all the princes and nations of the world to submit: if this be not done, it must be confessed this paternal right is a mere whimsical fiction, and that no man by birth hath a right above another, or can have any, unless by the concession of those who are concerned.

If this right to an universal empire be divisible, Noah did actually divide it among his three sons: seventy-and-two absolute monarchs did at once arise out of the multitude that had assembled at Babel: Noah, nor his sons, nor any of the holy seed, nor probably any elder than Nimrod having been there, many other monarchs must necessarily have arisen from them. Abraham, as our Author says, was a king: Lot must have been so also; for they were equals: his sons Ammon and Moab had no dependence upon the descendents of Abraham. Ismael and Esau set up for themselves, and great nations came of them: Abraham’s sons by Keturah did so also; that is to say, every one, as soon as he came to be of age to provide for himself, did so, without retaining any dependence upon the stock from whence he came: those of that stock, or the head of it, pretended to no right over those who went from him. Nay, nearness in blood was so little regarded, that tho’ Lot was Abraham’s brother’s son, Eliezer his servant had been his heir, if he had died childless. The like continued amongst Jacob’s sons; no jurisdiction was given to one above the rest: an equal division of land was made amongst them: their judges and magistrates were of several tribes and families, without any other preference of one before another, than what did arise from the advantages God had given to any particular person. This I take to be a proof of the utmost extent and certainty, that the equality amongst mankind was then perfect: he therefore that will deny it to be so now, ought to prove, that neither the prophets, patriarchs, or any other men, did ever understand or regard the law delivered by God and nature to mankind; or that having been common and free at the first, and so continued for many hundreds of years after the flood, it was afterwards abolished, and a new one introduced. He that asserts this must prove it; but till it does appear to us, when, where, how, and by whom this was done, we may safely believe there is no such thing; and that no man is or can be a lord amongst us, till we make him so; and that by nature we are all brethren.

Our author, by endeavouring farther to illustrate the patriarchal power, destroys it, and cannot deny to any man the right which he acknowledges to have been in Ismael and Esau. But if every man hath a right of setting up for himself himself with his family, or before he has any, he cannot but have a right SECT. 13.

of joining with others if he pleases. As his joining or not joining with others, and the choice of those others, depends upon his own will, he cannot but have a right of judging upon what conditions it is good for him to enter into such a society, as must necessarily hinder him from exercising the right which he has originally in himself. But as it cannot be imagined, that men should generally put such fetters upon themselves, unless it were in expectation of a greater good that was thereby to accrue to them, no more can be required to prove, that they do voluntarily enter into these societies, institute them for their own good, and prescribe such rules and forms to them as best please themselves, without giving account to any. But if every man be free, till he enter into such a society as he chuseth for his own good, and those societies may regulate themselves as they think fit; no more can be required to prove the natural equality in which all men are born, and continue, till they resign it as into a common stock, in such measure as they think fit for the constituting of societies for their own good, which I assert, and our author denies.

S E C T. XIII.

There was no shadow of a paternal kingdom amongst the Hebrews, nor precept for it.

OUR author is so modest to confess, that Jacob's kingdom, consisting of seventy-two persons, was swallowed up by the power of the greater monarch Pharaoh: but if this was an act of tyranny, it is strange that the sacred and eternal right, grounded upon the immutable laws of God and nature, should not be restored to God's chosen people, when he delivered them from that tyranny. Why was not Jacob's monarchy conferred upon his right heir? how came the people to neglect a point of such importance? or if they did forget it, why did not Moses put them in mind of it? why did not Jacob declare to whom it did belong? or if he is understood to have declared it, in saying the sceptre should not depart from Judah, why was it not delivered into his hands, or unto his heirs? If he was hard to be found in a people of one kindred, but four degrees removed from Jacob their head, who were exact in observing genealogies, how can we hope to find him after so many thousand years, when we do not so much as know from whom we are derived? or rather how comes that right, which is eternal and universal, to have been nipped in the bud, and so abolished before it could take any effect in the world, as never to have been heard of amongst the gentiles, nor the people of God, either before or after the captivity, from the death of Jacob to this day? This I assert, and I give up the cause, if I do not prove it. To this end I begin with Moses and Aaron the first rulers

CHAP. I. of the people, who were neither of the eldest tribe according to birth, nor the disposition of Jacob, if he did, or could give it to any; nor were they of the eldest line of their own tribe; and even between them the superiority was given to Moses, who was the younger, as it is said, "I have made thee a god" to Pharaoh, and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet." If Moses was a king, as our author says, but I deny, and shall hereafter prove, the matter is worse: he must have been an usurper of a most unjust dominion over his brethren; and this patriarchal power, which by the law of God was to be perpetually fixed in his descendents, perished with him, and his sons continued in an obscure rank amongst the Levites. Joshua of the tribe of Ephraim succeeded him; Othniel was of Judah, Ehud of Benjamin, Barak of Naphtalim, and Gideon of Manasseh. The other judges were of several tribes; and they being dead, their children lay hid amongst the common people, and we hear no more of them. The first king was taken out of the least family of the least and youngest tribe. The second, whilst the children of the first king were yet alive, was the youngest of eight sons of an obscure man in the tribe of Judah: Solomon one of his youngest sons succeeded him: ten tribes deserted Rehoboam, and by the command of God set up Jeroboam to be their king. The kingdom of Israel by the destruction of one family, passed into another: that of Judah by God's peculiar promise continued in David's race till the captivity; but we know not that the eldest son was ever preferred, and have no reason to presume it. David their most revered king left no precept for it, and gave an example to the contrary: he did not set up the eldest, but the wisest. After the captivity they who had most wisdom or valour to defend the people, were thought most fit to command; and the kingdom at the last came to the Asmonean race, whilst the posterity of David was buried in the mass of the common people, and utterly deprived of all worldly rule or glory. If the judges had not a regal power, or the regal were only just as instituted by God, and eternally annexed to paternity, all that they did was evil: there could be nothing of justice in the powers exercised by Moses, Joshua, Gideon, Samuel, and the rest of the judges. If the power was regal and just, it must have continued in the descendents of the first: Saul, David, and Solomon, could never have been kings: the right failing in them, their descendents could inherit none from them; and the others after the captivity were guilty of the like injustice.

Now as the rule is not general, to which there is any one just exception, there is not one of these examples that would not overthrow our author's doctrine: if one deviation from it were lawful, another might be, and so to infinity. But the utmost degree of impudent madness to which perhaps any man in the world hath ever arrived, is to assert that to be universal and perpetual, which cannot be verified by any one example to have been in any place of the world, nor justified by any precept.

If it be objected, that all these things were done by God's immediate disposition: I answer, that it were an impious madness to believe, that God did perpetually send his prophets to overthrow what he had ordained from the beginning, and as it were in spite to bring the minds of men into inextricable

ble confusion and darkness; and by particular commands to overthrow his universal and eternal law. But to render this point more clear, I desire it may be considered, that we have but three ways of distinguishing between good and evil. SECT. 13.

1. When God by his word reveals it to us.
2. When by his deeds he declareth it: Because that which he does is good, as that which he says is true.
3. By the light of reason; which is good, inasmuch as it is from God.

And first: It cannot be said we have an explicit word for that continuance of the power in the eldest; for it appears not: and having none, we might conclude it to be left to our liberty. For it agrees not with the goodness of God to leave us in a perpetual ignorance of his will in a matter of so great importance; nor to have suffered his own people, or any other, to persist, without the least reproof or admonition, in a perpetual opposition to it, if it had displeased him.

To the second: The dispensations of his providence, which are the emanations of his will, have gone contrary to this pretended law. There can therefore be no such thing; for God is constant to himself: his works do not contradict his word; and both of them do equally declare to us that which is good.

Thirdly, If there be any precept, that by the light of nature we can in matters of this kind look upon as certain, it is, that the government of a people should be given to him that can best perform the duties of it. No man has it for himself, or from himself; but for and from those, who, before he had it, were his equals, that he may do good to them. If there were a man, who in wisdom, valour, justice, and purity, surpassed all others, he might be called a king by nature; because he is best able to bear the weight of so great a charge; and, like a good shepherd, to lead the people to good. "Detur digniori" is the voice of reason: and, that we may be sure "detur seniori" is not so, Solomon tells us, "That a wise child is better than an old and foolish king." But if this pretended right do not belong to him that is truly the eldest, nothing can be more absurd than a fantastical pretence to a right deduced from him that is not so. Now lest I should be thought to follow my own inventions, and call them reason, or the light of God in us, I desire it may be observed, that God himself has ever taken this method. When he raised up Moses to be the leader of his people, he endowed him with the most admirable gifts of his Spirit that ever he bestowed upon a man: when he chose seventy men to assist him, he endowed them with the same Spirit. Joshua had no other title to succeed him than the like evidence of God's presence with him. When the people through sin fell into misery, he did not seek out their descendants, and such as boasted in a prerogative of birth; but shewed whom he designed for their deliverer, by bestowing such gifts upon him as were required for the performance of his work; and never failed of doing this, till that miserable sinful people, rejecting God, and his government, desired that which

CHAP. I. was in use among their accursed neighbours, that they might be as like to them in the most shameful slavery to man, as in the worship of idols set up against God.

But if this pretended right be grounded upon no word or work of God, nor the reason of man, it is to be accounted a mere figment, that hath nothing of truth in it.

S E C T. XIV.

If the paternal right had included dominion, and was to be transferred to a single heir, it must perish if he were not known; and could be applied to no other person.

HAVING shewed that the first kings were not fathers, nor the first fathers kings; that all the kings of the Jews and gentiles mentioned in Scripture came in upon titles different from, and inconsistent with, that of paternity; and that we are not led by the word nor the works of God, nor the reason of man, or light of nature, to believe there is any such thing; we may safely conclude there never was any such thing, or that it never had any effect; which to us is the same. 'Tis as ridiculous to think of retrieving that which from the beginning of the world was lost, as to create that which never was. But I may go farther, and affirm, that tho' there had been such a right in the first fathers of mankind, exercised by them, and, for some ages individually transmitted to their eldest sons, it must necessarily perish; since the generations of men are so confused, that no man knows his own original; and consequently this heir is no where to be found; for 'tis a folly for a man to pretend to an inheritance, who cannot prove himself to be the right heir. If this be not true, I desire to know from which of Noah's sons the kings of England, France, or Spain, do deduce their original; or what reason they can give, why the title to dominion, which is fabled to be in Noah, did rather belong to the first of their respective races, that attained to the crowns they now enjoy, than to the meanest peasant of their kingdoms; or how that can be transmitted to them, which was not in the first. We know, that no man can give what he hath not; that if there be no giver, there is no gift; if there be no root, there can be no branch; and that the first point failing, all that should be derived from it must necessarily fail.

Our author, who is good at resolving difficulties, shews us an easy way out of this strait. "'Tis true," says he, "all kings are not natural parents of their subjects; yet they either are, or are to be reputed, the next heirs to those first progenitors, who were at first the natural parents of the whole people, and in their right succeed to the exercise of the supreme jurisdiction: and such heirs are not only lords of their own children, but also of their brethren, and all those that were subject to their father, &c. By this means

" means it comes to pass, that many a child succeeding a king hath the right SECT. 4.
 " of a father over many a grey-headed multitude, and hath the title of pater
 " patriæ."

An assertion comprehending so many points, upon which the most important rights of all mankind do depend, might deserve some proof; but he, being of opinion we ought to take it upon his credit, doth not vouchsafe to give us so much as the shadow of any. Nevertheless, being unwilling either cruelly to receive, or rashly to reject it, I shall take the liberty of examining the proposition, and hope I may be pardoned, if I dwell a little more than ordinarily upon that which is the foundation of his work.

We are beholden to him for confessing modestly, that all kings are not the natural fathers of their people, and sparing us the pains of proving, that the kings of Persia, who reigned from the Indies to the Hellespont, did not beget all the men that lived in those countries; or that the kings of France and Spain, who began to reign before they were five years old, were not the natural fathers of the nations under them. But if all kings are not fathers, none are, as they are kings: if any one is, or ever was, the rights of paternity belong to him, and to no other who is not so also. This must be made evident; for matters of such importance require proof, and ought not to be taken upon supposition. If Filmer therefore will pretend, that the right of father belongs to any one king, he must prove, that he is the father of his people; for otherwise it doth not appertain to him; he is not the man we seek.

It is no less absurd to say, he is to be reputed heir to the first progenitor: for it must be first proved, that the nation did descend from one single progenitor without mixture of other races: that this progenitor was the man, to whom Noah (according to Filmer's whimsical division of Asia, Europe, and Africa, among his sons) did give the land now inhabited by that people: that this division so made was not capable of subdivisions; and that this man is by a true and uninterrupted succession descended from the first and eldest line of that progenitor; and all fails, if every one of these points be not made good. If there never was any such man who had that right, it cannot be inherited from him. If by the same rule that a parcel of the world was allotted to him, that parcel might be subdivided amongst his children as they increased, the subdivisions may be infinite, and the right of dominion thereby destroyed. If several nations inhabit the same land, they owe obedience to several fathers: that which is due to their true father, cannot be rendered to him that is not so; for he would by that means be deprived of the right which is inseparably annexed to his person: and lastly, whatsoever the right of an heir may be, it can belong only to him that is heir.

Lest any should be seduced from these plain truths by frivolous suggestions, it is good to consider, that the title of "pater patriæ," with which our author would cheat us, hath no relation to the matters of right, upon which we dispute. It is a figurative speech, that may have been rightly enough applied to some excellent princes on account of their care and love to their people, resembling that of a father to his children; and can relate to none but those who had it. No man that had common sense, or valued truth, did ever call Phalaris,

CHAP. I. Iſis, Dionyſius, Nabis, Nero, or Caligula, fathers of their countries; but ~~~~~ monſters, that to the utmoſt of their power endeavoured their deſtruction:
 which is enough to prove that ſacred name cannot be given to all, and in conſequence to none but ſuch, as by their virtue, piety, and good government, do deſerve it.

Theſe matters will yet appear more evident, if it be conſidered, that tho' Noah had reigned as a king; that Zoroaſter, as ſome ſuppoſe, was Ham, who reigned over his children; and that thereby ſome right might perhaps be derived to ſuch as ſucceeded them; yet this can have no influence upon ſuch as have not the like original; and no man is to be preſumed to have it, till it be proved, ſince we have proved that many had it not. If Nimrod ſet himſelf up againſt his grandfather, and Ninus, who was deſcended from him in the fifth generation, ſlew him; they ill deſerved the name and rights of fathers; and none, but thoſe who have renounced all humanity, virtue, and common ſenſe, can give it to them, or their ſucceſſors. If therefore Noah and Shem had not ſo much as the ſhadow of regal power, and the actions of Nimrod, Ninus, and others, who were kings in their times, ſhew they did not reign in the right of fathers, but were ſet up in a direct oppoſition to it, the titles of the firſt kings were not from paternity, nor conſiſtent with it.

Our author therefore, who ſhould have proved every point doth neither prove any one, nor aſſert that which is agreeable to divine or human ſtory, as to matter of fact; and as little conformable to common ſenſe. It does not only appear contrary to his general propoſition, that all governments have not begun with the paternal power; but we do not find, that any ever did. They who, according to his rules, ſhould have been lords of the whole earth, lived and died private men, whiſt the wildeſt and moſt boiſterous of their children commanded the greateſt part of the then inhabited world, not excepting even thoſe countries where they ſpent and ended their days; and inſtead of entering upon the government by the right of fathers, or managing it as fathers, they did by the moſt outrageous injuſtice uſurp a violent domination over their brethren and fathers.

It may eaſily be imagined what the right is, that could be thus acquired and tranſmitted to their ſucceſſors. Nevertheleſs our author ſays, "all kings either are, or ought to be reputed next heirs, &c." But why reputed, if they were not? How could any of the accuſed race of Ham be reputed father of Noah or Shem, to whom he was to be a ſervant? How could Nimrod and Ninus be reputed fathers of Ham, and of thoſe whom they ought to have obeyed? Can reaſon oblige me to believe that which I know to be falſe? Can a lye, that is hateful to God and good men, not only be excuſed, but enjoined, when (as he will perhaps ſay) it is for the king's ſervice? Can I ſerve two maſters, or, without the moſt unpardonable injuſtice, repute him to be my father, who is not my father; and pay the obedience that is due to him who did beget and educate me, to one from whom I never received any good? If this be ſo abſurd, that no man dares affirm it in the perſon of any, it is as prepoſterous in relation to his heirs: for Nimrod the firſt king could be heir to no man as king, and could tranſmit to no man a right which he had not. If it was ridiculous

diculous and abominable to say, that he was father of Cush, Ham, Shem, and Noah; it is as ridiculous to say, he had the right of father, if he was not their father; or that his successors inherited it from him, if he never had it. If there be any way through this, it must have accrued to him by the extirpation of all his elders, and their races; so as he who will assert, this pretended right to have been in the Babylonian kings, must assert, that Noah, Shem, Japhet, Ham, Cush, and all Nimrod's elder brothers, with all their descendents, were utterly extirpated before he began to reign; and all mankind to be descended from him. SECT. 14.

This must be, if Nimrod, as the scripture says, was the first that became mighty in the earth; unless men might be kings, without having more power than others; for Cush, Ham, and Noah, were his elders and progenitors in the direct line; and all the sons of Shem and Japhet, and their descendents in the collaterals, were to be preferred before him; and he could have no right at all, that was not directly contrary to those principles, which, our author says, are grounded upon the eternal and indispensable laws of God and nature. The like may be said of the seventy-two heads of colonies, which (following, as I suppose, Sir Walter Raleigh), he says, went out to people the earth, and whom he calls kings: for, according to the same rule, Noah, Shem, and Japhet, with their descendents, could not be of the number; so that neither Nimrod, nor the others that established the kingdoms of the world, and from whence he thinks all the rest to be derived, could have any thing of justice in them, unless it were from a root altogether inconsistent with his principles. They are therefore false, or the establishments before-mentioned could have no right. If they had none, they cannot be reputed to have any; for no man can think that to be true, which he knows to be false: having none, they could transmit none to their heirs and successors. And if we are to believe, that all the kingdoms of the earth are established upon this paternal right; it must be proved, that all those, who in birth ought to have been preferred before Nimrod, and the seventy-two, were extirpated; or that the first and true heir of Noah did afterwards abolish all these unjust usurpations; and, making himself master of the whole, left it to his heirs, in whom it continues to this day. When this is done, I will acknowledge the foundation to be well laid, and admit of all that can be rightly built upon it; but if this fails, all fails: the poison of the root continues in the branches. If the right heir be not in possession, he is not the right who is in possession: if the true heir be known, he ought to be restored to his right: if he be not known, the right must perish: that cannot be said to belong to any man, if no man knows to whom it belongs, and can have no more effect than if it were not. This conclusion will continue unmoveable, tho' the division into seventy-two kingdoms were allowed; which cannot be without destroying the paternal power, or subjecting it to be subdivided into as many parcels as there are men, which destroys regality; for the same thing may be required in every one of the distinct kingdoms, and others derived from them. We must know who was that true heir of Noah, that recovered all: how, when, and to whom he gave the several portions; and that every one of them

do

CHAP. I. do continue in the possession of those, who by this prerogative of birth are raised above the rest of mankind; and if they are not, it is an impious folly to repute them so, to the prejudice of those that are; and if they do not appear, to the prejudice of all mankind; who, being equal, are thereby made subject to them. For as truth is the rule of justice; there can be none, when he is reputed superior to all who is certainly inferior to

[In this place two pages are wanting in the original manuscript.]

—degenerated from that reason which distinguisheth men from beasts. Tho' it may be fit to use some ceremonies, before a man be admitted to practice physick, or set up a trade, it is his own skill that makes him a doctor, or an artificer; and others do but declare it. An ass will not leave his stupidity, tho' he be covered with scarlet; and he that is by nature a slave, will be so still, tho' a crown be put upon his head: and it is hard to imagine a more violent inversion of the laws of God and nature, than to raise him to the throne, whom nature intended for the chain; or to make them slaves to slaves, whom God hath endowed with the virtues required in kings. Nothing can be more preposterous, than to impute to God the frantic domination, which is often exercised by wicked, foolish, and vile persons, over the wise, valiant, just, and good; or to subject the best to the rage of the worst. If there be any family therefore in the world, that can by the law of God and nature, distinct from the ordinance of man, pretend to an hereditary right of dominion over any people, it must be one that never did, and never can produce any person that is not free from all the infirmities and vices that render him unable to exercise the sovereign power; and is endowed with all the virtues required to that end; or at least a promise from God, verified by experience, that the next in blood shall ever be able and fit for that work. But since we do not know, that any such hath yet appeared in the world, we have no reason to believe, that there is, or ever was any such; and consequently none upon whom God hath conferred the rights that cannot be exercised without them.

If there was no shadow of a paternal right in the institution of the kingdoms of Saul and David, there could be none in those that succeeded. Rehoboam could have no other, than from Solomon: when he reigned over two tribes, and Jeroboam over ten, it is not possible, that both of them could be the next heir of their last common father Jacob; and it is absurd to say, that ought to be reputed, which is impossible: for our thoughts are ever to be guided by truth, or such an appearance of it, as doth persuade or convince us.

The same title of father is yet more ridiculously or odiously applied to the succeeding kings. Baasha had no other title to the crown, than by killing Nadab the son of Jeroboam, and destroying his family. Zimri purchased the same honour by the slaughter of Elah when he was drunk; and dealing with the house of Baasha, as he had done with that of Jeroboam. Zimri, burning himself, transferred the same to Omri, as a reward for bringing him to that extremity. As Jehu was more fierce than these, he seems to have gained a more excellent recompence than any since Jeroboam, even a conditional pro-promise of a perpetual kingdom; but falling from these glorious privileges, SECT. 15.

 purchased by his zeal in killing two wicked kings, and above one hundred of their brethren, Shallum inherited them, by destroying Zachary, and all that remained of his race. This in plain English is no less than to say, that whosoever kills a king, and invades a crown, tho' the act and means of accomplishing it be never so detestable, does thereby become father of his country, and heir of all the divine privileges annexed to that glorious inheritance. And tho' I cannot tell whether such a doctrine be more sottish, monstrous, or impious, I dare affirm, that if it were received, no king in the world could think himself safe in his throne for one day: they are already encompassed with many dangers; but lest pride, avarice, ambition, lust, rage, and all the vices that usually reign in the hearts of worldly men, should not be sufficient to invite them perpetually to disturb mankind, through the desire of gaining the power, riches, and splendor, that accompany a crown, our author proposes to them the most sacred privileges, as a reward of the most execrable crimes.
 He that was stirred up only by the violence of his own nature, thought that a kingdom could never be bought at too dear a rate;

————— “ Pro regno velim “ Patriam, penates, conjugem flammis dare :
 “ Imperia precio quolibet constant bene.” Senec. Theb. vers. ult.

But if the sacred character of God's anointed or vicegerent, and father of a country, were added to the other advantages that follow the highest fortunes; the most modest and just men would be filled with fury, that they might attain to them. Nay, it may be, even the best would be the most forward in conspiring against such as reigned: they who could not be tempted with external pleasures, would be most in love with divine privileges; and since they should become the sacred ministers of God, if they succeeded, and traitors or rogues only if they miscarried, their only care would be so to lay their designs, that they might be surely executed. This is a doctrine worthy of Filmer's invention, and Heylin's approbation; which, being well weighed, will shew to all good and just kings how far they are obliged to those, who, under pretence of advancing their authority, fill the minds of men with such notions as are so desperately pernicious to them.

Discourses concerning Government.

S E C T. XVI.

The antients chose those to be kings, who excelled in the virtues that are most beneficial to civil societies.

IF the Israelites, whose lawgiver was God, had no king in the first institution of their government, it is no wonder that other nations should not think themselves obliged to set up any: if they who came all of one stock, and knew their genealogies, when they did institute kings, had no regard to our author's chimerical right of inheritance; nor were taught by God or his prophets to have any; it is not strange, that nations, who did not know their own original, and who probably, if not certainly, came of several stocks, never put themselves to the trouble of seeking one, who by his birth deserved to be preferred before others: and various changes happening in all kingdoms (whereby in process of time the crowns were transported into divers families, to which the right of inheritance could not without the utmost impiety and madness be imputed) such a fancy certainly could only enter into the heads of fools; and we know of none so foolish to have harboured it.

The Grecians, amongst others who followed the light of reason, knew no other original title to the government of a nation than that wisdom, valour, and justice, which was beneficial to the people. These qualities gave beginning to those governments, which we call "heroum regna;" and the veneration paid to such as enjoyed them, proceeded from a grateful sense of the good received from them: they were thought to be descended from the gods, who in virtue and beneficence surpassed other men: The same attended their descendents, till they came to abuse their power, and by their vices shewed themselves like to, or worse than others. Those nations did not seek the most antient, but the most worthy; and thought such only worthy to be preferred before others, who could best perform their duty. The Spartans knew, that Hercules and Achilles were not their fathers; for they were a nation before either of them were born; but thinking their children might be like to them in valour, they brought them from Thebes and Epirus to be their kings. If our author be of another opinion, I desire to know, whether the Heraclidæ, or the Æacidæ were, or ought to be, reputed fathers of the Lacedemonians; for if the one was, the other was not.

The same method was followed in Italy; and they who esteemed themselves Aborigines,

—————"Qui rupto robore nati,
"Compositive luto, nullus habuere parentes." Juven. Sat. 6. l. 13.

could not set up one to govern them under the title of parent. They could pay no veneration to any man under the name of a common father, who thought they had none; and they who esteemed themselves equal, could have no

no reason to prefer any one, unless he were distinguished from others by the SECT. 16. virtues that were beneficial to all. This may be illustrated by matters of fact.  Romulus and Remus, the sons of a Nun, constipated, as is probable, by a lusty soldier, who was said to be Mars, for their vigour and valour were made heads of a gathered people. We know not that ever they had any children; but we are sure they could not be fathers of the people that flocked to them from several places, nor in any manner be reputed heirs of him or them that were so; for they never knew who was their own father; and when their mother came to be discovered, they ought to have been subjects to Amulius, or Numitor, when they had slain him. They could not be his heirs whilst he lived, and were not when he died: the government of the Latins continued at Alba, and Romulus reigned over those who joined with him in building Rome. The power not coming to him by inheritance, must have been gained by force, or conferred upon him by consent: it could not be acquired by force; for one man could not force a multitude of fierce and valiant men, as they appear to have been. It must therefore have been by consent: and when he aimed at more authority than they were willing to allow, they slew him. He being dead, they fetched Numa from among the Sabines: he was not their father, nor heir to their father, but a stranger; not a conqueror, but an unarmed philosopher. Tullus Hostilius had no other title: Ancus Martius was no way related to such as had reigned. The first Tarquin was the son of a banished Corinthian. Servius Tullus came to Rome in the belly of his captive mother, and could inherit nothing but chains from his vanquished father. Tarquin the proud murdered him, and first took upon himself the title of T. liv. L. i. king, "sine jussu populi." If this murder and usurpation be called a conquest, c. 49. and thought to create a right, the effect will be but small: the conqueror was soon conquered, banished, and his sons slain, after which we hear no more of him, or his descendents. Whatsoever he gained from Servius, or the people, was soon lost, and did accrue to those that conquered and ejected him; and they might retain what was their own, or confer it upon one or more, in such manner and measure as best pleased themselves. If the regal power, which our author says was in the consuls, could be divided into two parts, limited to a year, and suffer such restrictions as the people pleased to lay upon it, they might have divided it into as many parcels, and put it into such form, as best suited with their inclinations; and the several magistracies which they did create for the exercise of the kingly, and all other powers, shews that they were to give account to none but themselves.

The Israelites, Spartans, Romans, and others, who thus framed their governments according to their own will, did it not by any peculiar privilege, but by a universal right conferred upon them by God and nature: they were made of no better clay than others; they had no right, that does not as well belong to other nations: that is to say, the constitution of every government is referred to those who are concerned in it, and no other has any thing to do with it.

CHAP. I.

Yet if it be asserted, that the government of Rome was paternal, or they had none at all; I desire to know, how they came to have six fathers of several families, whilst they lived under kings; and two or more new ones every year afterwards; or how they came to be so excellent in virtue and fortune, as to conquer the best part of the world, if they had no government. Hobbes indeed doth scurrilously deride Cicero, Plato and Aristotle, "cæteroque Romanæ & Græcæ anarchiæ fautores." But it is strange, that this anarchy, which he resembles to a chaos, full of darkness and confusion, that can have no strength or regular action, should overthrow all the monarchies that came within their reach, "if (as our author says) the best order, greatest strength, and most stability, be in them." It must therefore be confessed, that these governments are, in their various forms, rightly instituted by several nations, without any regard to inheritance; or that these nations have had no governments, and were more strong, virtuous, and happy, without government, than under it; which is most absurd.

But if governments arise from the consent of men, and are instituted by men according to their own inclinations, they do therein seek their own good; for the will is ever drawn by some real good, or the appearance of it. This is that which man seeks by all the regular or irregular motions of his mind. Reason and passion, virtue and vice, do herein concur, tho' they differ vastly in the objects, in which each of them thinks this good to consist. A people therefore that sets up kings, dictators, consuls, pretors, or emperors, does it not, that they may be great, glorious, rich or happy, but that it may be well with themselves, and their posterity. This is not accomplished simply by setting one, a few, or more men in the administration of powers, but by placing the authority in those who may rightly perform their office. This is not every man's work: valour, integrity, wisdom, industry, experience, and skill, are required for the management of those military and civil affairs that necessarily fall under the care of the chief magistrates. He or they therefore may reasonably be advanced above their equals, who are most fit to perform the duties belonging to their stations, in order to the public good, for which they were instituted.

Marius, Sylla, Cataline, Julius or Octavius Cæsar, and all those who by force or fraud usurped a dominion over their brethren, could have no title to this right; much less could they become fathers of the people, by using all the most wicked means that could well be imagined to destroy them; and not being regularly chosen for their virtues, or the opinion of them, nor preferred on account of any prerogative that had been from the beginning annexed to their families, they could have no other right than occupation could confer upon them. If this can confer a right, there is an end of all disputes concerning the laws of God or man. If Julius and Octavius Cæsar did successively become lords and fathers of their country, by slaughtering almost all the senate, and such persons as were eminent for nobility or virtue, together with the major part of the people, it cannot be denied, that a thief, who breaks into his neighbour's house, and kills him, is justly master of his estate; and may exact the same obedience from his children, that they render to their father. If this right could be transferred to Tiberius, either through the malice of Octavius, or the fraud of his wife; a wet blanket laid over his face, and a few corrupted soldiers, could invest Caligula, with the same. A vile rascal pulling Claudius out by the heels from behind the hangings where he had hid himself, could give it to him. A dish of mushrooms well seasoned by the infamous strumpet his wife, and a potion prepared for Britannicus by Locusta, could transfer it to her son, who was a stranger to his blood. Galba became heir to it, by driving Nero to despair and death. Two common soldiers, by exciting his guards to kill him, could give a just title to the empire of the world to Otho, who was thought to be the worst man in it. If a company of villains in the German army, thinking it as fit for them as others, to create a father of mankind, could confer the dignity upon Vitellius; and if Vespasian, causing him to be killed, and thrown into a jakes less impure than his life, did inherit all the glorious and sacred privileges belonging to that title; it is in vain to inquire after any man's right to any thing.

to

If there be such a thing as right or wrong to be examined by men, and any rules set, whereby the one may be distinguished from the other; these extravagancies can have no effect of right. Such as commit them, are not to be looked upon as fathers; but as the most mortal enemies of their respective countries. No right is to be acknowledged in any, but such as is conferred upon them by those who have the right of conferring, and are concerned in the exercise of the power, upon such conditions as best please themselves. No obedience can be due to him or them, who have not a right of commanding. This cannot reasonably be conferred upon any, that are not esteemed willing and able rightly to execute it. This ability to perform the highest works that come within the reach of men; and integrity of will not to be diverted from it by any temptation, or consideration of private advantages, comprehending all that is most commendable in man; we may easily see, that whensoever men act according to the law of their own nature, which is reason, they can have no other rule to direct them in advancing one above another, than the opinion of a man's virtue and ability, best to perform the duty incumbent upon him; that is, by all means to procure the good of the people committed to his charge. He is only fit to conduct a ship, who understands the art of a pilot: when we are sick, we seek the assistance of such as are best skilled in physick: the command of an army is prudently conferred upon him that hath most industry, skill, experience, and valour: in like manner, he only can, according to the rules of nature, be advanced to the dignities of the world, who excels in the virtues required for the performance of the duties annexed to them; for he only can answer the end of his institution. The law of every instituted power is, to accomplish the end of its institution, as creatures are to do the will of their creator, and, in deflecting from it, overthrow their own being. Magistrates are distinguished from other men, by the power with which the law invests them for the public good: he that cannot or will not procure that good, destroys his own being, and becomes like to other men. In matters of the greatest importance,

“ detur

CHAP. I. "detur digniori" is the voice of nature; all her most sacred laws are perverted, if this be not observed in the disposition of the governments of mankind: but all is neglected and violated, if they are not put into the hands of such as excel in all manner of virtues; for they only are worthy of them, and they only can have a right who are worthy, because they only can perform the end for which they are instituted. This may seem strange to those, who have their heads infected with Filmer's whimsies; but to others, so certainly grounded upon truth, that * Bartholomew de las Casas Bishop of Chiapa, in a treatise written by him, and dedicated to the emperor Charles the Vth, concerning the Indies, makes it the foundation of all his discourse, that notwithstanding his grant of all those countries from the Pope, and his pretensions to conquest, he could have no right over any of those nations, unless he did in the first place, as the principal end, regard their good: "The reason," says he, "is, that regard is to be had to the principal end and cause, for which a supreme or universal lord is set over them, which is their good and profit, and not that it should turn to their destruction and ruin; for if that should be, there is no doubt but from thenceforward, that power would be tyrannical and unjust, as tending more to the interest and profit of that lord, than to the public good and profit of the subjects; which, according to natural reason, and the laws of God and man, is abhorred, and deserves to be abhorred." And in another place speaking of the governors, who, abusing their power, brought many troubles and vexations upon the Indians, he says, † "they had rendered his majesty's government intolerable, and his yoke insupportable, tyrannical, and most justly abhorred." I do not alledge this through an opinion, that a Spanish bishop is of more authority than another man; but to shew, that these are common notions agreed by all mankind; and that the greatest monarchs do neither refuse to hear them, or to regulate themselves according to them, till they renounce common sense, and degenerate into beasts.

But if that government be unreasonable, and abhorred by the laws of God and man, which is not instituted for the good of those that live under it; and an empire, grounded upon the donation of the Pope, which amongst those of the Roman religion is of great importance, and an entire conquest of the people, with whom there had been no former compact, do degenerate into a most unjust and detestable tyranny, so soon as the supreme lord begins to prefer his own interest or profit before the good of his subjects; what shall we say of those who pretend to a right of dominion over free nations, as inseparably united to their persons, without distinction of age or or sex, or the least consideration of their infirmities and vices; as if they were not placed in the throne for the good of their people, but to enjoy the honours and pleasures that attend the highest fortune? What name can be fit for those, who have no other title to the places they possess, than the most unjust and violent usurpation, or being descended from those, who for their virtues were, by the people's consent, duly advanced to the exercise of a legitimate power; and having sworn to administer it, according to the conditions upon which it was given, for the good of those who gave it, turn all to their own pleasure and profit, without any care of the public? These may be liable to hard censures; but those who use them most gently, must confess, that such an extreme deviation from the end of their institution, annuls it; and the wound thereby given to the natural and original rights of those nations cannot be cured, unless they resume the liberties, of which they have been deprived, and return to the antient custom of chusing those to be magistrates, who for their virtues best deserve to be preferred before their brethren, and are endowed with those qualities that best enable men to perform the great end of providing for the public safety.

* La razon es porque siempre se ha de tener respeto al fin y causa final, por el qual, el tal supremo y universal senor se les pone, que es su bien y utilidad; y a que no se le convierte el tal supremo senorio in danno, pernicié y destruycion. Porque si assi fuesse, no ay que dudar, que non desde entonces inconfusamente seria injusto, Tyrannico y iniquo tal senorio, como mas se enderezasse al proprio interese y provecho del senor, que al bien y utilidad comun de los súbditos; lo qual de la razon natural y de todas las leyes humanas y divinas es abhorrecido y abhorrescible. Bar. de las Casas, delect. de las indias, pag. 111

† El yugo y governacion de vuestra magestad importable, tirannico y degno de todo abhorrecimiento. Pag. 167.

S E C T. XVII.

God, having given the government of the world to no one man, nor declared how it should be divided, left it to the will of man.

OUR author's next inquiry is, "What becomes of the right of fatherhood, in case the crown should escheat for want of an heir? Whether it doth not escheat to the people?" His answer is, "It is but the negligence or ignorance of the people, to lose the knowledge of the true heir, &c." And a little below, "The power is not devolved to the multitude: no; the kingly power escheats on independent heads of families: all such prime heads have power to consent in the uniting, or conferring their fatherly right of sovereign authority on whom they please; and he that is so elected claims not his power as a donative from the people, but as being substituted by God, from whom he receives his royal charter of universal father," &c.

In my opinion, before he had asked, What should be done in case the crown should escheat for want of an heir? He ought to have proved, there had been a man in the world, who had the right in himself, and telling who he was, have shewed how it had been transmitted for some generations, that we might know where to seek his heir; and before he accused the multitude of ignorance or negligence, in not knowing this heir, he ought to have informed us, how it may be possible to know him, or what it would avail us if we did know him; for it is in vain to know to whom a right belongs, that never was, and never can be executed. But we may go farther, and affirm, that as the universal right must have been in Noah and Shem (if

CHAP. I. (if in any,) who never exercised it; we have reason to believe there never was any such thing: and, having proved from Scripture and human history, that the first kingdoms were set up in a direct opposition to this right, by Nimrod and others, he that should seek and find their heirs, would only find those, who, by a most accursed wickedness, had usurped and continued a dominion over their fathers, contrary to the laws of God and nature; and we should neither be more wise, nor more happy, than we are, tho' our author should furnish us with certain and authentic genealogies, by which we might know the true heirs of Nimrod, and the seventy-two kings that went from Babylon, who, as he supposes, gave beginning to all the kingdoms of the earth.

Moreover, if the right be universal, it must be in one; for the universe being but one, the whole right of commanding it cannot at the same time be in many, and proceed from the ordinance of God, or of man. It cannot proceed from the ordinance of God; for he doth nothing in vain: he never gave a right that could not be executed: no man can govern that which he does not so much as know: no man did ever know all the world; no man therefore did or could govern it: and none could be appointed by God to do that which is absolutely impossible to be done; for it could not consist with his wisdom. We find this in ourselves. It were a shame for one of us poor, weak, short-sighted creatures, in the disposal of our affairs, to appoint such a method, as were utterly ineffectual for the preservation of our families, or destructive to them; and the blasphemy of imputing to God such an ordinance, as would be a reproach to one of us, can suit only with the wicked and impudent fury of such as our author, who delights in monsters. This also shews us, that it cannot be from men: one, or a few, may commit follies; but mankind does not universally commit, and perpetually persist in any: they cannot therefore, by a general and permanent authority, enact that which is utterly absurd and impossible, or if they do, they destroy their own nature, and can no longer deserve the name of reasonable creatures. There can be therefore no such man, and the folly of seeking him, or his heir that never was, may be left to the disciples of Filmer.

Hor. od. 1.
III. xxix. 30.

The difficulties are as great, if it be said, the world might be divided into parcels, and we are to seek the heirs of the first possessors; for besides that no man can be obliged to seek that which cannot be found (all men knowing, that "caliginosa nocte hæc premit Deus"), and that the genealogies of mankind are so confused, that, unless possibly among Jews, we have reason to believe there is not a man in the world, who knows his own original, it could be of no advantage to us, tho' we knew that of every one; for the division would be of no value, unless it were at the first rightly made by him who had all the authority in himself (which does no-where appear), and rightly deduced to him, who according to that division, claims a right to the parcel he enjoys: and I fear our author would terribly shake the crowns, in which the nations of Europe are concerned, if they should be persuaded to search into the genealogies of their princes, and to judge of their rights according to the proofs they

they should give of titles rightly deduced by succession of blood from the SECT. 17.
 seventy-two first kings, from whom our author fancies all the kingdoms of the world to be derived.

Besides, tho' this were done, it would be to no purpose; for the seventy-two were not sent out by Noah; nor was he, or his sons, of that number; but they went or were sent from Babylon, where Nimrod reigned; who, as has been already proved, neither had nor could have any right at all; but was a mighty hunter, even a proud and cruel tyrant, usurping a power to which he had no right, and which was perpetually exercised by him and his successors against God and his people, from whence I may safely conclude, that no right can ever be derived; and may justly presume it will be denied by none who are of better morals, and of more sound principles in matters of law and religion than Filmer and Heylin; since it is no less absurd to deduce a right from him that had none, than to expect pure and wholesome waters from a filthy, polluted, and poisonous fountain.

If it be pretended, that some other man since Noah had this universal right, it must either remain in one single person, as his right heir, or be divided. If in one, I desire to know who he is, and where we may find him, that the empire of the world may be delivered to him: but if he cannot be found, the business is at an end; for every man in the world may pretend himself to be the person; and the infinite controversies arising thereupon can never be decided, unless either the genealogies of every one from Noah were extant and proved, or we had a word from heaven, with a sufficient testimony of his mission who announceth it. When this is done, it will be time to consider what kind of obedience is due to this wonderfully happy and glorious person. But whilst the first appears to be absolutely impossible, and we have no promise or reason to expect the other, the proposition is to be esteemed one of our author's empty whimsies, which cannot be received by mankind, unless they come all to be possessed with an epidemical madness, which would cast them into that which Hobbes calls "bellum omnium contra omnes;" when every man's sword would be drawn against every man, and every man's against him, if God should so abandon the world to suffer them to fall into such misery.

If this pretended right be divided, it concerns us to know by whom, when, how, or to whom; for the division cannot be of any value, unless the right was originally in one; that he did exercise this right in making the division; that the parcels into which the world is divided are according to the allotment that was made; and that the persons claiming them by virtue of it are the true heirs of those to whom they were first granted. Many other difficulties may be alledged no less inextricable than these; but this seeming sufficient for the present, I shall not trouble myself with more, promising that, when they shall be removed, I will propose others, or, confessing my errors, yield up the cause.

But if the dominion of the whole world cannot belong to any one man, and every one have an equal title to that which should give it; or if it did belong to one, none did ever exercise it in governing the CHAP. I. whole, or dividing it ; or, if he did divide it, no man knows how, when, and to whom ; so that they who lay claim to any parcels can give no testimony of that division, nor shew any better title than other men derived from their first progenitor, to whom it is said to have been granted ; and that we have neither a word, nor the promise of a word, from God to decide the controversies arising thereupon, nor any prophet giving testimony of his mission that takes upon him to do it, the whole fabric of our author's patriarchal dominion falls to the ground ; and they who propose these doctrines, which (if they were received) would be the root of perpetual and irreconcilable hatred in every man against every man, can be accounted no less than ministers of the devil, tho' they want the abilities he has sometimes infused into those who have been employed on the like occasions. And we may justly conclude, that God having never given the whole world to be governed by one man ; nor prescribed any rule for the division of it ; nor declared where the right of dividing or subdividing that which every man has should terminate ; we may safely affirm, that the whole is for ever left to the will and discretion of man : we may enter into, form, and continue in, greater or lesser societies, as best pleases ourselves : the right of paternity as to dominion is at an end ; and no more remains, but the love, veneration, and obedience, which, proceeding from a due sense of the benefits of birth and education, have their root in gratitude, and are esteemed sacred and inviolable by all that are sober and virtuous. And as it is impossible to transfer these benefits by inheritance, so it is impossible to transfer the rights arising from them. No man can be my father but he that did beget me ; and it is as absurd to say I owe that duty to one who is not my father, which I owe to my father, as to say, he did beget me, who did not beget me ; for the obligation that arises from benefits can only be to him that conferred them. It is in vain to say the same is due to his heir ; for that can take place only when he has but one, which in this case signifies nothing : for if I, being the only son of my father, inherit his right, and have the same power over my children as he had over me ; if I had one hundred brothers, they must all inherit the same ; and the law of England, which acknowledges one only heir, is not general, but municipal ; and is so far from being general, as the precept of God and nature, that I doubt whether it was ever known or used in any nation in the world beyond our island. The words of the apostle, " if we are children, we are therefore heirs and co-heirs with Christ," are the voice of God and nature ; and as the universal law of God and nature is always the same, every one of us who have children have the same right over them, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, had over theirs ; and that right which was not devolved to any one of them, but inherited by them all (I mean the right of father as father, not the peculiar promises which were not according to the law of nature, but the election of grace) is also inherited by every one of us, and ours, that is, by all mankind. But if that which could be inherited was inherited by all, and it be impossible that a right of dominion over all can be due to every one, then all that is or can be inherited by every one is that exemption from the dominion of another, which we call liberty, and is the gift of God and nature.

S E C T. XVIII.

If a right of dominion were esteemed hereditary according to the law of nature, a multitude of destructive and inextricable controversies would thereupon arise.

TH E R E being no such thing therefore, according to the law of nature, as an hereditary right to the dominion of the world, or any part of it; nor one man that can derive to himself a title from the first fathers of mankind, by which he can rightly pretend to be preferred before others to that command, or a part of it; and none can be derived from Nimrod, or other usurpers, who had none in themselves; we may justly spare our pains of seeking farther into that matter. But as things of the highest importance can never be too fully explained; it may not be amiss to observe, that if mankind could be brought to believe, that such a right of dominion were by the law of God and nature hereditary, a great number of the most destructive and inextricable controversies must thereupon arise, which the wisdom and goodness of God can never injoin, and nature, which is reason, can never intend; but at present I shall only mention two, from whence others must perpetually spring. First, if there be such a law, no human constitution can alter it: no length of time can be a defence against it: all governments that are not conformable to it are vicious and void even in their root, and must be so for ever: that which is originally unjust may be justly overthrown. We do not know of any (at least in that part of the world in which we are most concerned) that is established, or exercised with an absolute power, as by the authors of those opinions is esteemed inseparable from it: many, as the empire, and other states, are directly contrary; and on that account can have no justice in them. It being certain therefore, that he or they, who exercise those governments, have no right; that there is a man to whom it doth belong, and no man knowing who he is; there is no one man who has not as good a title to it as any other: there is not therefore one who hath not a right, as well as any, to overthrow that which hath none at all. He that hath no part in the government may destroy it, as well as he that has the greatest; for he neither has that which God ordained he should have, nor can shew a title to that which he enjoys from that original prerogative of birth, from whence it can only be derived.

If it be said, that some governments are arbitrary, as they ought to be, and France, Turkey, and the like be alledged as instances, the matter is not mended: for we do not only know when those, who deserve to be regarded by us, were not absolute, and how they came to be so; but also, that those very families which are now in possession, are not of a very long continuance, had no more title to the original right we

CHAP. I. speak of than any other men, and consequently can have none to this day.

And tho' we cannot perhaps say, that the governments of the barbarous eastern nations were ever other than they are; yet the known original of them deprives them of all pretence to the patriarchal inheritance, and they may be as justly as any other deprived of the power to which they have no title.

In the second place, tho' all mens genealogies were extant, and fully verified, and it were allowed, that the dominion of the world, or every part of it, did belong to the right heir of the first progenitor, or any other to whom the first did rightly assign the parcel, which is under question; yet it were impossible for us to know who should be esteemed the true heir, or according to what rule he should be judged so to be: for God hath not by a precise word determined it, and men cannot agree about it, as appears by the various laws and customs of several nations, disposing severally of hereditary dominions.

It is a folly to say, they ought to go to the next in blood; for it is not known who is that next. Some give the preference to him, who amongst many competitors is the fewest degrees removed from their common progenitor who first obtained the crown: others look only upon the last that possessed it. Some admit of representation, by which means the grandchild of a king by his eldest son is preferred before his second son, he being said to represent his dead father, who was the eldest: others exclude these, and advance the younger son, who is nearer by one degree to the common progenitor that last enjoyed the crown than the grandchild. According to the first rule, Richard the second was advanced to the crown of England, as son of the eldest son of Edward the third, before his uncles, who by one degree were nearer to the last possessor: and in pursuance of the second, Sancho surnamed the Brave, second son of Alphonso the Wise, king of Castile, was preferred before Alphonso son of Ferdinand his elder brother, according to the law of thanestry, which was in force in Spain ever since we have had any knowledge of that country, as appears by the contest between Corbis and Orsua, decided by combat before Scipio Africanus; continued in full force as long as the kingdom of the Goths lasted; and was ever highly valued, till the house of Austria got possession of that country, and introduced laws and customs formerly unknown to the inhabitants.

The histories of all nations furnish us with innumerable examples of both sorts; and whosoever takes upon him to determine which side is in the right, ought to shew by what authority he undertakes to be the judge of mankind, and how the infinite breaches thereby made upon the rights of the governing families shall be cured, without the overthrow of those that he shall condemn, and of the nations where such laws have been in force as he dislikes: and till that be done, in my opinion, no place will afford a better lodging for him, that shall impudently assume such a power, than the new buildings in Moorfields.

It is no less hard to decide, whether this next heir is to be sought in the male line only, or whether females also be admitted. If we follow the first as the law of God and nature, the title of our English kings is wholly wholly abolished; for not one of them, since Henry the 1st, has had the SECT. 18.

 least pretence to an inheritance by the masculine line; and if it were necessary, we have enough to say of those that were before them.

If it be said, that the same right belongs to females, it ought to be proved, that women are as fit as men to perform the office of a king, that is, as the Israelites said to Samuel, to go in and out before us, to judge us, and to fight our battles; for it were an impious folly to say, that God had ordained those for the offices on which the good of mankind so much depends, who by nature are unable to perform the duties of them. If on the other side, the sweetness, gentleness, delicacy, and tenderness of the sex, render them so unfit for manly exercises, that they are accounted utterly repugnant to, and inconsistent with that modesty which does so eminently shine in all those that are good amongst them; that law of nature which should advance them to the government of men, would overthrow its own work, and make those to be the heads of nations, which cannot be the heads of private families; for, as the apostle says, "the woman is not the head of the man, but the man is the head of the woman." This were no less than to oblige mankind to lay aside the name of reasonable creature: for if reason be his nature, it cannot injoin that which is contrary to itself; if it be not, the definition "homo est animal rationale," is false, and ought no longer to be assumed.

If any man think these arguments to be mistaken or misapplied, I desire him to inquire of the French nation on what account they have always excluded females, and such as descended from them? How comes the house of Bourbon to be advanced to the throne before a great number of families that come from the daughters of the house of Valois? Or what title those could have before the daughters of the other lines, descended from Hugh Capet, Pepin, Meroveus, or Pharamond? I know not how such questions would be received; but I am inclined to think, that the wickedness and folly of those who should thereby endeavour to overthrow the most ancient and most venerated constitutions of the greatest nations, and by that means to involve them in the most inextricable difficulties, would be requited only with stones.

It cannot be denied, that the most valiant, wise, learned, and best polished nations, have always followed the same rule, tho' the * weak and barbarous acted otherwise; and no man ever heard of a queen, or a man deriving his title from a female among the ancient civilized nations: but if this be not enough, the law of God, that wholly omits females, is sufficient to shew, that nature, which is his handmaid, cannot advance them. When God describes who should be the king of his people (if they would have one), and how he should govern; no mention is made of daughters. The Israelites offered the kingdom to Gideon, and to his sons: God promised, and gave it to Saul, David, Jeroboam, Jehu, and their sons. When all of them, save David, by their crimes fell from the kingdom, the males only were extirpated, Deut. xvii.

* ———Reginarumque sub armis
 Barbaries pars magna jacet. ———Lucan. l'harf.

CHAP. I. and the females, who had no part in the promises, did not fall under the penalties, or the vengeance that was executed upon those families: and we do not in the word of God, or in the history of the Jews, hear of any feminine reign, except that which was usurped by Athaliah; nor that any consideration was had of their descendents in relation to the kingdom: which is enough to shew that it is not according to the law of God, nor to the law of nature, which cannot differ from it. So that females, or such as derive their right by inheritance from females, must have it from some other law, or they can have none at all.

But tho' this question were authentically decided, and concluded, that females might or might not succeed, we should not be at the end of our contests; for if they were excluded, it would not from thence follow, as in France, that their descendents should be so also; for the privilege which is denied to them, because they cannot, without receding from the modesty and gentleness of the sex, take upon them to execute all the duties required, may be transferred to their children, as Henry the second, and Henry the seventh, were admitted, tho' their mothers were rejected.

If it be said that every nation ought in this to follow their own constitutions, we are at an end of our controversies; for they ought not to be followed, unless they are rightly made: They cannot be rightly made, if they are contrary to the universal law of God and nature. If there be a general rule, it is impossible but some of them, being directly contrary to each other, must be contrary to it. If therefore all of them are to be followed, there can be no general law given to all; but every people is by God and nature left to the liberty of regulating these matters relating to themselves according to their own prudence or convenience: and this seems to be so certainly true, that whosoever does, as our author, propose doctrines to the contrary, must either be thought rashly to utter that which he does not understand, or maliciously to cast balls of division among all nations, whereby every man's sword would be drawn against every man, to the total subversion of all order and government.

*****

S E C T. XIX.

Kings cannot confer the right of father upon princes, nor princes upon kings.

LEST what has been said before by our author should not be sufficient to accomplish his design of bringing confusion upon mankind, and some may yet lie still for want of knowing at whose command he should cut his brother's throat, if he has not power or courage to set up a title for himself, he has a new project that would certainly do his work, if it were received. Not content with the absurdities and untruths already uttered in giving the incommunicable right of fathers, not only to those who, as is manifestly testified fied by sacred and profane histories, did usurp a power over their fathers, or SECT. 19.

 such as owed no manner of obedience to them; and justifying those usurpations, which are most odious to God, and all good men, he now fancies a kingdom so gotten may escheat for want of an heir; whereas there is no need of seeking any, if usurpation can confer a right; and that he who gets the power into his hands ought to be reputed the right heir of the first progenitor; for such a one will be seldom wanting, if violence and fraud be justified by the command of God, and nations stand obliged to render obedience, till a stronger or more successful villain throws him from the throne he had invaded. But if it should come to pass that no man would step into the vacant place, he has a new way of depriving the people of their right to provide for the government of themselves. "Because, says he, "the dependency "of antient families is oft obscure, and worn out of knowledge; therefore the "wisdom of all or most princes hath thought fit many times to adopt those "for heads of families, and princes of provinces, whose merits, abilities, or "fortunes, have ennobled them, and made them fit and capable of such "royal favours: all such prime heads and fathers have power to consent to "the uniting and conferring of their fatherly right and sovereignty on whom
 "they please, &c."

I may justly ask how any one or more families come to be esteemed more antient than others, if all are descended from one common father, as the Scriptures testify; or to what purpose it were to inquire what families were the most antient, if there were any such, when the youngest and most mean by usurpation gets an absolute right of dominion over the eldest, tho' his own progenitors, as Nimrod did: but I may certainly conclude, that whatever the right be that belongs to those antient families, it is inherent in them, and cannot be conferred on any other by any human power; for it proceeds from nature only. The duty I owe to my father does not arise from an usurped or delegated power, but from my birth derived from him; and it is as impossible for any man to usurp or receive by the grant of another the right of a father over me, as for him to become, or pretend to be made my father by another who did not beget me. But if he say true, this right of father does not arise from nature; nor the obedience that I owe to him that begot me, from the benefits which I have received, but is merely an artificial thing, depending upon the will of another: and that we may be sure there can be no error in this, our author attributes it to the wisdom of princes. But before this comes to be authentic, we must at the least be sure that all princes have this great and profound wisdom, which our author acknowledges to be in them, and which is certainly necessary for the doing of such great things, if they were referred to them. They seem to us to be born like other men, and to be generally no wiser than other men. We are not obliged to believe that Nebuchadnezzar was wise, till God had given him the heart of a man; or that his grandson Belshazzar, who being laid in the balance was found too light, had any such profound wisdom. Ahasuerus shewed it not in appointing all the people of God to be slain, upon a lye told to him by a rascal; and the matter was not very much mended, when, being informed of the truth, he gave them leave to kill as many of their enemies

CHAP. I. mies as they pleased. The hardness of Pharaoh's heart, and the overthrow thereby brought upon himself and people, does not argue so profound a judgment as our author presumes every prince must have: and it is not probable, that Samuel would have told Saul, "he had done foolishly," if kings had always been so exceeding wise: nay, if wisdom had been annexed to the character, Solomon might have spared the pains of asking it from God, and Rehoboam must have had it. Not to multiply examples out of Scripture, it is believed, that Xerxes had not inflicted stripes upon the sea for breaking his navy in pieces, if he had been so very wise. Caligula for the same reason might have saved the labour of making love to the moon, or have chosen a fitter subject to advance to the consulate than his horse Incitatus: Nero had not endeavoured to make a woman of a man, nor married a man as a woman. Many other examples might be alledged to shew, that kings are not always wise: and not only the Roman satirist, who says "Quicquid delirant reges," &c. shews that he did not believe them to be generally wiser than other men; but Solomon himself judges them to be as liable to infirmities, when he prefers a wise child before an old and foolish king. If therefore the strength of our author's argument lies in the certainty of the wisdom of kings, it can be of no value, till he proves it to be more universal in them than history or experience will permit us to believe. Nay, if there be truth or wisdom in the Scripture, which frequently represents the wicked man as a fool, we cannot think, that all kings are wise, unless it be proved, that none of them have been wicked; and when this is performed by Filmer's disciples, I shall confess my error.

Sueton.

vit. Cal. c.

22, et 55.

Horat.

Epist. l. I. ii.

14.

Men give testimony of their wisdom, when they undertake that which they ought to do, and rightly perform that which they undertake; both which points do utterly fail in the subject of our discourse. We have often heard of such as have adopted those to be their sons who were not so, and some civil laws approve it. This signifies no more, than that such a man, either through affection to one who is not his son, or to his parents, or for some other reason, takes him into his family, and shews kindness to him, as to his son; but the adoption of fathers is a whimsical piece of nonsense. If this be capable of an aggravation, I think none can be greater, than not to leave it to my own discretion, who, having no father, may resolve to pay the duty I owed to my father to one who may have shewed kindness to me; but for another to impose a father upon a man, or a people composed of fathers, or such as have fathers, whereby they should be deprived of that natural honour and right, which he makes the foundation of his discourse, is the utmost of all absurdities. If any prince therefore have ever undertaken to appoint fathers of his people, he cannot be accounted a man of profound wisdom, but a fool, or a madman; and his acts can be of no value. But if the thing were consonant to nature, and referred to the will of princes (which I absolutely deny) the frequent extravagancies committed by them in the elevation of their favourites shew, that they intend not to make them fathers of the people, or know not what they do when they do it.

To

To chuse or institute a father is nonsense in the very term ; but if any were SECT. 19.
 to be chosen to perform the office of fathers to such as have none, and are not of age to provide for themselves (as men do tutors or guardians for orphans) none could be capable of being elected, but such as in kindness to the person they were to take under their care, did most resemble his true father, and had the virtues and abilities required rightly to provide for his good. If this fails, all right ceases ; and such a corruption is introduced as we saw in our court of wards, which the nation could not bear, when the institution was perverted, and the king, who ought to have taken a tender care of the wards and their estates, delivered them as a prey to those whom he favoured.

Our author ridiculously attributes the title and authority of father to the word prince ; for it hath none in it, and signifies no more than a man who in some kind is more eminent than the vulgar. In this sense Mutius Scævola told Porfenna, that “ three hundred princes of the Roman youth had conspired against him ;” by which he could not mean, that three hundred fathers of the Roman youth, but three hundred Roman young men had conspired : and they could not be fathers of the city, unless they had been fathers of their own fathers. “ Princeps senatus” was understood in the same sense ; and T. Sem-pronius the censor, chusing Q. Fabius Maximus to that honour, gave for a reason, “ se lecturum Q. Fabium Maximum, quem tum principem Romanæ civitatis esse, vel Annibale judice, dicturus esset ;” which could not be understood that Hannibal thought him to be the father or lord of the city (for he knew he was not) ; but the man, who for wisdom and valour was the most eminent in it.

The like are, and ought to be, the princes of every nation ; and though something of honour may justly be attributed to the descendents of such as have done great services to their country, yet they who degenerate from them cannot be esteemed princes ; much less can such honours or rights be conferred upon court-creatures or favourites. Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Galba, and others, could advance Macro, Pallas, Narcissus, Tigellinus, Vinnius, Laco, and the like, to the highest degrees of riches and power ; but they still continued to be villains, and so they died.

No wise or good man ever thought otherwise of those who through the folly of princes have been advanced to the highest places in several countries. The madness of attributing to them a paternal power, seems to have been peculiarly reserved to complete the infamy of our author ; for he only could acknowledge a cooptitious father, or give to another man the power of chusing him. I confess that a man in his infancy may have been exposed, like Moses, Cyrus, Oedipus, Romulus : he may have been taken in war ; or by the charity of some good person saved from the teeth of wild beasts, or from the sword by which his parents fell, and may have been educated with that care which fathers usually have of their children : it is reasonable, that such a one in the whole course of his life should pay that veneration and obedience to him, who gave him as it were a second birth, which was due to his natural father ; and this, tho’ improperly, may be

CHAP. I. called an adoption. But to think that any man can assume it to himself; or confer it upon another; and thereby arrogate to himself the service and obedience, which, by the most tender and sacred laws of nature, we owe to those from whom we receive birth and education; is the most preposterous folly that hitherto has ever entered into the heart of man.

Our author nevertheless is not ashamed of it, and gives reasons no way unfavourable to the proposition. "Men are, says he, adopted fathers of provinces for their abilities, merits, or fortunes." But these abilities can simply deserve nothing; for if they are ill employed, they are the worst of vices, and the most powerful instruments of mischief. Merits in regard of another, are nothing, unless they be to him; and he alone can merit from me the respect due to a father, who hath conferred benefits upon me, in some measure proportionable to those, which we usually receive from our fathers: and the world may judge, whether all the court-ministers and favourites that we have known, do upon this account deserve to be esteemed fathers of nations. But to allow this on account of their fortunes, is, if possible, more extravagant than any thing that hath been yet utter'd. By this account Mazarin must have been father of the French nation: the same right was inherited by his chaste niece, and remained in her, till she and her silly husband dissipated the treasures which her uncle had torn from the bowels of that people. The partizans may generally claim the same right over the provinces they have pillaged: old Audley, Dog Smith, Bp. Duppa, Brownloe, Child, Dashwood, Fox, &c. are to be esteemed fathers of the people of England. This doctrine is perfectly canonical, if Filmer and Heylin were good divines: and legal, if they judged more rightly touching matters of law. But if it be absurd and detestable, they are to be reputed men, who, by attributing the highest honours to the vilest wretches of the world, for what they had gained by the most abominable means, endeavour to increase those vices, which are already come to such a height, that they can by no other way be brought to a greater. Daily experience too plainly shews, with what rage avarice usually fills the hearts of men. There are not many destructive villainies committed in the world, that do not proceed from it. In this respect it is called "idolatry," and "the root of all evil." Solomon warns us to beware of such as make haste to grow rich, and says, they shall not be innocent. But it is no matter what the prophets, the apostles, or the wisest men, say of riches, and the ways of gaining them; for our author tells us, that men of the greatest fortunes, without examining how they came to them, or what use they make of them, deserve to be made fathers of provinces.

But this is not his only quarrel with all that is just and good: his whole book goes directly against the letter and spirit of the Scripture. The work of all those, whom God in several ages has raised up to announce his word, was to abate the lusts and passions that arise in the hearts of men; to shew the vanity of worldly enjoyments, with the dangers that accompany riches and honours, and to raise our hearts to the love of those treasures that perish not. Honest and wise men, following the light of nature, have in some measure imitated this. Such as

lived private lives, as Plato, Socrates, Epictetus, and others, made it their SECT. 19.
 business to abate mens lusts, by shewing the folly of seeking vain honours, useless riches, or unsatisfying pleasures; and those who were like to them, if they were raised to supreme magistracies, have endeavoured by the severest punishments to restrain men from committing the crimes by which riches are most commonly gained: but Filmer and Heylin lead us into a new way. If they deserve credit, whosoever would become supreme lord and father of his country, absolute, sacred, and inviolable, is only to kill him that is in the head of the government: usurpation confers an equal right with election or inheritance: we are to look upon the power, not the ways by which it is obtained: possession only is to be regarded; and men must venerate the present power, as set up by God, tho' gained by violence, treachery, or poison: children must not impose laws upon, nor examine the actions of their father. Those who are a little more modest, and would content themselves with the honour of being fathers and lords only of provinces, if they get riches by the favour of the king, or the favour of the king by riches, may receive that honour from him: the lord paramount may make them peculiar lords of each province as sacred to himself; and by that means every man shall have an immediate and subaltern father. This would be a spur to excite even the most sleeping lusts; and a poison that would fill the gentlest spirits with the most violent furies. If men should believe this, there would hardly be found one of whom it might not be said, "Hac spe, minanti fulmen, occurret Jovi." Senec. Theb.
 No more is required to fill the world with fire and blood, than the reception of these precepts: no man can look upon that as a wickedness, which shall render him sacred; nor fear to attempt that which shall make him God's vicerent. And I doubt, whether the wickedness of filling mens heads with such notions was ever equalled, unless by him who said, "Ye shall not die, but be as gods."

But since our author is pleased to teach us these strange things, I wish he would also have told us, how many men in every nation ought to be looked upon as adopted fathers: what proportion of riches, ability, or merit, is naturally or divinely required to make them capable of this sublime character: whether the right of this chimerical father does not destroy that of the natural; or whether both continue in force, and men thereby stand obliged, in despite of what Christ said, to serve two masters. For if the right of my artificial father arise from any act of the king in favour of his riches, abilities, or merit, I ought to know whether he is to excel in all, or any one of these points; how far; and which of them gives the preference; since it is impossible for me to determine whether my father, who may be wise, tho' not rich, is thereby divested of his right, and it comes to be transferred to another, who may be rich, tho' not wise, nor of any personal merit at all, till that point be decided; or so much as to guess, when I am emancipated from the duty I owe to him, by whom I was begotten and educated, unless I know whether he be fallen from his right, through want of merit, wisdom, or estate; and that can never be, till it be determined, that he hath forfeited his right, by being defective in all or any of the three; and what proportion of CHAP. I. merit, wisdom, or estate, is required in him, for the enjoyment of his right, or in another that would acquire it: for no man can succeed to the right of another, unless the first possessor be rightly deprived of it; and it cannot belong to them both, because common sense universally teaches, that two distinct persons cannot, at the same time, and in the same degree, have an equal right to the same individual thing.

The right of father cannot therefore be conferred upon princes by kings, but must for ever follow the rule of nature. The character of a father is indelible, and incommunicable: the duty of children arising from benefits received is perpetual, because they can never not have received them; and can be due only to him from whom they are received. For these reasons, we see, that such as our author calls princes, cannot confer it upon a king; for they cannot give what they have not in themselves: they who have nothing, can give nothing: they who are only supposititious, cannot make another to be real; and the whimsy of kings making princes to be fathers, and princes conferring that right on kings, comes to nothing.

S E C T. XX.

All just magistratical power is from the people.

HAVING proved that the right of a father proceeds from the generation and education of his children; that no man can have that right over those, whom he hath not begotten and educated; that every man hath it over those, who owe their birth and education to him; that all the sons of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and others, did equally inherit it; that, by the same reason, it doth for ever belong to every man that begets children; it plainly appears, that no father can have a right over others, unless it be by them granted to him, and that he receive his right from those who granted it. But our author, with an admirable sagacity peculiar to himself, discovers, and with equal confidence tells us, that that which is from the people, or the chief heads of them, is not from the people: "he that is so elected, says he, claims not his right from the people as a donative, but from God." That is, if I mistake not, Romulus was not made king of the Romans by that people, but by God: those men, being newly gathered together, had two fathers, tho' neither of them had any children; and no man knew who was their father, nor which of them was the elder: but Romulus by the slaughter of his brother decided all questions, and purchased to himself a royal charter from God; and the act of the people which conferred the power on him, was the act of God. We had formerly learnt, that whatsoever was done by monarchs, was to be imputed to God; and that whosoever murdered the father of a people, acquired the same right to himself: but now it seems, that nations also have the same privilege, and that God doth, what they do.

Now

Now I understand why it was said of old, "Vox populi est vox Dei:" but SECT. 20. if it was so in regard of Romulus, the same must be confessed of Tullus Hostilius, Ancus Martius, Tarquinius Priscus, and Servius Tullus; who being all strangers to each other, and most of them aliens also, were successively advanced by the same people, without any respect to the children, relations, or heirs of their predecessors. And I cannot comprehend, why the act of the same people should not have the same virtue, and be equally attributed to God, when they gave the same or more power to consuls, military tribunes, decemviri, or dictators; or why the same divine character should not be in the same manner conferred upon any magistracies, that by any people have been, are, or shall be at any time erected for the same ends.

Upon the same grounds we may conclude, that no privilege is peculiarly annexed to any form of government; but that all magistrates are equally the ministers of God, who perform the work for which they were instituted; and that the people which institutes them, may proportion, regulate and terminate their power, as to time, measure, and number of persons, as seems most convenient to themselves, which can be no other than their own good. For it cannot be imagined that a multitude of people should send for Numa, or any other person to whom they owed nothing, to reign over them, that he might live in glory and pleasure; or for any other reason, than that it might be good for them and their posterity. This shews the work of all magistrates to be always and every-where the same, even the doing of justice, and procuring the welfare of those that create them. This we learn from common sense; Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and the best human authors, lay it as an unmoveable foundation, upon which they build their arguments relating to matters of that nature: and the apostle from better authority declares, "That rulers are not a terror to good works, but to evil: wilt thou then be afraid; of the power? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise Rom. xiii. of the same; for he is the minister of God unto thee for good: but if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doth evil." And the reason he gives "for praying for kings, and all that 1 Tim. ii. are in authority," is, "that we may live a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty." But if this be the work of the magistrate, and the glorious name of God's minister be given to him for the performance of it, we may easily see to whom that title belongs. "His children and servants ye are, whose works ye do." He therefore, and he only, is the servant of God, who does the work of God; who is a terror to those that do evil, and a praise to those that do well; who beareth the sword for the punishment of wickedness and vice, and so governs, that the people may live quietly in all godliness and honesty. The order of his institution is inverted, and the institution vacated if the power be turned to the praise of those that do evil, and becomes a terror to such as do well; and that none who live honestly and justly can be quiet under it. If God be the fountain of justice, mercy, and truth, and those his servants who walk in them, no exercise of violence, fraud, cruelty, pride, or avarice, is patronized by him: and they who are the CHAP. I. the authors of those villainies, cannot but be the ministers of him, who sets himself up against God; because it is impossible, that truth and falshood, mercy, and cruelty, justice and the most violent oppression, can proceed from the same root. It was a folly and a lye in those Jews, to call themselves the children of Abraham, who did not the works of Abraham; and Christ declared them to be the children of the Devil, whose works they did: which words, proceeding from the eternal truth, do as well indicate to us whose child and servant every man is to be accounted, as to those who first heard them.

John viii. 39.

If our author's former assertions were void of judgment and truth, his next clause shews a great defect in his memory, and contradicts the former: "The judgments of God," says he, "who hath power to give and take away kingdoms, are most just; yet the ministry of men, who execute God's judgments without commission, is sinful and damnable." If it be true, as he says, that we are to look at the power, not the ways by which it is gained; and that he who hath it, whether it be by usurpation, conquest, or any other means, is to be accounted as father, or right heir to the father of the people, to which title the most sublime and divine privileges are annexed, a man, who by the most wicked and unjust actions advances himself to the power, becomes immediately the father of the people, and the minister of God; which I take to be a piece of divinity worthy our author and his disciples.

It may be doubted what he means by a commission from God; for we know of none but what is outwardly by his word, or inwardly by his Spirit: and I am apt to think, that neither he nor his abettors allowing of either, as to the point in question, he doth foully prevaricate, in alledging that which he thinks cannot be of any effect. If any man should say, that the word of God to Moses, Joshua, Ehud, Gideon, Samuel, Jeroboam, and Jehu, or any others, are, in the like cases, rules to be observed by all; because that which was from God was good; that which was good, is good; and he that does good, is justified by it; he would probably tell us, that what was good in them, is not good in others: and that the word of God doth justify those only to whom it is spoken: that is to say, no man can execute the just judgments of God, to the benefit of mankind, according to the example of those servants of God, without damnable sin, unless he have a precise word particularly directed to him for it, as Moses had. But if any man should pretend, that such a word was come to him, he would be accounted an enthusiast, and obtain no credit. So that, which way soever the clause be taken, it appears to be full of fraud, confessing only in the theory, that which he thinks can never be brought into practice; that his beloved villainies may be thereby secured, and that the glorious examples of the most heroic actions, performed by the best and wisest men that ever were in the world for the benefit of mankind, may never be imitated.

The next clause shews, that I did our author no wrong in saying, that he gave a right to usurpation; for he plainly says, "That whether the prince be the

“ the supreme father of his people, or the true heir of such a father; or SECT. 20.
 “ whether he come to the crown by usurpation, or election of the nobles or “ people, or by any other way whatsoever, &c. it is the only right and au“ thority of the natural father.” In the 3d Chap. Sect. 8. “ It skills not “ which way the king comes by his power, whether by election, donation, “ succession, or by any other means.” And in another place, “ That we “ are to regard the power, not the means by which it is gained.” To which I need say no more, than that I cannot sufficiently admire the ingeniously invented title of father by usurpation; and confess, that since there is such a thing in the world, to which not only private men, but whole nations owe obedience, whatsoever has been said antiently (as was thought, to express the highest excess of fury and injustice), as, “ jus datum sceleri; jus omne in ferro Lucan, &c.
 “ est situm; jus licet in jugulos nostros sibi fecerit ense; Sylla potens, Ma- “ riusque ferox, & Cinna cruentus, Cæsareæque domus series,” were solid truths, good law and divinity; which did only signify the actual exercise of the power, but induced a conscientious obligation of obeying it. The powers so gained did carry in themselves the most sacred and inviolable rights; and the actors of the most detestable villainies thereby became the ministers of God, and the fathers of their subdued people. Or if this be not true, it cannot be denied, that Filmer and his followers, in the most impudent and outrageous blasphemy, have surpassed all that have gone before them.

To confirm his assertions, he gives us a wonderful explanation of the fifth commandment; which, he says, enjoins obedience to princes, under the terms of “ honour thy father and thy mother;” drawing this inference, “ that as “ all power is in the father, the prince who hath it, cannot be restrained
 “ by any law; which being grounded upon the perfect likeness between kings “ and fathers, no man can deny it to be true.” But if Claudius was the father of the Roman people, I suppose the chaste Messalina was the mother, and to be honoured by virtue of the same commandment: but then I fear that such as met her in the most obscene places, were not only guilty of adultery, but of incest. The same honour must needs belong to Nero, and his virtuous Poppeæ, unless it were transferred to his new-made woman Sporus; or perhaps he himself was the mother, and the glorious title of “ pater pa- “ triæ” belonged to the rascal, who married him as a woman. The like may be said of Agathocles, Dionysius, Phalaris, Busiris, Machanidas, Peter the Cruel of Castile, Christiern of Denmark, the last princes of the house of Valois in France, and Philip the second of Spain. Those actions of theirs, which men have ever esteemed most detestable, and the whole course of their abominable government, did not proceed from pride, avarice, cruelty, madness, and lust, but from the tender care of most pious fathers. Tacitus sadly describes the state of his country: “ Urbs incendiis vastata, consumtis anti- Hist. l. i. c. 2.
 “ quissimis delubris, ipso capitolio civium manibus incenso; pollutæ ceremo- “ niæ; magna adulteria; plenum exiliis mare; infecti cædibus scopuli; atro- “ cius in urbe sævitum; nobilitas, opes, omissi vel gesti honores pro cri-
 “ mine, et ob virtutes certissimum exitium.” But he was to blame: all this proceeded

CHAP. I. proceeded from the ardency of paternal affection. When Nero, by the death of Helvidius Priscus and Thraseas, endeavoured to cut up virtue by the roots, Tacit. Ann. "ipsam excindere virtutem," he did it, because he knew it was good for l. xvi. 21. the world that there should be no virtuous man in it. When he fired the city, and when Caligula wished the people had but one neck, that he might strike it off at one blow, they did it through a prudent care of their childrens good, knowing that it would be for their advantage to be destroyed; and that the empty desolated world would be no more troubled with popular seditions. By the same rule Pharaoh, Eglon, Nebuchodonosor, Antiochus, Herod, and the like, were fathers of the Hebrews. And without looking far backward, or depending upon the faith of history, we may enumerate many princes, who in a paternal care of their people, have not yielded to Nero or Caligula. If our author say true, all those actions of theirs, which we have attributed to the utmost excess of pride, cruelty, avarice, and perfidiousness, proceeded from their princely wisdom, and fatherly kindness to the nations under them: and we are beholden to him for the discovery of so great a mystery, which hath been hid from mankind from the beginning of the world to this day: if not, we may still look upon them as children of the devil; and continue to believe, that princes as well as other magistrates were set up by the people for the public good; that the praises given to such as are wise, just, and good, are purely personal, and can belong only to those, who by a due exercise of their power do deserve it, and to no others.

---

C H A P. II.

S E C T. I.

That it is natural for nations to govern, or to chuse governors; and that virtue only gives a natural preference of one man above another, or reason why one should be chosen rather than another.

IN this chapter our author fights valiantly against Bellarmine and Suarez, seeming to think himself victorious, if he can shew that either of them hath contradicted the other, or himself; but being no way concerned in them, I shall leave their followers to defend their quarrel: my work is to seek after truth; and, tho' they may have said some things, in matters not concerning their beloved cause of popery, that are agreeable to reason, law, or scripture, I have little hope of finding it among those who apply themselves chiefly to school-sophistry, as the best means to support idolatry. That which I maintain, is the cause of mankind; which ought not to suffer, tho' champions of corrupt principles have weakly defended, or maliciously betrayed it: and therefore not at all relying on their authority, I intend to reject whatsoever they say that agrees not with reason, scripture, or the approved examples of the best polished nations. He also attacks Plato and Aristotle, upon whose opinions I set a far greater value, inasmuch as they seem to have penetrated more deeply into the secrets of human nature; and not only to have judged more rightly of the interests of mankind, but also to have comprehended in their writings the wisdom of the Grecians, with all they had learnt from the Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Hebrews; which may lead us to the discovery of the truth we seek. If this be our work, the question is not, whether it be a "paradox," or "a received opinion, that the people naturally govern or chuse governors," but whether it be true or not; for many paradoxes are true, and the most gross errors have often been most common. Tho' I hope to prove, that what he calls a paradox, is not only true; but a truth planted in the hearts of men, and acknowledged so to be by all that have hearkened to the voice of nature, and disapproved by none, but such as through wickedness, stupidity, or baseness of spirit, seem to have degenerated into the worst of beasts, and to have retained nothing of men, but the outward shape, or the ability of doing those mischiefs which they have learnt from their master the Devil.

I

WE

CHAP. II. We have already seen, that the patriarchal power resembles not the regal in principle or practice: that the beginning and continuance of regal power was contrary to, and inconsistent with the patriarchal: that the first fathers of mankind left all their children independent on each other, and in an equal liberty of providing for themselves: that every man continued in this liberty, till the number so increased, that they became troublesome and dangerous to each other; and finding no other remedy to the disorders growing, or like to grow among them, joined many families into one civil body, that they might the better provide for the conveniency, safety, and defence of themselves and their children. This was a collation of every man's private right into a publick stock; and no one having any other right than what was common to all, except it were that of fathers over their children, they were all equally free when their fathers were dead; and nothing could induce them to join, and lessen that natural liberty by joining in societies, but the hopes of a publick advantage. Such as were wise and valiant procured it, by setting up regular governments, and placing the best men in the administration; whilst the weakest and basest fell under the power of the most boisterous and violent of their neighbours. Those of the first sort had their root in wisdom and justice, and are called lawful kingdoms or commonwealths; and the rules by which they are governed, are known by the name of laws. These governments have ever been the nurses of virtue: the nations living under them have flourished in peace and happiness, or made wars with glory and advantage: whereas the other sort, springing from violence and wrong, have ever gone under the odious title of tyrannies; and by fomenting vices, like to those from whence they grew, have brought shame and misery upon those who were subject to them. This appears so plainly in scripture, that the assertors of liberty want no other patron than God himself; and his word so fully justifies what we contend for, that it were not necessary to make use of human authority, if our adversaries did not oblige us to examine such as are cited by them. This, in our present case, would be an easy work, if our author had rightly marked the passages he would make use of, or had been faithful in his interpretation or explication of such as he truly cites; but failing grossly in both, it is hard to trace him.

He cites the 16th chapter of the third book of Aristotle's politics, and I do not find there is more than twelve; or tho' that wound might be cured, by saying the words are in the twelfth, his fraud in perverting the sense were unpardonable, tho' the other mistake be passed over. It is true that Aristotle doth there seem to doubt whether there be any such thing as one man naturally a lord over many citizens, since a city consists of equals: but in the whole scope of that chapter, book, and his other writings, he fully shews his doubt did not arise from an imagination that one man could naturally inherit a right of dominion over many not descended from him; or that they were born under a necessity of being slaves to him (for such fancies can proceed only from distempered brains); but that civil societies aiming at the public good, those who by nature were endowed with such virtues or talents as were most beneficial to them, ought to be preferred. And nothing can be more contrary to

to the frantic whimsy of our author, who fancies an hereditary prerogative SECT. I.
of dominion inherent in a person as father of a people, or heir, or to be reputed heir of the first father, when it is certain he is not, but that either he or his predecessor came in by election or usurpation, than to shew that it is only wisdom, justice, valour, and other commendable virtues, which are not hereditary, that can give the preference; and that the only reason why it should be given, is that men so qualified can better than others accomplish the ends for which societies are constituted: for tho', says he, all are equally free, all are not equally endowed with those virtues that render liberty safe, prosperous, and happy. That equality which is just among equals, is just only among equals; but such as are base, ignorant, vicious, slothful, or cowardly, are not equal in natural or acquired virtues, to the generous, wise, valiant, and industrious; nor equally useful to the societies in which they live: they cannot therefore have an equal part in the government of them;
they cannot equally provide for the common good; and it is not a personal, but a public benefit, that is sought in their constitution and continuance. There may be a hundred thousand men in an army, who are all equally free; but they only are naturally most fit to be commanders or leaders, who most excel in the virtues required for the right performance of those offices; and that, not because it is good for them to be raised above their brethren, but because it is good for their brethren to be guided by them, as it is ever good to be governed by the wisest and the best. If the nature of man be reason, "detur digniori," in matters of this kind, is the voice of nature; and it were not only a deviation from reason, but a most desperate and mischievous madness, for a company going to the Indies, to give the guidance of their ship to the son of the best pilot in the world, if he want the skill required to that employment, or to one who was maliciously set to destroy them; and he only can have a right grounded upon the dictates of nature, to be advanced to the helm, who best knows how to govern it, and has given the best testimonies of his integrity and intentions to employ his skill for the good of those that are embarked.
But as the work of a magistrate, especially if he be the supreme, is the highest, noblest, and most difficult, that can be committed to the charge of a man, a more excellent virtue is required in the person who is to be advanced to it, than for any other; and he that is most excellent in that virtue, is reasonably and naturally to be preferred before any other. Aristotle having this in his view, seems to think, that those who believed it not to be natural for one man to be lord of all the citizens, since a city consists of equals, had not observed that inequality of endowments, virtues, and abilities, in men, which render some more fit than others, for the performance of their duties, and the work intended; but it will not be found, as I suppose, that he did ever dream of a natural superiority, that any man could ever have in a civil society, unless it be such a superiority in virtue, as most conduces to the public good.

He confirms this in proceeding to examine the different sorts of governments, according to the different dispositions of nations; and is so bold to say, "that a popular government is the best for a people, who are naturally generous

CHAP. II. "and warlike: that the government of a few suits best with those, among "whom a few men are found to excel others in those virtues that are profi"table to societies; and that the government of one is good, when that one "does so far surpass all others in those virtues, that he hath more of them "than all the rest of the people together:" and for the same reason that induced him to believe that equality is just amongst equals, he concludes inequality of power to be most unjust, unless there be inequality of merit; and equality of power to be so also, when there is inequality of virtue, that being the only rule by which every man's part ought to be regulated.

But if it be neither reasonable nor just that those who are not equal in virtue should be made equal in power; or that such as are equal in virtue should be unequal in power, the most brutal and abominable of all extrava-gancies is to make one or a few, who in virtue and abilities to perform civil functions are inferior to others, superior to all in power; and the miseries suffered by those nations, who inverting the laws of nature and reason, have placed children, or men of no virtue, in the government, when men that excelled in all virtues were not wanting, do so far manifest this truth, that the pains of proving it may be spared.

It is not necessary for me to inquire, whether it be possible to find such a man as Aristotle calls "naturâ regem," or whether he intended to recommend Alexander to the world, for the man designed by God and nature to be king over all, because no man was equal to him in the virtues that were beneficial to all. For pursuing my position, that virtue only can give a just and natural preference, I ingenuously confess that when such a man, or race of men as he describes, shall appear in the world, they carry the true marks of sovereignty upon them: we ought to believe, that God has raised them above all, whom he has made to excel all: it were an impious folly to think of reducing him into the ordinary level of mankind, whom God has placed above it. It were better for us to be guided by him, than to follow our own judgment;
 nay, I could almost say, it were better to serve such a master, than to be free.
 But this will be nothing to the purpose, till such a man, or succession of men, do appear; and if our author would persuade us, that all mankind, or every particular, is obliged to a perpetual subjection to one man or family, upon any other condition, he must do it by the credit of those who favour his design more than Aristotle.

I know not who that will be, but am confident he will find no help from Plato: for if his principles be examined, by which a grave author's sense is best comprehended, it will appear, that all his books of laws, and of a commonwealth, are chiefly grounded upon this, "that magistrates are chosen by "societies, seeking their own good; and that the best men ought to be chosen for "the attaining of it:" whereas his whole design of seeking which is the best form of government, or what laws do most conduce to its perfection and permanency (if one rule were by nature appointed for all, and none could justly transgress it; if God had designed an universal lord over the whole world, or a particular one over every nation, who could be bound by no law), were utterly absurd; and they who write books concerning political matters,
 and

Plato de leg.
 & de republ.

and take upon them to instruct nations how to govern themselves, would SECT. I.
 be found either foolishly to mis-spend their time, or impiously to incite people to rebel against the ordinance of God. If this can justly be imputed to Plato, he is not the wise man he is supposed to have been; and can less deserve the title of divine, which our author gives him: but if he remain justly free from such censures, it must be confessed, that whilst he seeks what is good for a people, and to convince them by reason that it is so, he takes it for granted, that they have a liberty of chusing that which appears to be the best to them. He first says, "that this good consists in the obtaining of justice;" Plato de leg.
 but farther explaining himself, he shews, "that under the name of justice he " comprehends all that tends to their perfection and felicity; inasmuch as " every people, by joining in a civil society, and creating magistrates, doth " seek its own good; and it is just, that he or they who are created, should,
 " to the utmost of their power, accomplish the end of their creation, and " lead the people to justice, without which there is neither perfection nor " happiness: that the proper act of justice is to give to every one his due;
 " to man that which belongs to man, and to God that which is God's.
 " But as no man can be just, or desire to be so, unless he know, that " justice is good; nor know that it is good, unless he know that original
 " justice and goodness, through which all that is just is just, and all that " is good is good, it is impossible for any man to perform the part of a " good magistrate, unless he have the knowledge of God; or to bring a
 " a people to justice, unless he bring them to the knowledge of God, who " is the root of all justice and goodness." If Plato therefore deserve credit, he only can duly perform the part of a good magistrate, whose moral virtues are ripened and heightened by a superinduction of divine knowledge. "The misery of man proceeds from his being separated from God: this separation is wrought by corruption: his restitution therefore to felicity and integrity, can only be brought about by his reunion to the good from which he is fallen." Plato looks upon this as the only worthy object of man's desire; and in his laws and politics he intends not to teach us how to erect manufactures, and to increase trade or riches; but how magistrates may be helpful to nations in the manner before-mentioned, and consequently what men are fit to be magistrates. If our author therefore would make use of Plato's doctrine to his end, he ought to have proved, that there is a family in every nation, to the chief of which, and successively to the next in blood, God does ever reveal and infuse such a knowledge of himself, as may render him a light to others; and, failing in this, all that he says is to no purpose.

The weakness in which we are born, renders us unable to attain the good of ourselves: we want help in all things, especially in the greatest. The fierce barbarity of a loose multitude, bound by no law, and regulated by no discipline, is wholly repugnant to it: whilst every man fears his neighbour, and has no other defence than his own strength, he must live in that perpetual anxiety which is equally contrary to that happiness, and that sedate temper of mind which is required for the search of it. The first step towards

CHAP. II. wards the cure of this pestilent evil, is for many to join in one body, that every one may be protected by the united force of all; and the various talents that men possess, may by good discipline be rendered useful to the whole; as the meanest piece of wood or stone, being placed by a wise architect, conduces to the beauty of the most glorious building. But every man bearing in his own breast affections, passions, and vices, that are repugnant to this end, and no man owing any submission to his neighbour; none will subject the correction or restriction of themselves to another, unless he also submit to the same rule. They are rough pieces of timber or stone, which it is necessary to cleave, saw, or cut: this is the work of a skilful builder, and he only is capable of erecting a great fabric, who is so; magistrates are political architects: and they only can perform the work incumbent on them, who excel in political virtues. Nature, in variously framing the minds of men, according to the variety of uses in which they may be employed, in order to the institution and preservation of civil societies, must be our guide, in allotting to every one his proper work. And Plato, observing this variety, affirms, "that the laws of nature cannot be more absurdly violated, than by giving the government of a people to such, as do not excel others in those arts and virtues that tend to the ultimate ends for which governments are instituted." By this means those who are slaves by nature, or rendered so by their vices, are often set above those that God and nature had fitted for the highest commands; and societies which subsist only by order, fall into corruption, when all order is so preposterously inverted, and the most extreme confusion introduced.

Eccl. x. 7. This is an evil that Solomon detested: "Folly is set in great dignity, and the rich sit in low places: I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth." They who understand Solomon's language, will easily see, that the rich, and the princes he means, are such only who are rich in virtue and wisdom, and who ought to be preferred for those qualities: and when he says, a servant that reigneth is one of the "three things the earth cannot bear," he can only mean such as deserve to be servants; for when they reign, they do not serve, but are served by others: which perfectly agrees with what we learn from Plato, and plainly shews, that true philosophy is perfectly conformable with what is taught us by those who were divinely inspired. Therefore, tho' I should allow to our author, that Aristotle, in those words, "it seems to some, not to be natural for one man to be lord of all the citizens, since the city consists of equals," did speak the opinion of others rather than his own; and should confess, that he and his master Plato, did acknowledge a natural inequality among men; it would be nothing to his purpose: for the inequality, and the rational superiority due to some, or to one, by reason of that inequality, did not proceed from blood or extraction, and had nothing patriarchal in it; but consisted solely in the virtues of the persons, by which they were rendered more able than others to perform their duty, for the good of the society. Therefore, if these authors are to be trusted, whatsoever place a man is advanced to in a city, it is not for his own sake, but for that of the city; and we are not to ask who was his father, but what are are his virtues in relation to it. This induces a necessity of distinguishing SECT. I. between a simple and a relative inequality; for, if it were possible for a man to have great virtues, and yet no way beneficial to the society of which he is, or to have some one vice that renders them useless, he could have no pretence to a magistratical power more than any other. They who are equally free, may equally enjoy their freedom; but the powers that can only be executed by such as are endowed with great wisdom, justice, and valour, can belong to none, nor be rightly conferred upon any, except such as excel in those virtues. And if no such can be found, all are equally by turns to participate of the honours annexed to magistracy; and law, which is said to be written reason, cannot justly exalt those whom nature, which is reason, hath depressed, nor depress those whom nature hath exalted. It cannot make kings slaves, nor slaves kings, without introducing that evil, which, if we believe Solomon, and the Spirit by which he spoke, "the earth cannot bear." This may discover what lawgivers deserve to be reputed wise or just; and what decrees or sanctions ought to be reputed laws. Aristotle, proceeding by this rule, rather tells us, who is naturally a king, than where we should find him; and after having given the highest praises to this true natural king, and his government, he sticks not to declare that of one man, in virtue equal or inferior to others, to be a mere tyranny, even the worst of all, as it is the corruption of the best (or, as our author calls it, the most divine), and such as can be fit only for those barbarous and stupid nations, which, tho' bearing the shape of men, are little different from beasts. Whoever therefore will from Aristotle's words infer, that nature has designed one man, or succession of men, to be lords of every country, must shew that man to be endowed with all the virtues, that render him fit for so great an office, which he does not bear for his own pleasure, glory, or profit, but for the good of those that are under him; and, if that be not done, he must look after other patrons than Aristotle for his opinion.

Plato does more explicitly say, that the civil or politic man, the shepherd, father, or king of a people, is the same, designed for the same work, enabled to perform it by the excellency of the same virtues, and made perfect by the infusion of the divine wisdom. This is Plato's monarch, and I confess, that wheresoever he does appear in the world, he ought to be accounted as sent from God for the good of that people. His government is the best that can be set up among men; and if assurance can be given, that his children, heirs, or successors, shall for ever be equal to him in the above-mentioned virtues, it were a folly, and a sin, to bring him under the government of any other, or to an equality with them, since God had made him to excel them all; and it is better for them to be ruled by him, than to follow their own judgment. This is that which gives him the preference: "He is wise through the knowledge of the truth, and thereby becomes good, happy, pure, beautiful, and perfect. The divine light, shining forth in him, is a guide to others; and he is a fit leader of a people to the good that he enjoys." If this can be expressed by words in fashion, this is his Prerogative; this is the Royal Charter given to him by God; and to him only, who is

Plato in Al-
cib. l. i. 2.

CHAP. II. It is so adapted for the performance of his office. He that should pretend to the same privileges, without the same abilities to perform the works for which they are granted, would exceed the folly of a child, that takes upon him a burden which can only be borne by a giant; or the madness of one who presumes to give physic, and understands not the art of a physician, thereby drawing guilt upon himself, and death upon his patient. It were as vain to expect that a child should carry the giant's burden, and that an ignorant man should give wholesome physic, as that one who lives void of all knowledge of good, should conduct men to it. Whensoever therefore such a man as is above-described, does not appear, nature and reason instruct us to seek him or them who are most like to him; and to lay such burdens upon them as are proportionable to their strength; which is as much as to say, to prefer every man according to his merit, and assign to every one such works as he seems able to accomplish.

But that Plato and Aristotle may neither be thought unreasonably addicted to monarchy; nor, wholly rejecting it, to have talked in vain of a monarch, that is not to be found; it is good to consider that this is not a fiction. Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and others, were such as they define; and were made to be such, by that communion with God which Plato requires: and he in all his writings, intending the institution of such a discipline as should render men happy, wise, and good, could take no better way to bring his countrymen to it, than by shewing them, that wisdom, virtue, and purity, only, could make a natural difference among men.

'Tis not my work to justify these opinions of Plato, and his scholar Aristotle: they were men, and tho' wise and learned, subject to error. If they erred in these points, it hurts not me, nor the cause I maintain, since I make no other use of their books, than to shew the impudence and prevarication of those, who gather small scraps out of good books, to justify their assertions concerning such kings as are known amongst us; which, being examined, are found to be wholly against them; and, if they were followed, would destroy their persons and power.

But our author's intention being only to cavil, or to cheat such as are not versed in the writings of the ancients, or at least to cause those who do not make truth their guide, to waver and fluctuate in their discourses, he does in one page say, "That without doubt Moses's history of the creation guided these philosophers in finding out this lineal subjection:" and in the next affirms, "That the ignorance of the creation occasioned several amongst the heathen philosophers to think that men met together as herds of cattle:" whereas they could not have been ignorant of the creation, if they had read the books that Moses writ; and having that knowledge, they could not think that men met together as herds of cattle. However, I deny that any of them did ever dream of that lineal subjection, derived from the first parents of mankind, or that any such thing was to be learnt from Moses. Tho' they did not perhaps justly know the beginning of mankind, they did know the beginnings and progress of the governments under which they lived; and, being assured that the first kingdoms had been those, which they called "heroum regna," that is, of those who had been most beneficial to mankind; that their descendents in many places, degenerating from their virtues, had given SECT. 2. nations occasion to set up aristocracies; and they also falling into corruption, to institute democracies, or mixed governments; did rightly conclude, that every nation might justly order their own affairs according to their own pleasure, and could have neither obligation nor reason to set up one man or a few above others, unless it did appear to them that they had more of those virtues, which conduce to the good of civil societies, than the rest of their brethren.
their

Our author's cavil upon Aristotle's opinion, "That those who are wise in mind are by nature fitted to be lords, and those who are strong of body ordained to obey," deserves no answer; for he plainly falsifies the text: Aristotle speaks only of those qualities which are required for every purpose; and means no more, than that such as are eminent in the virtues of the mind deserve to govern, tho' they do not excel in bodily strength; and that they who are strong of body, tho' of little understanding, and incapable of commanding, may be useful in executing the commands of others: but is so far from denying that one man may excel in all the perfections of mind and body, that he acknowledges him only to be a king by nature who does so, both being required for the full performance of his duty. And if this be not true, I suppose that one who is like Agrippa Posthumus, "corporis viribus stolide Tac. ann. l. "ferox," may be fit to govern many nations; and Moses or Samuel, if they i. 3. naturally wanted bodily strength, or that it decayed by age, might justly be made slaves, which is a discovery worthy our author's invention.

S E C T. II.

Every man that hath children, hath the right of a father, and is capable of preferment in a society composed of many.

I Am not concerned in making good what Suarez says: a jesuit may speak that which is true; but it ought to be received, as from the devil, cautiously, lest mischief be hid under it: and Sir Robert's frequent prevarications upon the scripture, and many good authors, give reason to suspect he may have falsified one, that few protestants read, if it served to his purpose; and not mentioning the place, his fraud cannot easily be discovered, unless it be by one who has leisure to examine all his vastly voluminous writings. But as to the point in question, that pains may be saved; there is nothing that can be imputed to the invention of Suarez; for, "that Adam had only an oeconomical, not a political power," is not the voice of a jesuit, but of nature and common sense: for politic signifying no more in Greek, than civil in Latin, it is evident there could be no civil power, where there was no civil society; and there could be none between him and his children, because

CHAP. II. a civil society is composed of equals, and fortified by mutual compacts, which could not be between him and his children; at least, if there be any thing of truth in our author's doctrine, "that all children do perpetually and absolutely depend upon the will of their father." Suarez seems to have been of another opinion; and observing the benefits we receive from parents, and the veneration we owe to them to be reciprocal, he could not think any duty could extend farther than the knowledge of the relation upon which it was grounded; and makes a difference between the power of a father, before and after his children are made free; that is in truth, before and after they are able to provide for themselves, and to deliver their parents from the burden of taking care of them: which will appear rational to any who are able to distinguish between what a man of fifty years old, subsisting by himself, and having a family of his own, or a child of eight, doth owe to his father: the same reason that obliges a child to submit intirely to the will of his parents, when he is utterly ignorant of all things, does permit, and often injoin, men of ripe age to examine the commands they receive before they obey them; and it is not more plain, that I owe all manner of duty, affection, and respect, to him that did beget and educate me, than that I can owe nothing on any such account to one that did neither.

This may have been the opinion of Suarez: but I can hardly believe such a notion, as, "that Adam in process of time might have servants," could proceed from any other brain than our author's; for if he had lived to this day, he could have had none under him but his own children; and if a family be not complete without servants, his must always have been defective; and his kingdom must have been so too, if that has such a resemblance to a family as our author fancies. This is evident, that a hard father may use his children as servants, or a rebellious stubborn son may deserve to be so used; and a gentle and good master may shew that kindness to faithful and well-deserving servants, which resembles the sweetness of a fatherly rule: but neither of them can change their nature; a son can never grow to be a servant, nor a servant to be a son. If a family therefore be not complete, unless it consist of children and servants, it cannot be like to a kingdom or city, which is composed of freemen and equals: servants may be in it, but are not members of it. As truth can never be repugnant to justice, it is impossible this should be a prejudice to the paternal rule, which is most just; especially when a grateful remembrance of the benefits received doth still remain, with a necessary and perpetual obligation of repaying them in all affection and duty: whereas the care of ever providing for their families, as they did probably increase in the time of our first long-living fathers, would have been an insupportable burden to parents, if it had been incumbent on them. We do not find that Adam exercised any such power over Cain, when he had slain Abel, as our author fancies to be regal: the murderer went out, and built a city for himself, and called it by the name of his first-born. And we have not the least reason to believe, that after Adam's death Cain had any dominion over his brethren, or their posterity; or any one of them over him and his. He feared that whosoever saw saw him would kill him, which language does not agree with the rights belonging to the haughty title of heir apparent to the dominion of the whole earth. The like was practised by Noah and his sons, who set up colonies for themselves; but lived as private men in obscure places, whilst their children of the fourth or fifth generation, especially of the youngest and accursed son, were great and powerful kings, as is fully proved in the first chapter.

Tho' this had been otherwise, it would have no effect upon us; for no argument drawn from the examples of Shem, Ham, and Japhet, if they and their children had continued under the dominion of Noah as long as he lived, can oblige me to resign myself, and all my concernments, absolutely into the hands of one who is not my father. But when the contrary is evidently true in them, and their next ensuing generations, it is an admirable boldness in our author to think of imposing upon us for an eternal and universal law (when the knowledge of our first progenitors is utterly extinguished) that which was not at all regarded by those, who could not be ignorant of their own original, or the duty thereby incumbent upon them, or their immediate fathers then living, to whom the rights must have belonged, if there had been any such thing in nature, or that they had been of any advantage to them: whereas in truth, if there had been such a law in the beginning, it must have vanished of itself, for want of being exercised in the beginning, and could not possibly be revived after four thousand years, when no man in the world can possibly know to whom the universal right of dominion over the whole world, or particular nations, does belong; for it is in vain to speak of a right, when no one man can have a better title to it than any other. But there being no precept in the scripture for it, and the examples directed or approved by God himself, and his most faithful servants, being inconsistent with, and contrary to it, we may be sure there never was any such thing; and that men being left to the free use of their own understanding, may order and dispose of their own affairs as they think fit. No man can have a better title than another, unless for his personal virtues; every man that in the judgment of those concerned excels in them, may be advanced: and those nations that through mistake set up such as are unworthy, or do not take right measures in providing for a succession of men worthy, and other things necessary to their welfare, may be guilty of great folly, to their own shame and misery; but can do no injustice to any, in relation to an hereditary right, which can be naturally in none.

Discourses concerning Government.

S E C T. III.

Government is not instituted for the good of the governor, but of the governed; and power is not an advantage, but a burden.

THE follies with which our author endeavours to corrupt and trouble the world, seem to proceed from his fundamental mistakes of the ends for which governments are constituted; and from an opinion, that an excessive power is good for the governor, or the diminution of it a prejudice: whereas common sense teaches, and all good men acknowledge, that governments are not set up for the advantage, profit, pleasure, or glory of one or a few men, but for the good of the society. For this reason Plato and Aristotle find no more certain way of distinguishing between a lawful king and a tyrant, than that the first seeks to procure the common good, and the other his own pleasure or profit; and doubt not to declare, that he who according to his institution was the first, destroys his own being, and degenerates into the latter, if he deflect from that rule: he that was the best of men, becomes the worst; and the father or shepherd of the people makes himself their enemy. And we may from hence collect, that in all controversies concerning the power of magistrates, we are not to examine what conduces to their profit or glory, but what is good for the public.

His second error is no less gross and mischievous than the first; and that absolute power to which he would exalt the chief magistrate, would be burdensome, and desperately dangerous, if he had it. The highest places are always slippery: mens eyes dazle when they are carried up to them; and all falls from them are mortal. Few kings or tyrants, says * Juvenal, go down to the grave in peace; and he did not imprudently couple them together, because in his time few or no kings were known who were not tyrants. Dionysius thought no man left a tyranny, till he was drawn out by the heels. Ann. l. i. 11. But Tacitus says, "nescit quam grave & intolerandum sit cuncta regendi onus †." Moses could not bear it: Gideon would not accept of any resemblance of it. The moral sense of Jotham's wise parable is eternal: the bramble coveted the power, which the vine, olive, and fig-tree refused. The worst and basest of men are ambitious of the highest places, which the best and wisest reject; or if some, who may be otherwise well qualified——

[In this place two pages are wanting in the original manuscript.]

——as the fittest to be followed by mankind. If these philosophers and divines deserve credit, Nimrod, Ninus, Pharaoh, and the rest of that accursed crew,

*——Sine cæde & sanguine pauci

Descendunt reges, & ficca morte tyranni. Juven. Sat. x. l. 112.

† It is somewhat different in Tacitus. Tiberius, after Augustus's death, says in his speech to the senate, "Se——experiendo didicisse, quam arduum, quam subjectum fortunæ, regendi cuncta onus."

crew, did not commit such excesses as were condemned by God, and abhorred by good men; but, gaining to themselves the glorious character of his vicegerents, left their practices as a perpetual law to all succeeding generations; whereby the world, and every part of it, would be for ever exposed to the violence, cruelty, and madness, of the most wicked men that it should produce. But if these opinions comprehend an extravagancy of wickedness and madness, that was not known among men, till some of these wretches presumed to attempt the increase of that corruption under which mankind groans, by adding fuel to the worst of all vices; we may safely return to our propositions, that, God having established no such authority as our author fansies, nations are left to the use of their own judgment, in making provision for their own welfare; that there is no lawful magistrate over any of them, but such as they have set up; that in creating them, they do not seek the advantage of their magistrate, but their own: and, having found that an absolute power over the people is a burden, which no man can bear; and that no wise or good man ever desired it; from thence conclude, that it is not good for any to have it, nor just for any to affect it, tho' it were personally good for himself; because he is not exalted to seek his own good, but that of the public.

S E C T. IV.

The paternal right devolves to, and is inherited by, all the children.

TH O' the perversity of our author's judgment and nature may have driven him into the most gross errors, it is not amiss to observe, that many of those delivered by him proceed from his ignorance of the most important differences between father and lord, king and tyrant; which are so evident and irreconcilable, that one would have thought no man could be so stupid as not to see it impossible for one and the same man, at the same time, to be father and master, king and tyrant, over the same persons. But lest he should think me too scrupulous, or too strict in inquiring after truth, I intend for the present to wave that inquiry, and to seek what was good for Adam and Noah; what we have reason to believe they desired to transmit to their posterity, and to take it for a perpetual law in its utmost extent; which I think will be of no advantage to our author: for this authority, which was universal during their lives, must necessarily, after their decease, be divided, as an inheritance, into as many parcels as they had children. The apostle says, "If children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ;"
 which, alluding to the laws and customs of nations, could have been of no force, unless it had been true and known to be so. But if children are heirs, or joint-heirs, whatsoever authority Adam or Noah had, is inherited by every man in the world; and that title of heir which our author so much magnifies, as if it were annexed to one single person, vanishes into nothing: or else
 the

Rom. viii. 19;

CHAP. II. the words of the apostle could have neither strength nor truth in them, but would be built upon a false foundation, which may perhaps agree with our author's divinity.

Yet, if the apostle had not declared himself so fully in this point, we might easily have seen, that Adam and Noah did leave their children in that equality; for fathers are ever understood to embrace all their children with equal affection, till the discovery of personal virtues and vices makes a difference. But the personal virtues, that give a reasonable preference of one before another, or make him more fit to govern than the others, cannot appear before he is, nor can be annexed to any one line: therefore the father cannot be thought to have given to one man, or his descendents, the government of his brethren and their descendents.

Besides, tho' the law of England may make one man to be sole heir of his father, yet the laws of God and nature do not so. All the children of Noah were his heirs: the land promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, was equally divided among their children. If the children of Joseph made two tribes, it was not as the first-born, but by the will of Jacob, who adopted Ephraim and Manasseh; and they thereby became his sons, and obtained an inheritance equal to that of the other tribes. The law allowed a double portion to the first-begotten; but this made a difference between the brothers only in proportion, whereas that between lord and servant is in specie, not in degree. And if our author's opinion might take place instead of such a division of the common inheritance between brothers, as was made between the children of Jacob, all must continue for ever slaves to one lord; which would establish a difference in specie between brethren, which nature abhors.

If nature does not make one man lord over his brethren, he can never come to be their lord, unless they make him so, or he subdue them. If he subdue them, it is an act of violence contrary to right, which may consequently be recovered: if they make him lord, it is for their own sakes, not for his; and he must seek their good, not his own, lest, as Aristotle says, he degenerate from a king into a tyrant. He therefore who would persuade us, that the dominion over every nation does naturally belong to one man, woman, or child, at a venture; or to the heir, whatsoever he or she be, as to age, sex, or other qualifications, must prove it good for all nations to be under them. But as reason is our nature, that can never be natural to us that is not rational. Reason gives "paria paribus," equal power to those who have equal abilities and merit: it allots to every one the part he is most fit to perform; and this fitness must be equally lasting with the law that allots it. But as it can never be good for great nations, having men amongst them of virtue, experience, wisdom, and goodness, to be governed by children, fools, or vicious and wicked persons; and we neither find, that the virtues required in such as deserve to govern them, did ever continue in any race of men, nor have reason to believe they ever will; it can never be reasonable to annex the dominion of a nation to any one line.

We may take this upon Solomon's word, "Wo to thee, O land, when thy Eccl. x. 16. "king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning!" and I wish the experience perience of all ages did not make this truth too evident to us. This therefore SECT. 4.

 can never be the work, much less the law, of nature; and if there be any such thing in the world as the dominion over a nation inseparably united to a man and his family, it can have no other root, than a civil or municipal law, which is not the subject of our discourse.

Moreover, every father's right must cease, when he ceases to be; or be transmitted to those, who, being also fathers, have the same title to it. And tho' the contrary method of annexing the whole inheritance to one person, or exposing all his brethren to be destroyed by his rage, if they will not submit, may conduce to the enlargement of a proud and violent empire, as in Turkey; where he that gains the power, usually begins his reign with the slaughter of his brothers and nephews; yet it can never agree with the piety, gentleness, and wisdom, of the patriarchs, or the laws of God and nature.

These things being agreed, we need not trouble ourselves with the limits or definition of a family, and as little with the titles given to the head of it; it is all one to us, whether it be confined to one roof and fire, or extended farther; and none but such as are strangers to the practice of mankind, can think that titles of civility have a power to create a right of dominion. Every man in Latin is called "dominus," unless such as are of the vilest condition, or in a great subjection to those who speak to them; and yet the word, strictly taken, relates only to "servus;" for a man is lord only of his servant or slave. The Italians are not less liberal of the titles of "signore" and "padrone," and the Spaniards of "señor;" but he would be ridiculous in those countries, who thereupon should arrogate to himself a right of dominion over those who are so civil. The vanity of our age seems to carry this point a little higher, especially among the French, who put a great weight upon the word "prince;" but they cannot change the true signification of it; and even in their sense, "prince du sang" signifies no more than a chief man of the royal blood, to whom they pay much respect, because he may come to the crown; as they at Rome do to cardinals, who have the power of choosing popes, and out of whose number, for some ages, they have been chosen. In this sense did Scevola, when he was apprehended by Porfenna, say, "Trecenti conjuravi- mus Romanæ juventutis principes;" which was never otherwise understood; than of such young citizens as were remarkable amongst their companions.
 And nothing can be more absurd than to think, if the name of prince had carried an absolute and despotical power with it, that it could belong to three hundred in a city, that possessed no more than a ten miles territory; or that it could have been given to them, whilst they were young, and the most part of their fathers, as is most probable, still living.

I should, like our author, run round in a circle, if I should refute what he says of a regal power in our first parents; or shew that the regal, where it is, is not absolute, as often as he does assert it. But, having already proved, that Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, &c. enjoyed no such power; transmitted to every one of their sons that which they had; and they became fathers of many great nations, who always continued independent on each other;
 I

CHAP. II. I leave to our author to prove, when, and by what law, the right of subdividing the paternal power was stopped; and how any one or more of their descendents came to have that power over their brethren, which none of their immediate children had over theirs.

His question to Suarez, how and when sons become free, favours more of jesuitical sophistry, than any thing said by the jesuit; but the solution is easy: for if he mean the respect, veneration, and kindness proceeding from gratitude, it ceases only with the life of the father to whom it is due, and the memory of it must last as long as that of the son; and, if they had been possessed of such an absolute power as he fancies, it must have ceased with the reasons upon which it was grounded.

First, because the power, of which a father would probably have made a wise and gentle use, could not be rightly trusted in the hands of one who is not a father; and that which tended only to the preservation of all the children, could not be turned to the increase of the pride, luxury, and violence of one, to the oppression of others, who are equally heirs.

In the second place, societies cannot be instituted, unless the heads of the families that are to compose them, resign so much of their right, as seems convenient, into the public stock, to which every one becomes subject: but that the same power should, at the same time, continue in the true father, and the figurative father, the magistrate; and that the children should owe intire obedience to the commands of both, which may often cross each other; is absurd.

Thirdly, it ceases when it cannot be executed; as when men live to see four or five generations, as many do at this day; because the son cannot tell whether he shall obey his father, grandfather, or great-grandfather, and cannot be equally subject to them all; most especially, when they live in divers places, and set up families of their own, as the sons of the patriarchs did: which being observed, I know no place where this paternal power could have any effect, unless in the fabulous island of Pines; and even there it must have ceased, when he died, who, by the inventor of the story, is said to have seen above ten thousand persons issued of his body.

And if it be said, that Noah, Shem, Abraham, &c. consented that their children should go where they thought fit, and provide for themselves; I answer, that the like has been done in all ages, and must be done for ever. It is the voice of nature, obeyed, not only by mankind, but by all living creatures; and there is none so stupid as not to understand it. A hen leaves her chickens, when they can seek their own nourishment: a cow looks after her calf no longer, than till it is able to feed: a lion gives over hunting for his whelps, when they are able to seek their own prey, and have strength enough to provide what is sufficient for themselves. And the contrary would be an insupportable burden to all living creatures, but especially to men; for the good order that the rational nature delights in, would be overthrown, and civil societies, by which it is best preserved, would never be established.

We

We are not concerned to examine, whether the political and oeconomi-cal powers be intirely the same, or in what they differ: for that absolute power which he contends for, is purely despotical, different from both, or rather inconsistent with either as to the same subject; and that which the patriarchs exercised, having been equally inherited by their children, and consequently by every one of their posterity, it is as much as is required for my purpose of proving the natural universal liberty of mankind; and I am no way concerned in the question, Whether the first parents of mankind had a power of life and death over their children, or not.

S E C T. V.

Freemen join together, and frame greater or lesser societies, and give such forms to them as best please themselves.

THIS being established, I shall leave Filmer to fight against Suarez or Bellarmine; or to turn one of them against the other, without any con-cernment in the combat, or the success of it. But since he thereupon raises a question, "Whether the supreme power be so in the people, that there is but "one and the same power in all the people of the world; so that no power
"can be granted, unless all men upon the earth meet, and agree to chuse a "governor;" I think it deserves to be answered, and might do it by proposing a question to him; Whether in his opinion, the empire of the whole world doth, by the laws of God and nature, belong to one man, and who that man is? Or, how it came so to be divided, as we have ever known it to have been, without such an injury to the universal monarch, as can never be repaired?
But intending to proceed more candidly, and not to trouble myself with Bellarmine or Suarez, I say, that they who place the power in a multitude, understand a multitude composed of freemen, who think it for their convenience to join together, and to establish such laws and rules as they oblige themselves to observe: which multitude, whether it be great or small, has the same right, because ten men are as free as ten millions of men; and tho' it may be more prudent in some cases to join with the greater than the smaller number, because there is more strength, it is not so always: but however every man must therein be his own judge, since if he mistake, the hurt is only to himself; and the ten may as justly resolve to live together, frame a civil society, and oblige themselves to laws, as the greatest number of men that ever met together in the world.

Thus we find that a few men assembling together upon the banks of the Tiber, resolved to build a city, and set up a government among themselves:
and the multitude that met at Babylon, when their design of building a tower that should reach up to heaven failed, and their language was confounded, di-

CHAP. II.  vided themselves, as our author says, into seventy-two parcels, and by the same right might have divided into more, as their descendents did into almost an infinite number before the death of their common father Noah. But we cannot find a more perfect picture of freemen, living according to their own will, than in Abraham and Lot; they went together into Canaan, continued together as long as was convenient for them, and parted when their substance did so increase, that they became troublesome to each other. In the like manner Ishmael, Isaac, and Abraham's six sons by Keturah, might have continued together, and made one nation; Isaac and Esau, Moab and Ammon, might have done so too; or all of them that came of the same stock might have united together; but they did not; and their descendents by the same rule might have subdivided perpetually, if they had thought it expedient for themselves: and if the sons of Jacob did not do the like, it is probable they were kept together by the hope of an inheritance promised to them by God, in which we find no shadow of a despotical dominion, affected by one as father or heir to the first father, or reputed to be the heir; but all continued in that fraternal equality, which according to Abraham's words to Lot they ought to do. There was no lord, slave or vassal; no strife was to be among them: they were brethren; they might live together, or separate, as they found it convenient for themselves. By the same law that Abraham and Lot, Moab and Ammon, Ishmael, Isaac, and the sons of Keturah, Jacob, Esau, and their descendents, did divide, and set up several governments, every one of their children might have done the like: and the same right remained to their issue, till they had by agreement engaged themselves to each other. But if they had no dependence upon each other, and might live together in that fraternal equality which was between Abraham and Lot; or separate, and continue in that separation, or reunite; they could not but have a right of framing such conditions of their reunion as best pleased themselves. By this means every number of men, agreeing together, and framing a society, became a complete body, having all power in themselves over themselves, subject to no other human law than their own. All those that compose the society, being equally free to enter into it or not, no man could have any prerogative above others, unless it were granted by the consent of the whole; and nothing obliging them to enter into this society, but the consideration of their own good; that good, or the opinion of it, must have been the rule, motive, and end, of all that they did ordain. It is lawful therefore for any such bodies to set up one, or a few men, to govern them, or to retain the power in themselves; and he or they who are set up, having no other power but what is so conferred upon them by that multitude, whether great or small, are truly by them made what they are; and by the law of their own creation, are to exercise those powers according to the proportion, and to the ends, for which they were given.

These rights, in several nations and ages, have been variously executed in the establishment of monarchies, aristocracies, democracies, or mixed governments, according to the variety of circumstances; and the governments have been good or evil, according to the rectitude or pravity of their institution, and

Gen. xiii.

and the virtue and wisdom, or the folly and vices of those to whom the power SECT. 5.
 was committed: but the end which was ever proposed, being the good of the public, they only performed their duty, who procured it according to the laws of the society, which were equally valid as to their own magistrates, whether they were few or many.

This might suffice to answer our author's question; but he endeavours further to perplex it, by a fiction of his own brain, "That God gave this power " to the whole multitude met, and not to every particular assembly of men:"
 and expects a proof, "That the whole multitude met, and divided this power " which God gave them in gross, by breaking it into parcels, and by ap" pointing a distinct power to each commonwealth." He also fathers it upon the assertors of liberty; "and does not see," as he says, "how there can be an " election of a magistrate by any commonwealth, that is not an usurpation
 " upon the privilege of the whole world, unless all mankind had met toge" ther and divided the power into parcels which God had given them in " gross." But before I put myself to the trouble of answering that which is but an appendix to a whim of his own, I may justly ask, what hurt he finds in usurpation, who asserts, that the same obedience is due to all monarchs, whether they come in by inheritance, election, or usurpation? If usurpation can give a right to a monarch, why does it not confer the same upon a people? or rather, if God did in gross confer such a right upon all mankind, and they neither did nor can meet together by consent to dispose of it for the good of the whole; why should not those who can and do consent to meet together, agree upon that which seems most expedient to them for the government of themselves? Did God create man under the necessity of wanting government, and all the good that proceeds from it; because at the first all did not, and afterwards all could not meet to agree upon rules? Or did he ever declare, that unless they should use the first opportunity of dividing themselves into such parcels as were to remain unalterable, the right of reigning over every one shall fall to the first villain that should dare to attempt it? Is it not more consonant to the wisdom and goodness of God, to leave to every nation a liberty of repairing the mischiefs fallen upon them through the omission of their first parents, by setting up governments among themselves, than to lay them under a necessity of submitting to any that should insolently aspire to a domination over them? Is it not more just and reasonable to believe, that the universal right not being executed, devolves upon particular nations, as members of the great body, than that it should become the reward of violence or fraud? Or, is it possible that any one man can make himself lord of a people, or parcel of that body, to whom God had given the liberty of governing themselves, by any other means than violence or fraud, unless they did willingly submit to him? If this right be not devolved upon any one man, is not the invasion of it the most outrageous injury that can be done to all mankind, and most particularly to the nation that is enslaved by it? Or if the justice of every government depends necessarily upon an original grant, and a succession certainly deduced from our first fathers, does not

CHAP. II. he by his own principles condemn all the monarchies of the world, as the most detestable usurpations, since not one of them that we know do any way pretend to it? Or, tho' I, who deny any power to be just that is not founded upon consent, may boldly blame usurpation, is it not an absurd and unpardonable impudence in Filmer, to condemn usurpation in a people, when he has declared that the right and power of a father may be gained by usurpation; and that nations in their obedience are to regard the power, not the means by which it was gained? But not to lose more time upon a most frivolous fiction, I affirm, that the liberty which we contend for is granted by God to every man in his own person, in such a manner as may be useful to him and his posterity, and as it was exercised by Noah, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, &c. and their children, as has been proved, and not to the vast body of all mankind, which never did meet together since the first age after the flood, and never could meet to receive any benefit by it.

His next question deserves scorn and hatred, with all the effects of either, if it proceed from malice; tho' perhaps he may deserve compassion, if his crime proceed from ignorance. "Was a general meeting of a whole kingdom," says he, "ever known for the election of a prince?" But if there never were any general meetings of whole nations, or of such as they did delegate and entrust with the power of the whole, how did any man that was elected come to have a power over the whole? Why may not a people meet to chuse a prince, as well as any other magistrate? Why might not the Athenians, Romans, or Carthaginians, have chosen princes as well as archons, consuls, dictators, or suffetes, if it had pleased them? Who chose all the Roman kings, except Tarquin the Proud, if the people did not; since their histories testify, that he was the first who took upon him to reign "sine jussu populi?" Who ever heard of a king of the Goths in Spain, that was not chosen by the nobility and people? Or, how could they chuse him, if they did not meet in their persons, or by their deputies, which is the same thing, when a people has agreed it should be so? How did the kings of Sweden come by their power, unless by the like election, till the crown was made hereditary, in the time of Gustavus the First, as a reward of his virtue and service in delivering that country from the tyranny of the Danes? How did Charles Gustavus come to be king, unless it was by the election of the nobility? He acknowledged by the act of his election, and upon all occasions, that he had no other right to the crown than what they had conferred on him. Did not the like custom prevail in Hungary and Bohemia, till those countries fell under the power of the house of Austria? and in Denmark till the Year 1660? Do not the kings of Poland derive their authority from this popular election, which he derides? Does not the stile of the oath of allegiance used in the kingdom of Arragon, as it is related by Antonio Perez secretary of state to Philip H. shew, that their kings were of their own making? Could they say, * "We who are as good * Nos que valemus tanto como vos, os hacemos nuestro rey, con tal que nos guardays nuestros fueros y libertades, y sino, no. Relacion. de Ant. Perez.

“as you, make you our king, on condition that you keep and observe our SECT. 5.
 “privileges and liberties; and if not, not;” if he did not come in by their election? Were not the Roman emperors in disorderly times chosen by the soldiers; and in such as were more regular, by the senate with the consent of the people?

Our author may say, the whole body of these nations did not meet at their elections; tho’ that is not always true: for in the infancy of Rome, when the whole people dwelt within the walls of a small city, they did meet for the choice of their kings, as afterwards for the choice of other magistrates.
 Whilst the Goths, Franks, Vandals, and Saxons, lived within the precincts of a camp, they frequently met for the election of a king, and raised upon a target the person they had chosen: but, finding that to be inconvenient, or rather impossible, when they were vastly increased in number, and dispersed over all the countries they had conquered, no better way was found, than to institute “gemotes, parliaments, diets, cortez, assemblies of estates,” or the the like, to do that which formerly had been performed by themselves; and when a people is, by mutual compact, joined together in a civil society, there is no difference, as to right, between that which is done by them all in their own persons, or by some deputed by all, and acting according to the powers received from all.

If our author was ignorant of these things, which are the most common in all histories, he might have spared the pains of writing upon more abstruse points; but it is a stupendous folly in him, to presume to raise doctrines depending upon the universal law of God and nature, without examining the only law that ever God did, in a public manner, give to man. If he had looked into it, he might have learnt, that all Israel was, by the command of 1 Sam. xvi.
 God, assembled at Mizpeth to chuse a king, and did chuse Saul: he being slain, all Judah came to Hebron, and made David their king: after the death 2 Sam. ii.
 of Ishbosheth, all the tribes went to Hebron, and anointed him king over 2 Sam. v. them; and he made a covenant with them before the Lord. When Solomon was dead, all Israel met together in Sechem; and ten tribes, disliking the proceedings of Rehoboam, rejected him, and made Jeroboam their king. 1 King. xiii.
 The same people, in the time of the judges, had general assemblies, as often as occasion did require, to set up a judge, to make war or the like:
 and the several tribes had their assemblies to treat of businesses relating to themselves. The histories of all nations, especially of those that have peopled the best parts of Europe, are so full of examples of this kind, that no man can question them, unless he be brutally ignorant, or maliciously contenti-ous. The great matters among the Germans were transacted “omnium “consensu. De minoribus consultant principes; de majoribus omnes.” C. Tacit. de
 The “michelgemote” among the Saxons was an assembly of the whole peo- mor. Germa.
 ple: the “baronagium” is truly said to be the same, in as much as it comprehended all the freemen, that is, all the people; for the difference between “civis” and “servus” is irreconcilable; and no man, whilst he is a servant, can be a member of a commonwealth; for he that is not in his own power, cannot have a part in the government of others. All the formentioned northern nations

CHAP. II. nations had the like customs among them: the governments they had were so instituted. The utmost that any now remaining pretends to, is, to derive their right from them: if, according to Filmer, these first assemblies could not confer it upon the first, they had none: such as claim under them, can inherit none from those that had none; and there can be no right in all the governments we so much venerate; and nothing can tend more to their overthrow than the reception of our author's doctrine.

Tho' any one instance would be sufficient to overthrow his general negative proposition (for a rule is not generally true, if there be any just exception against it) I have alledged many, and find it so easy to increase the number, that there is no nation, whose original we know, out of whose histories I will not undertake to produce the like: but I have not been solicitous precisely to distinguish, which nations have acted in their own persons, and which have made use of delegates; nor in what times they have changed from one way to the other; for, if any have acted by themselves, the thing is possible; and whatsoever is done by delegated powers, must be referred to their principals; for none can give to any a power which they have not in themselves.

He is graciously pleased to confess, that "when men are assembled by a human power, that power that doth assemble them, may also limit the manner of the execution of that power, &c. But in assemblies that take their authority from the law of nature, it is not so; for what liberty or freedom is due to any man by the law of nature, no inferior power can alter, limit, or diminish: no one man, or multitude of men, can give away the natural right of another, &c." These are strong lines, and such as, if there be any sense in them, utterly overthrow all our author's doctrine; for if any assembly of men did ever take their authority from the law of nature, it must be of such as, remaining in the intire fruition of their natural liberty, and restrained by no contract, meet together to deliberate of such matters as concern themselves; and if they can be restrained by no one man, or number of men, they may dispose of their own affairs as they think fit. But because no one of them is obliged to enter into the society that the rest may constitute, he cannot enjoy the benefit of that society unless he enter into it: he may be gone, and set up for himself, or set up another with such as will agree with him. But if he enter into the society, he is obliged by the laws of it; and if one of those laws be, that all things should be determined by the plurality of voices, his assent is afterwards comprehended in all the resolutions of that plurality. Reuben or Simeon might, according to the laws of nature, have divided themselves from their brethren, as well as Lot from Abraham, or Ishmael and the sons of Keturah from Isaac; but when they, in hopes of having a part in the inheritance promised to their fathers, had joined with their brethren, a few of their descendents could not have a right, by their dissent, to hinder the resolutions of the whole body, or such a part of it as by the first agreement was to pass for an act of the whole. And the scripture teaches us, that when the lot was fallen upon Saul, they who despised him were stiled "men of Belial;" and the rest, after after his victory over the Ammonites, would have slain them, if he had permitted. In the like manner, when a number of men met together to build SECT. 5.

Rome, any man who had disliked the design might justly have refused to join in it; but when he had entered into the society, he could not by his vote invalidate the acts of the whole, nor destroy the rights of Romulus, Numa, and the others, who by the senate and people were made kings; nor those of the other magistrates, who after their expulsion were legally created.

This is as much as is required to establish the natural liberty of mankind in its utmost extent, and cannot be shaken by our author's surmise, "That a gap is thereby opened for every seditious multitude to raise a new commonwealth:" for till the commonwealth be established, no multitude can be seditious, because they are not subject to any human law; and sedition implies an unjust and disorderly opposition of that power which is legally established; which cannot be when there is none, nor by him who is not a member of the society that makes it: and when it is made, such as entered into it, are obliged to the laws of it.

This shewing the root and foundation of civil powers, we may judge of the use and extent of them, according to the letter of the law, or the true intentional meaning of it; both which declare them to be purely human ordinances, proceeding from the will of those who seek their own good;
and may certainly infer, that since all multitudes are composed of such as are under some contract, or free from all, no man is obliged to enter into those contracts against his own will, nor obliged by any to which he does not assent: those multitudes that enter into such contracts, and thereupon form civil societies, act according to their own will: those that are engaged in none, take their authority from the law of nature; their rights cannot be limited or diminished by any one man, or number of men; and consequently whoever does it, or attempts the doing of it, violates the most sacred laws of God and nature.

His cavils concerning proxies, and the way of using them, deserve no answer, as relating only to one sort of men amongst us, and can have no influence upon the laws of nature, or the proceedings of assemblies, acting according to such rules as they set to themselves. In some places they have voted all together in their own persons, as in Athens: in others by tribes, as in Rome:
sometimes by delegates, when the number of the whole people is so great that no one place can contain them, as in the parliaments, diets, general as-semblies of estates, long used in the great kingdoms of Europe. In other parts many cities are joined together in leagues, as antiently the Achaians, Etolians, Samnites, Tuscans; and in these times the states of Holland, and cantons of Switzerland: but our author, not regarding such matters, in pursuance of his folly, with an ignorance as admirable as his stupidity, repeats his challenge: "I ask," says he, "but one example out of the history of the whole world; let the commonwealth be named, wherever the multitude, or so much as the major part of it, consented either by voice or procuration to the election of a prince;" not observing, that if an answer could not be given, he did overthrow the rights of all the princes that are, or even

CHAP. II. ever have been, in the world: for if the liberty of one man cannot be limited or diminished by one, or any number of men, and none can give away the right of another, it is plain, that the ambition of one man, or of many, a faction of citizens, or the mutiny of an army, cannot give a right to any over the liberties of a whole nation. Those who are so set up, have their root in hist. Africae.

Leonis Afr.

violence or fraud, and are rather to be accounted robbers and pirates, than magistrates. Leo Africanus, observing in his history, that since the extinction of Mahomet's race (to whom his countrymen thought God had given the empire of the world) their princes did not come in by the consent of those nations which they governed, says, that they are esteemed thieves; and that on this account, the most honourable men among the Arabians and Moors scorn to eat, drink, or make alliances with them: and if the case were as general as that author makes it, no better rule could be any-where followed by honourable and worthy men. But a good cause must not be lost by the fault of an ill advocate; the rights of kings must not perish, because Filmer knows not how to defend, or does maliciously betray them. I have already proved that David, and divers of the judges, were chosen by all Israel; Jeroboam by ten tribes; all the kings of Rome, except Tarquin the Proud, by the whole city. I

Mat. Paris. may add many examples of the Saxons in our own country: Ina and Offa were made kings "omnium consensu:" these all are expressed plainly by the words, "archiepiscopis, episcopis, abbatibus, senatoribus, ducibus, & populo terræ." Egbert and Ethelward came to the crown by the same authority, Guil. Malmf.

Polyd.
Polyd. Hun-tingd.

"Omnium consensu rex creatur." Ethelwolf the monk, "necessitate cogente, factus est rex, & consensus publicus in regem dari petiit." Ethelstan, tho' a bastard, "electus est magno consensu optimatum, et a populo consalutatus." In the like manner Edwin's government being disliked, they chose

Mat. West.
Hoveden.

Edgar, "unanimes omni conspiratione, Edwino dejecto, eligerunt, Deo dictante, Edgarum in regem, & annuente populo:" And in another place, Florent.

"Edgarus ab omni Anglorum populo electus est." Ironside being dead, Canutus was received by the general consent of all; "Juraverunt illi, quod eum

Abbas Croyl.
Huntingd.

"regem sibi eligere vellent: foedus etiam cum principibus & omni populo ipse, & illi cum ipso percusserunt." Whereupon, "Omnium consensu super totam Angliam Canutus coronatur. Hardicanutus gaudenter ab om-

Ingulf.

"nibus suscipitur, & electus est." The same author says, that Edward the Confessor "electus est in regem ab omni populo:" and another, "Omnium electione in Edwardum concordatur." Tho' the name of "Conqueror" be odiously given to William the Norman, he had the same title to the crown with his predecessors: "In magna exultatione a clero & populo susceptus, & ab omnibus rex acclamatus." I cannot recite all the examples of this kind, that the history of almost all nations furnishes, unless I should make a volume in bulk not inferior to the book of martyrs: but those which I have mentioned out of the sacred, Roman, and English history, being more than sufficient to answer our author's challenge, I take liberty to add, that tho' there could not be one example produced of a prince, or any other magistrate, chosen by the general consent of the people, or by the major part of them, it could be of no advantage to the cause he has undertaken to maintain;

tain: for when a people hath either indefinitely, or under certain conditions SECT. 6.
and limitations, resigned their power into the hands of a certain number of men; or agreed upon rules, according to which persons should, from time to time, be deputed for the management of their affairs; the acts of those persons, if their power be without restrictions, are of the same value as the acts of the whole nation, and the assent of every individual man is comprehended in them. If the power be limited, whatsoever is done according to that limitation, has the same authority. If it do therefore appear (as is testified by the laws and histories of all our northern nations) that the power of every people is either wholly, or to such a degree as is necessary for creating kings, granted to their several gemotes, diets, cortez, assemblies of estates, parliaments, and the like, all the kings that they have any-where, or at any time chosen, do reign by the same authority, and have the same right, as if every individual man of those nations had assented to their election. But that these gemotes, diets, and other assemblies of state, have every where had such powers, and executed them by rejecting or setting up kings; and that the kings now in being among us have received their beginning from such acts, has been fully proved, and is so plain in itself, that none but those who are grossly stupid or impudent can deny it: which is enough to shew that all kings are not set up by violence, deceit, faction of a few powerful men, or the mutinies of armies; but from the consent of such multitudes, as joining together, frame civil societies;
and either in their own persons at general assemblies, or by their delegates, confer a just and legal power upon them; which our author rejecting, he does, as far as in him lies, prove them all to be usurpers and tyrants.

S E C T. VI.

They who have a right of chusing a king, have the right of making a king.

TH<sup>O</sup> the right of magistrates do essentially depend upon the consent of those they govern, it is hardly worth our pains to examine, “Whether “the silent acceptation of a governor by part of the people be an argument
“of their concurring in the election of him; or by the same reason the tacit “consent of the whole commonwealth may be maintained:” for when the question is concerning right, fraudulent surmises are of no value; much less will it from thence follow, “that a prince commanding by succession, con“quest, or usurpation, may be said to be elected by the people;” for evident marks of dissent are often given: some declare their hatred; others murmur more privately; many oppose the governor or government, and succeed according to the measure of their strength, virtue, or fortune. Many would resist, but cannot; and it were ridiculous to say, that the inhabitants of Greece, the kingdom of Naples, or dutchy of Tuscany, do tacitly assent to

M

the

CHAP. II. the Government of the Great Turk, king of Spain, or duke of Florence ;
 when nothing is more certain than that those miserable nations abhor the tyrannies they are under ; and if they were not mastered by a power that is much too great for them, they would soon free themselves. And those who are under such governments do no more assent to them, tho' they may be silent, than a man approves of being robbed, when, without saying a word, he delivers his purse to a thief that he knows to be too strong for him.

It is not therefore the bare sufferance of a government when a disgust is declared, nor a silent submission when the power of opposing is wanting, that can imply an assent or election, and create a right ; but an explicit act of approbation, when men have ability and courage to resist or deny. Which being agreed, it is evident that our author's distinction between " eligere " and " instituere " signifies nothing : tho', if the power of instituting were only left to nations, it would be sufficient ; for he is in vain elected who is not instituted ; and he that is instituted is certainly elected ; for his institution is an election. As the Romans, who chose Romulus, Numa, and Hostilius, to be kings, and Brutus, Valerius, or Lucretius, to be consuls, did make them so, and their right was solely grounded upon their election. The text brought by our author against this doth fully prove it :
 Deut. xvii. " Him shalt thou set king over thee, whom the Lord shall chuse." For God did not only make the institution of a king to be purely an act of the people, but left it to them to institute one or not, as should best please themselves ; and the words, " whom the Lord shall chuse," can have no other signification, than that the people resolving to have a king, and following the rules prescribed by his servant Moses, he would direct them in their choice ; which relates only to that particular people in covenant with God, and immediately under his government, which no other was. But this pains might have been saved, if God by a universal law had given a rule to all. The Israelites could not have been three hundred years without a king, and then left to the liberty of making one, or not, if he by a perpetual law had ordained, that every nation should have one ; and it had been as well impertinent as unjust to deliberate who should be king, if the dominion had by right of inheritance belonged to one : they must have submitted to him whether they would or not : no care was to be taken in the election or institution of him, who by his birth had a right annexed to his person that could not be altered : he could not have been forbidden " to multiply silver or gold," who by the law of his creation might do what he pleased : it had been ridiculous to say, " he should not raise his heart above his brethren," who had no brethren, that is, no equals ; but was raised above all by God, who had imposed upon all others a necessity of obeying him. But God, who does nothing in vain, did neither constitute or elect any till they desired it, nor command them to do it themselves, unless it so pleased themselves ; nor appoint them to take him out of any one line : every Israelite might be chosen : none but strangers were excluded ; and the people were left to the liberty of chusing and instituting any one of their brethren.

Our

Our author, endeavouring by Hooker's authority to establish his distinction SECT. 6. between "eligere" and "instituire," destroys it, and the paternal right, which he makes the foundation of his doctrine. "Heaps of scripture are al-
 "ledged," says he, "concerning the solemn coronation and inauguration of "Saul, David, Solomon, and others, by nobles, antients, and people of the "commonwealth of Israel:" which is enough to prove that the whole work was theirs; that no other had any title more than what they bestowed upon him: that kings were set up by the nobles, antients, and people: even God did no otherwise intervene than by such a secret disposition of the lots by his providence, as is exercised in the government of all the things in the world; and we cannot have a more certain evidence, that a paternal right to dominion is a mere whimsy, than that God did not cause the lot to fall upon the eldest, of the eldest line, of the eldest tribe; but upon Saul, a young man, of the youngest tribe: and afterwards, tho' he had designed David, Solomon, Jeroboam, and others, who had no pretence to the paternal right to be kings, he left both the election and institution of them to the elders and people.

But Hooker being well examined, it will appear that his opinions were as contrary to the doctrine of our author, as those we have mentioned out of Plato and Aristotle. He plainly says, "It is impossible that any should "have a complete lawful power over a multitude consisting of so many Hooker, Eccl. Pol. l. i.
c. 10.
 "families, as every politic society doth, but by consent of men, or imme"diate appointment from God: because not having the natural superiority "of fathers, their power must needs be usurped, and then unlawful; or if "lawful, then either granted or consented unto by them over whom they "exercise the same, or else given extraordinarily by God." And tho' he thinks kings to have been the first governors so constituted, he adds,
 "That this is not the only regiment that hath been received in the world.
 "The inconveniences of one kind have caused sundry others to be devised.
 "So that in a word, all public regiment, of what kind soever, seemeth evi"dently to have risen from deliberate advice, consultation, and composi"tion, between men, judging it convenient and behoofeful." And a little below, "Man's nature standing therefore as it doth, some kind of regiment
 "the law of nature doth require; yet the kinds thereof being many, na"ture tieth not to any one, but leaveth the choice as a thing arbitrary."
 And again, "To live by one man's will, became all men's misery: this con"strained them to come unto laws, &c. But as those laws do not only teach "that which is good, but enjoin it, they have in them a constraining force.
 "To constrain men to any thing inconvenient seemeth unreasonable: most "requisite therefore it is that to devise laws, which all men should be forced "to obey, none but wise men should be admitted. Moreover, that which "we say concerning the power of government must here be applied unto the "power of making laws, whereby to govern; which power God hath over all;
 "and by the natural law, whereunto he hath made all subject, the lawful
 "power of making laws to command whole politic societies of men belongeth
 "so properly unto the same intire societies, that for any prince or potentate, of "what kind soever upon earth, to exercise the same of himself, and not either CHAP. II. “ by exprefs commission immediately from God, or else by authority derived “ at the firft from their confent, upon whose persons they impofe laws, it is “ no better than mere tyranny. Laws therefore they are not, which public “ confent hath not made fo.” The humour of our age confidered, I fhould not have dared to fay fo much; but if Hooker be a man of fuch great authority, I cannot offend in tranfcribing his words, and fhewing how vilely he is abufed by Filmer; concluding, that if he be in the right, the choice and constitution of government, the making of laws, coronation, inauguration, and all that belongs to the chufing and making of kings, or rather magiftrates, is merely from the people; and that all power exercifed over them, which is not fo, is ufurpation and tyranny, unlefs it be by an immediate commission from God; which if any man has, let him give testimony of it, and I will confeß he comes not within the reach of our reasonings, but ought to be obeyed by thofe to whom he is fent, or over whom he is placed.

Nevertheless our author is of another opinion; but fcorning to give us a reason, he adds to Hooker’s words, “ As if thefe folemnities were a kind of “ deed, whereby the right of dominion is given; which ftrange, untrue, and “ unnatural conceits are fet abroad by feedfmen of rebellion;” and a little farther, “ unlefs we will openly proclaim defiance to all law, equity, and reason, “ we muft fay (for there is no remedy) that in kingdoms hereditary, birthright “ giveth a right unto fovereign dominion, &c. Thofe folemnities do either “ ferve for an open teftification of the inheritor’s right, or belong to the form “ of inducing him into the poffeffion.” Thefe are bold cenfures, and do not only reach Mr. Hooker, whose modefty, and peaceablenefs of fpirit, is no lefs efteemed than his learning; but the fcriptures alfo, and the beft of human authors, upon which he founded his opinions. But why fhould it be thought a ftrange, untrue, or unnatural conceit, to believe that when the fcriptures fay Nimrod was the firft that grew powerful in the earth long before the death of his fathers, and could confequently neither have a right of dominion over the multitude met together at Babylon, nor fubdue them by his own ftrength, he was fet up by their confent; or that they who made him their governor, might prefcribe rules by which he fhould govern? Nothing feems to me lefs ftrange, than that a multitude of reasonable creatures, in the performance of acts of the greateft importance, fhould confider why they do them. And the infinite variety which is obferved in the constitution, mixture, and regulation of governments, does not only fhew that the feveral nations of the world have confidered them; but clearly prove that all nations have perpetually continued in the exercife of that right. Nothing is more natural than to follow the voice of mankind: the wifeft and beft have ever employed their ftudies in forming kingdoms and commonwealths, or in adding to the perfections of fuch as were already constituted; which had been contrary to the laws of God and nature, if a general rule had been fet, which had obliged all to be for ever fubject to the will of one; and they had not been the beft but the worft of men who had departed from
 it. Nay, I may fay, that the law given by God to his peculiar people, and the commands delivered by his fervants in order to it, or the profecution
 of

of it, had been contrary to his own eternal and universal law; which is impossible. A law therefore having been given by God, which had no relation to or consistency with the absolute paternal power; judges and kings created, who had no pretence to any preference before their brethren, till they were created, and commanded not to raise their hearts above them when they should be created; the wisdom and virtue of the best men, in all ages, shewn in the constitution or reformation of governments; and nations, in variously framing them, preserving the possession of their natural right, to be governed by none, and in no other way than they should appoint; the opinions of Hooker, "That all public regiment, of what kind soever, ariseth from the deliberate advice of men seeking their own good, and that all other is mere tyranny," are not "untrue and unnatural conceits set abroad" by the seedsmen of "rebellion;" but real truths grounded upon the laws of God and nature, acknowledged and practised by mankind. And no nation being justly subject to any, but such as they set up, nor in any other manner than according to such laws as they ordain, the right of chusing and making those that are to govern them, must wholly depend upon their will.

S E C T. VII.

The laws of every nation are the measure of magistratical power:

OUR author lays much weight upon the word hereditary; but the question is, What is inherited in an hereditary kingdom, and how it comes to be hereditary? It is in vain to say "the kingdom;" for we do not know what he means by the kingdom: it is one thing in one place, and very different in others; and I think it not easy to find two in the world that in power are exactly the same. If he understand all that is comprehended within the precincts over which it reaches, I deny that any such is to be found in the world: if he refer to what preceding kings enjoyed, no determination can be made, till the first original of that kingdom be examined, that it may be known what that first king had, and from whence he had it.

If this variety be denied, I desire to know whether the kings of Sparta and Persia had the same power over their subjects; if the same, whether both were absolute, or both limited; if limited, how came the decrees of the Persian kings to pass for laws? if absolute, how could the Spartan kings be subject to fines, imprisonment, or the sentence of death; and not to have power to send for their own supper out of the common hall? Why did Xenophon call Agesilaus a good and faithful king, obedient to the laws of his country, when, upon the command of the ephori, he left the war that he had with so much glory begun in Asia, if he was subject to none? How came the ephori to be established to restrain the power of kings, if it could no way be restrained, if all owed obedience to them, and they to none? Why did Theopompus's wife reprove him for suffering his power to be diminished

CHAP. II. diminished by their creation, if it could not be diminished? Or why did he say he had made the power more permanent in making it less odious, if it was perpetual and unalterable? We may go farther, and taking Xenophon and Plutarch for our guides, assert that the kings of Sparta never had the powers of war or peace, life and death, which our author esteems inseparable from regality, and conclude either that no king has them, or that all kings are not alike in power. If they are not in all places the same, kings do not reign by an universal law, but by the particular laws of each country; which give to every one so much power, as in the opinion of the givers conduces to the end of their institution, which is the public good.

It may be also worth our inquiry how this inherited power came to be hereditary. We know that the sons of Vespasian and Constantine inherited the Roman empire, tho' their fathers had no such title; but, gaining the empire by violence, which Hooker says is mere tyranny that can create no right, they could devolve none to their children. The kings of France of the three races have inherited the crown; but Meroveus, Pepin, and Hugh Capet, could neither pretend title nor conquest, or any other right than what was conferred upon them by the clergy, nobility, and people; and consequently whatsoever is inherited from them can have no other original; for that is the gift of the people which is bestowed upon the first, under whom the successors claim, as if it had been by a peculiar act given to every one of them. It will be more hard to shew how the crown of England is become hereditary, unless it be by the will of the people; for tho' it were granted, that some of the Saxon kings came in by inheritance (which I do not, having, as I think, proved them to have been absolutely elective) yet William the Norman did not, for he was a bastard, and could inherit nothing. William Rufus and Henry did not; for their elder Brother Robert by right of inheritance ought to have been preferred before them: Stephen and Henry the second did not; for Maud the only heiress of Henry the First was living when both were crowned: Richard, and John, who followed, did not, for they were bastards born in adultery. They must therefore have received their right from the people, or they could have none at all; and their successors fall under the same condition.

Moreover, I find great variety in the deduction of this hereditary right. In Sparta there were two kings of different families, endowed with an equal power. If the Heraclidæ did reign as fathers of the people, the Æacidæ did not; if the right was in the Æacidæ, the Heraclidæ could have none; for 'tis equally impossible to have two fathers as two thousand. 'Tis in vain to say that two families joined, and agreed to reign jointly: for it is evident the Spartans had kings before the time of Hercules or Achilles, who were the fathers of the two races. If it be said, that the regal power with which they were invested did intitle them to the right of fathers, it must in like manner have belonged to the Roman consuls, military tribunes, dictators, and pretors; for they had more power than the Spartan kings; and that glorious nation might change their fathers every year, and multiply or diminish the number of them as they pleased. If this be most ridiculous and absurd, it is certain, that the name and office of king, consul, dictator, or SECT. 7. the like, does not confer any determined right upon the person that hath it: every one has a right to that which is allotted to him by the laws of the country by which he is created.

As the Persians, Spartans, Romans, or Germans, might make such magistrates, and under such names, as best pleased themselves, and accordingly enlarge or diminish their power; the same right belongs to all nations; and the rights due unto, as well as the duties incumbent upon every one, are to be known only by the laws of that place. This may seem strange to those who know neither books nor things, histories nor laws; but is well explained by Grotius; who, denying the sovereign power to be annexed to any man, speaks of divers magistrates under several names that had, and others that under the same names had it not; and distinguishes those who have the "summum imperium summo modo," from those who have it "modo non Grot. de jur. bel. & pac. l. i. c. 1. summo:" and tho' probably he looked upon the first sort as a thing merely speculative, if by that "summo modo" a right of doing what one pleases be understood; yet he gives many examples of the other; and among those who had "liberrimum imperium," if any had it, he names the kings of the Sabeans; who nevertheless were under such a condition, that tho' they were, as Agatharchidas reports, obeyed in all things, whilst they continued within the walls of their palace, might be stoned by any that met them without it. He finds also another obstacle to the absolute power, "cum rex" "partem habeat summi imperii, partem senatus, five populus;" which parts are proportioned according to the laws of each kingdom, whether hereditary or elective, both being equally regulated by them.

The law that gives and measures the power, prescribes rules how it should be transmitted. In some places the supreme magistrates are annually elected, in others their power is for life; in some they are merely elective, in others hereditary, under certain rules or limitations. The antient kingdoms and lordships of Spain were hereditary; but the succession went ordinarily to the eldest of the reigning family, not to the nearest in blood. This was the ground of the quarrel between Corbis the brother, and Orsua the son of the last prince, decided by combat before Scipio. I know not whether the T. Liv. l. xxviii. c. 21. Goths brought that custom with them when they conquered Spain, or whether they learnt it from the inhabitants; but certain it is, that, keeping themselves to the families of the Balthei and Amalthei, they had more regard to age Saavedra contra Gothica. than proximity; and almost ever preferred the brother, or eldest kinsman of the last king before his son. The like custom was in use among the Moors Marian. hist. Hispan. in Spain and Africa, who, according to the several changes that happened among the families of Almohades, Almoranides, and Benemerini, did always take one of the reigning blood; but in the choice of him had most respect to age and capacity. This is usually called the law of thanestry; and, as in many other places, prevailed also in Ireland, till that country fell under the English government.

In France and Turkey, the male that is nearest in blood, succeeds; and I do not know of any deviation from that rule in France, since Henry the first was

CHAP. II. was preferred before Robert his elder brother, grandchild to Hugh Capet: but, notwithstanding the great veneration they have for the royal blood, they utterly exclude females, lest the crown should fall to a stranger; or a woman, Vide, p. 47. that is seldom able to govern herself, should come to govern so great a people. Some nations admit females, either simply, as well as males; or under a condition of not marrying out of their country, or without the consent of the estates, with an absolute exclusion of them, and their children, if they do; according to which law, now in force among the Swedes, Charles Gustavus was chosen king, upon the resignation of queen Christina, as having no title; and the crown settled upon the heirs of his body, to the utter exclusion of his brother Adolphus, their mother having married a German. Tho' divers nations have differently disposed their affairs; all those that are not naturally slaves, and like to beasts, have preferred their own good before the personal interests of him that expects the crown, so as upon no pretence whatever to admit of one, who is evidently guilty of such vices as are prejudicial to the state. For this reason the French, tho' much addicted to their kings, rejected the vile remainders of Meroveus his race, and made Pepin the son of Charles Martel king: and when his descendents fell into the like vices, they were often deposed, till at last they were wholly rejected, and the crown given to Capet, and to his heirs male, as formerly. Yet for all this, Henry his grandchild, being esteemed more fit to govern, than his elder brother Robert, was, as is said before, made king, and that crown still remains in his descendents; no consideration being had of the children of Robert who continued dukes of Burgundy during the reigns of ten kings. And, in the memory of our fathers, Henry of Navarre was rejected by two assemblies of the estates, because he differed in religion from the body of the nation, and could never be received as king, till he had renounced his own, tho' he was certainly the next in blood; and that, in all other respects, he excelled in those virtues which they most esteem.

We have already proved, that our own history is full of the like examples; and might enumerate a multitude of others, if it were not too tedious: and as the various rules, according to which all the hereditary crowns of the world are inherited, shew, that none is set by nature, but that every people proceeds according to their own will; the frequent deviations from those rules do evidently testify, that "salus populi est lex suprema;" and that no crown is granted otherwise, than in submission to it.

But tho' there were a rule, which in no case ought to be transgressed, there must be a power of judging to whom it ought to be applied. It is perhaps hard to conceive one more precise than that of France, where the eldest legitimate male in the direct line is preferred; and yet that alone is not sufficient. There may be bastardy in the case: bastards may be thought legitimate, and legitimate sons bastards. The children born of Isabel of Portugal, during her marriage with John the Third of Castile, were declared bastards; and the title of the house of Austria to that crown depends upon that declaration. We often see, that marriages which have been contracted, and for a long time taken to be good, have been declared null; and the legitimation of the present king

king of France is founded solely upon the abolition of the marriage of Henry SECT. 7.
 the Fourth with Marguerite of Valois, which for the space of twenty-seven years was thought to have been good. Whilst Spain was divided into five or six kingdoms, and the several kings linked to each other by mutual alliances, incestuous marriages were often contracted, and upon better consideration annulled; many have been utterly void, through the pre-engagement of one of the parties. These are not feigned cases, but such as happen frequently; and the diversity of accidents, as well as the humours of men, may produce many others, which would involve nations in the most fatal disorders, if every one should think himself obliged to follow such a one who pretended a title, that to him might seem plausible, when another should set up one as pleasing to others, and there were no power to terminate those disputes to which both must submit, but the decision must be left to the sword.

This is that which I call the application of the rule, when it is as plain and certain as human wisdom can make it; but if it be left more at large, as where females inherit, the difficulties are inextricable: and he that says, the next heir is really king when one is dead, before he be so declared by a power that may judge of his title, does, as far as in him lies, expose nations to be split into the most desperate factions, and every man to fight for the title which he fancies to be good, till he destroy those of the contrary party, or be destroyed by them. This is the blessed way proposed by our author to prevent sedition: but God be thanked, our ancestors found a better. They did not look upon Robert the Norman as king of England after the death of his father; and when he did proudly endeavour, on pretence of inheritance, to impose himself upon the nation, that thought fit to prefer his younger brothers before him, he paid the penalty of his folly, by the loss of his eyes and liberty. The French did not think the grandchild of Pharamond to be king after the death of his father, nor seek who was the next heir of the Merovingian line, when Chilperic the Third was dead; nor regard the title of Charles of Lorraine after the death of his brother Lothair; or of Robert of Burgundy eldest son of king Robert; but advanced Meroveus, Pepin, Capet, and Henry the First, who had no other right than what the nobility and people bestowed upon them. And if such acts do not destroy the pretences of all who lay claim to crowns by inheritance, and do not create a right, I think it will be hard to find a lawful king in the world, or that there ever have been any; since the first did plainly come in like Nimrod; and those who have been every-where since histories are known to us, owed their exaltation to the consent of nations, armed or unarmed, by the deposition or exclusion of the heirs of such as had reigned before them.

Our author, not troubling himself with these things, or any other relating to the matter in question, is pleased to slight Hooker's opinions concerning coronation and inauguration, with "the heaps of scripture" upon which he grounds them; whereas those solemnities would not only have been foolish and impertinent, but profane and impious, if they were not
 N deeds

CHAP. II. deeds by which the right of dominion is really conferred. What could be more wickedly superstitious than to call all Israel together before the Lord, and to cast lots upon every tribe, family, and person, for the election of a king, if it had been known to whom the crown did belong by a natural and unalterable right? or, if there had been any such thing in nature, how could God have caused that lot to fall upon one of the youngest tribe, for ever to discountenance his own law, and divert nations from taking any notice of it? It had been absurd for the tribe of Judah to chuse and anoint David, and for the other tribes to follow their example after the death of Ishbosheth, if he had been king by a right not depending on their will. David did worse in slaying the sons of Rimmon, saying, they had killed a righteous man lying on his bed, if Ishbosheth, whose head they presented, had most unrighteously detained from him, as long as he lived, the dominion of the ten tribes: the king, elders, and people, had most scornfully abused the most sacred things, by using such ceremonies in making him king, and completing their work in a covenant made between him and them before the Lord, if he had been already king, and if those acts had been empty ceremonies conferring no right at all.

I dare not say, that a league does imply an absolute equality between both parties; for there is a "foedus inæquale," wherein the weaker, as Grotius says, does usually obtain protection, and the stronger honour; but there can be none at all, unless both parties are equally free to make it, or not to make it. David therefore was not king, till he was elected, and those covenants made: and he was made king by that election and covenants.

This is not shaken by our author's supposition, "That the people would not have taken Joas, Manasseh, or Josiah, if they had had a right of chusing a king; since Solomon says, Woe unto the kingdom whose king is a child!" For, first, they who at the first had a right of chusing whom they pleased to be king, by the covenant made with him whom they did chuse, may have deprived themselves of the farther execution of it, and rendered the crown hereditary even to children, unless the conditions were violated upon which it was granted. In the second place, if the infancy of a king brings woe upon a people, the government of such a one cannot be according to the laws of God and nature: for governments are not instituted by either for the pleasure of a man, but for the good of nations; and their weal, not their woe, is sought by both: and if children are any-where admitted to rule, it is by the particular law of the place, grounded perhaps upon an opinion, that it is the best way to prevent dangerous contests; or that other ways may be found to prevent the inconveniences that may proceed from their weakness. Thirdly, It cannot be concluded, that they might not reject children, because they did not: such matters require positive proofs; suppositions are of no value in relation to them, and the whole matter may be altered by particular circumstances. The Jews might reasonably have a great veneration for the house of David; they knew what was promised to that family; and whatever respect was paid, or privilege granted, granted, on that account, can be of no advantage to any other in the world. SECT. 7.

 They might be further induced to set up Joas, in hope the defects of his age might be supplied by the virtue, experience, and wisdom of Jehoiada. We do not know what good opinion may have been conceived of Manasseh when he was twelve years old; but much might be hoped from one that had been virtuously educated, and was probably under the care of such as had been chosen by Hezekiah: and tho' the contrary did fall out, the mischief brought upon the people by his wicked reign proceeded not from the weakness of his childhood, but from the malice of his riper years. And both the examples of Joas and Josiah prove, that neither of them came in by their own right, but by the choice of the people. "Jehoiada gathered the Levites out <sup>2 Chron. xxiii.</sup>
 "of all the cities of Judah, and the chief of the fathers of Israel, and they "came to Jerusalem: and all the congregation made a covenant with the "king in the house of God, and brought out the king's son, and put upon "him the crown, and gave him the testimony, and made him king;" whereupon they slew Athaliah. "And when Ammon was slain, the people of the <sup>2 Chron. xxxiii.</sup>
 "land slew them that had conspired against king Ammon; and the people
 "of the land made Josiah his son king in his stead:" which had been most impertinent, if he was of himself king before they made him so. Besides, tho' infancy may be a just cause of excepting against, and rejecting the next heir to a crown, it is not the greatest or strongest. It is far more easy to find a remedy against the folly of a child (if the state be well regulated) than the more rooted vices of grown men. The English, who willingly received Henry the Sixth, Edward the Fifth and Sixth, tho' children, resolutely opposed Robert the Norman: and the French, who willingly submitted to Charles the Ninth, Lewis the Thirteenth and Fourteenth, in their infancy, rejected the lewd remainders of Meroveus his race; Charles of Lorraine, with his kindred, descended from Pepin, Robert duke of Burgundy with his descendents, and Henry of Navarre, till he had satisfied the nobility and people in the point of religion. And tho' I do not know, that the letter upon the words, "Væ regno cuius rex puer est," recited by Lambard, <sup>Lamb. leg. Saxon.</sup> was written by Eleutherius bishop of Rome; yet the authority given to it by the Saxons, who made it a law, is much more to be valued than what it could receive from the writer; and whoever he was, he seems rightly to have understood Solomon's meaning, who did not look upon him as a child that wanted years, or was superannuated, but him only who was guilty of insolence, luxury, folly, and madness: and he that said, "A wise child was better than
 "an old and foolish king," could have no other meaning, unless he should say, it was worse to be governed by a wise person than a fool; which may agree with the judgment of our author, but could never enter into the heart of Solomon.

Lastly, Tho' the practice of one or more nations may indicate what laws, covenants, or customs, were in force among them, yet they cannot bind others: the diversity of them proceeds from the variety of mens judgments, and declares, that the direction of all such affairs depends upon their own will; according to which every people for themselves forms and mea-

CHAP. II. fures the magistracy, and magistratical power; which, as it is directed solely for the good, hath its exercises and extent proportionable to the command of those that institute it; and such ordinances being good for men, God makes them his own.

S E C T. VIII.

There is no natural propensity in man or beast to monarchy.

I See no reason to believe, that God did approve the government of one over many, because he created but one; but to the contrary, inasmuch as he did endow him, and those that came from him, as well the youngest as the eldest line, with understanding to provide for themselves, and by the invention of arts and sciences, to be beneficial to each other; he shewed, that they ought to make use of that understanding in forming governments according to their own convenience, and such occasions as should arise, as well as in other matters: and it might as well be inferred, that it is unlawful for us to build, clothe, arm, defend, or nourish ourselves, otherwise than as our first parents did, before or soon after the flood, as to take from us the liberty of instituting governments that were not known to them. If they did not find out all that conduces to the use of man, but a faculty as well as a liberty was left to every one, and will be to the end of the world, to make use of his wit, industry, and experience, according to present exigencies, to invent and practise such things as seem convenient to himself and others in matters of the least importance; it were absurd to imagine, that the political science, which of all others is the most abstruse and variable according to accidents and circumstances, should have been perfectly known to them who had no use of it; and that their descendents are obliged to add nothing to what they practised. But the reason given by our author to prove this extravagant fancy, is yet more ridiculous than the thing itself; "God," saith he, "shewed his opinion," viz. that all should be governed by one, "when he" "endowed not only men, but beasts, with a natural propensity to monarchy: "neither can it be doubted, but a natural propensity is referred to God, who "is the author of nature:" which I suppose may appear if it be considered.

Nevertheless I cannot but commend him in the first place for introducing God speaking so modestly, not declaring his will, but his opinion. He puts haughty and majestic language into the mouth of kings. They command, and decide, as if they were subject to no error, and their wills ought to be taken for perpetual laws; but to God he ascribes an humble delivery of his opinion only, as if he feared to be mistaken. In the second place, I deny that there is any such general propensity in man or beast; or that monarchy would thereby be justified, tho' it were found in them. It cannot be in beasts; for they know not what government is; and being incapable of it, cannot distinguish the several sorts, nor consequently incline to one more than another. Salmasius's story of bees is only fit for old women to prate of of in chimney-corners ; and they who represent lions and eagles as kings of SECT. 8.

 birds and beasts, do it only to shew, that their power is nothing but brutish violence, exercised in the destruction of all that are not able to oppose it, and that hath nothing of goodness or justice in it: which similitude (tho' it should prove to be in all respects adequate to the matter in question) could only shew, that those who have no sense of right, reason, or religion, have a natural propensity to make use of their strength, to the destruction of such as are weaker than they ; and not that any are willing to submit, or not to resist it if they can, which I think will be of no great advantage to monarchy.
 But whatever propensity may be in beasts, it cannot be attributed generally to men ; for if it were, they never could have deviated from it, unless they were violently put out of their natural course ; which in this case cannot be ;
 for there is no power to force them. But that they have most frequently deviated, appears by the various forms of government established by them.
 There is therefore no natural propensity to any one ; but they chuse that which in their judgment seems best for them. Or, if he would have that inconsiderate impulse, by which brutish and ignorant men may be swayed, when they know no better, to pass for a propensity ; others are no more obliged to follow it, than to live upon acorns, or inhabit hollow trees, because their fathers did it when they had no better dwellings, and found no better nourishment in the uncultivated world. And he that exhibits such examples, as far as in him lies, endeavours to take from us the use of reason, and, extinguishing the light of it, to make us live like the worst of beasts, that we may be fit subjects to absolute monarchy. This may perhaps be our author's intention, having learnt from Aristotle, that such a government is only suitable to the nature of the most bestial men, who being incapable of governing themselves, fall under the power of such as will take the conduct of them : but he ought withal to have remembered, that, according to Aristotle's opinion, this conductor must be in nature different from those he takes the charge of ; and, if he be not, there can be no government, nor order by which it subsists, beasts follow beasts, and the blind lead the blind to destruction.

But tho' I should grant this propensity to be general, it could not be imputed to God, since man by sin is fallen from the law of his creation.
 " The wickedness of man (even in the first ages) was great in the world :
 " all the imaginations of his heart are evil, and that continually. All men " are liars. There is none that doth good, no not one. Out of the heart " proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false tes" timonies," &c. These are the fruits of our corrupted nature, which the apostle observing, does not only make a difference between the natural and the spiritual man, whose proceeding only can be referred to God, and that only so far as he is guided by his Spirit ; but shews that the natural man is in a perpetual enmity against God, without any possibility of being reconciled to him, unless by the destruction of the old man, and the regenerating or renewing him through the Spirit of grace. There being no footsteps of this in our author's book, he and his master Heylin may have differed

CHAP. II. differed from the apostle, referring that propensity of nature to God, which he declares to be utter enmity against him; and we may conclude, that this propensity, however general it may be, cannot be attributed to God as the author of nature, since it can be no more general than the corruptions into which we are fallen.

S E C T. IX.

The government instituted by God over the Israelites was aristocratical.

Notwithstanding all this, our author is resolved that monarchy must be from God: "What form of government, says he, God ordained by his authority, may be gathered by that commonwealth which he instituted amongst the Hebrews; which was not aristocratical, as Calvin saith, but plainly monarchical." I may in as few words deny the government set up by God to have been monarchical, as he asserts it; but finding such language ordinarily to proceed from a mixture of folly, impudence, and pride, I chuse rather to shew upon what I ground my opinions, than nakedly to deliver them; most especially, when, by insisting upon the government instituted by God over his people, he refers us to the scripture. And I do this the more boldly, since I follow Calvin's exposition; and believe that he, having been highly esteemed for his wit, judgment, and learning, by such as were endowed with the like, and revered as a glorious servant of God, might, if he were now alive, comfort himself, tho' he had the misfortune to fall under the censures of Filmer and his followers. It is probable he gave some reasons for his opinions; but our author having maliciously concealed them, and I not having leisure at present to examine all his writings to find them, must content myself with such as my small understanding may suggest, and such as I have found in approved authors.

Jos. ant.
Jud.

Abar. in 1 Sam. viii.

Maim. more
nevochim.

In the first place I may safely say, he was not alone of that opinion: Josephus, Philo, and Moses Maimonides, with all the best of the Jewish and Christian authors, had long before delivered the same. Josephus says, that Saul's first sin, by which he fell, was, "that he took away the aristocracy;" which he could not do, if it had never been established. Philo imputes the institution of kingly government, as it was in Israel, neither to God, nor his word, but to the fury of the sinfull people. Abarbenel says, it proceeded from their delight in the idolatry to which their neighbours were addicted, and which could be upheld only by a government, in practice and principle contrary to that which God had instituted, Maimonides frequently says the same thing grounded upon the words of Hosea, "I gave them kings in my wrath;" and whosoever will call that a divine institution, may give the same name to plagues or famines, and induce a necessity incumbent upon all men to go and search the one where they may find it; and to leave their lands for ever uncultivated, that they may be sure of the other: which being too bestial to

to be asserted by a man, I may safely say, the Hebrew kings were not instituted SECT. 9.
by God, but given as a punishment of their sin, who despised the government that he had instituted: and the above-mentioned authors agree in the same thing, calling the people's desire to have a king, furious, mad, wicked, and proceeding from their love to the idolatry of their neighbours, which was suited to their government; both which were inconsistent with what God had established over his own people.

But waving the opinions of men, it is good to see what we can learn from the scripture, and inquire if there be any precept there expressly commanding them to make a king; or any example that they did so whilst they continued obedient to the word of God; or any thing from whence we may reasonably infer they ought to have done it: all which, if I mistake not, will be found directly contrary.

The only precept that we find in the law concerning kings, is that of Deuteronomy xvii. already mentioned; and that is not a command to the people to make, but instructions what manner of king they should make if they desired to have one: there was therefore none at all.

Examples do as little favour our author's assertions. Moses, Joshua, and the other judges, had not the name or power of kings: they were not of the tribe to which the sceptre was promised: they did not transmit the power they had to their children, which in our adversary's opinion is a right inseparable from kings: and their power was not continued by any kind of succession, but created occasionally, as need required, according to the virtues discovered in those who were raised by God to deliver the nation in the time of their distress; which being done, their children lay hid among the rest of the people. Thus were Ehud, Gideon, Jephthah, and others, set up: "Who"soever will give battle" (say the princes and people of Gilead) "to the "children of Ammon, shall be head over the inheritance of Gilead:" and finding Jephthah to be such a man as they sought, they made him their chief, and all Israel followed them. When Othniel had shewed his valour in taking Kirjath-sepher, and delivering his brethren from Cushan-rishathaim, he was made judge: when Ehud had killed Eglon; when Shamgar and Samson had destroyed great numbers of the Philistines; and when Gideon had defeated the Midianites, they were fit to be advanced above their brethren.
These dignities were not inherent in their persons, or families, but conferred upon them; nor conferred, that they might be exalted in riches and glory, but that they might be ministers of good to the people. This may justify Plato's opinion, that if one man be found incomparably to excel all others in the virtues that are beneficial to civil societies, he ought to be advanced above all: but I think it will be hard from thence to deduce an argument in favour of such a monarchy as is necessarily to descend to the next in blood, whether man, woman, or child, without any consideration of virtue, age, sex, or ability; and that failing, it can be of no use to our author. But whatever the dignity of a Hebrew judge was, and howsoever he was raised to that office, it certainly differed from that of a king. Gideon could not have refused to be a king when the people would have made him so, if he had been a king.

CHAP. II. a king already; or that God from the beginning had appointed that they should have one: the elders and people could not have asked a king of Samuel, if 1 Sam. viii. he had been king; and he could not without impiety have been displeased with them for asking for such a one as God had appointed; neither would God have said to him, "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me that I should not reign over them," if he had ordained what they desired.

They did not indeed reject God with their mouths: they pretended to use the liberty he had given them to make a king; but would have such a one as he had forbidden: they drew near to him with their lips, but their hearts were far from him; and he seeing their hypocrisy, severely chastised them in granting their ill-conceived request; and foretold the miseries that should thereupon befall them, from which he would not deliver them, tho' they should cry to him by reason of what they suffered from their king: he was their creature, and the mischiefs thereby brought upon them were the fruits of their own labour.

This is that which our author calls God's institution of kings; but the Hof. xiii. prophet explains the matter much better, "I gave them kings in my anger, and took them away in my wrath:" in destroying them God brought desolation upon the people that had sinned in asking for them, and following their example in all kind of wickedness. This is all our author has to boast of: but God, who acknowledges those works only to be his own, which proceed from his goodness and mercy to his people, disowns this; "Israel hath cast off the thing that is good" (even the government that he had established): "the enemy shall pursue him: they have set up kings, but not by me; and princes, but I know them not." As if he sought to justify the severity of his judgments brought upon them by the wickedness of their kings, that they, not he, had ordained.

Having seen what government God did not ordain, it may be seasonable to examine the nature of the government which he did ordain; and we shall easily find, that it consisted of three parts, besides the magistrates of the several tribes and cities. They had a chief magistrate, who was called judge or captain, as Joshua, Gideon, and others, a council of seventy chosen men, and the general assemblies of the people.
 Numb. xi.

The first was merely occasional, like to the dictators of Rome; and as the Romans in times of danger frequently chose such a man as was much esteemed for valour and wisdom, God's peculiar people had a peculiar regard to that wisdom and valour which was accompanied with his presence, hoping for deliverance only from him.

The second is known by the name of the great sanhedrin, which being instituted by Moses according to the command of God, continued, till they were all save one slain by Herod. And the third part, which is the assembly of the people, was so common, that none can be ignorant of it, but such as never looked into the scripture. When the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half that of Manasseh, had built an altar on the side of Jordan, "the whole congregation of the children of Israel gathered together at Shiloh to go up to Josh. xxii. " war

“ war against them, and sent Phineas the son of Eleazer, and with him SECT. 9.
 “ ten princes, &c.” This was the highest and most important action that could concern a people, even war or peace, and that not with strangers, but their own brethren. Joshua was then alive: the elders never failed; but this was not transacted by him or them, but by the collected body of the people; “ for they sent Phineas.” This democratical embassy was democratically received: it was not directed to one man, but to all the children of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, and the answer was sent by them all; which being pleasing to Phineas, and the ten that were with him, they made their report to the congregation, and all was quiet.

The last eminent act performed by Joshua was the calling of a like assembly to Shechem, composed of elders, heads of families, judges, officers, and Jos. xxiv.
 all the people, to whom he proposed, and they agreeing, made a covenant before the Lord.

Joshua being dead, the proceedings of every tribe were grounded upon counsels taken at such assemblies among themselves for their own concern-ments, as appears by the actions of Judah, Simeon, &c. against the Ca- Judg. i. naanites; and when the levite complained that his wife had been forced by those of Gibeah, the whole congregation of Israel met together at Mizpeth from all parts, “ even from Dan to Beersheba,” as one man, and there resolved upon that terrible war which they made against the tribe of Benjamin.
 The like assembly was gathered together for the election of Saul, every man was there: and tho’ the elders only are said to have asked a king of Samuel, they seem to have been deputed from the whole congregation; for God said, “ Harken to the voice of the people.” In the same manner the tribe of 1 Sam. viii. 7.
 Judah, and after that the rest, chose and anointed David to be their king. After the death of Solomon all Israel met together to treat with Rehoboam; and not receiving satisfaction from him, ten of the tribes abrogated his kingdom.

If these actions were considered singly by themselves, Calvin might have given the name of a democracy to the Hebrew government, as well as to that of Athens; for without doubt they evidently manifest the supreme power to have been in the supreme manner in these general assemblies; but the government (as to its outward order) consisting of those three parts, which comprehend the three simple species, tho’ in truth it was a theocracy; and no times having been appointed, nor occasions specified, upon which judges should be chosen, or these assemblies called; whereas the sanhedrim, which was the aristocratical part, was permanent, the whole might rightly be called an aristocracy, that part prevailing above the others: and tho’ Josephus calls it a theocracy, by reason of God’s presence with his people; yet in relation to man he calls it an aristocracy, and says, that Saul’s first sin, by which he fell from the kingdom, was, that “ gubernationem optimatum sustulit;” which could not be, if they were governed by a monarch before he was chosen.

Our author taking no notice of these matters, first endeavours to prove the excellency of monarchy from natural instinct; and then begging the question, says, that God did always govern his people by monarchy; whereas he ought in the first place to have observed, that “ this instinct” (if there CHAP. II. be any such thing) "is only an irrational appetite, attributed to beasts," that know not why they do any thing; "and is to be followed only by those men who being equally irrational, live in the same ignorance:" and the second being proved to be absolutely false by the express words of the scripture, Judg. xviii. "there was then no king in Israel," several times repeated, and the whole series of the history, he hath no other evasion than to say, "that even then the Israelites were under the kingly government of the fathers of particular families."

It appears by the forementioned text cited also by our author, that in the assembly of the people, gathered together to take counsel concerning the war against Benjamin, were four hundred thousand footmen that drew sword: they all arose together, saying, "Not a man of us shall go to his tent. So all the men of Israel were gathered together against the city." This is repeated several times in the relation. The Benjamites proceeded in the like manner in preparing for their defence; and if all these who did so meet to consult and determine were monarchs, there were then in Israel and Benjamin four hundred and twenty-six thousand seven hundred monarchs or kings, tho' the scriptures say there was not one.

If yet our author insist upon his notion of kingly government, I desire to know who were the subjects, if all these were kings; for the text says, that the "whole congregation was gathered together as one man from Dan to Beersheba." If there can be so many kings without one subject, what becomes of the right of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that was to have been devolved upon one man as heir to them, and thereby lord of all? If every man had an equal part in that inheritance, and by virtue of it became a king, why is not the same eternally subdivided to as many men as are in the world, who are also kings? If this be their natural condition, how comes it to be altered, till they do unthrone themselves by consent to set up one or more to have a power over them all? Why should they divest themselves of their natural right to set up one above themselves, unless in consideration of their own good? If the 426700 kings might retain the power in themselves, or give it to one, why might they not give it to any such number of men as should best please themselves, or retain it in their own hands, as they did till the days of Saul; or frame, limit, and direct it, according to their own pleasure? If this be true, God is the author of democracy; and no assertor of human liberty did ever claim more than the people of God did enjoy and exercise at the time when our author says they were under the kingly government; which liberty being not granted by any peculiar concession or institution, the same must belong to all mankind.

It is in vain to say the 426700 men were heads of families; for the scripture only says, "They were footmen that drew the sword," or rather all the men of Israel from Dan to Beersheba, who were able to make war. When six hundred Benjamites did only remain of the 26700, it is plain that no more were left of that tribe, their women and children having been destroyed in the cities after their defeat. The next chapter makes the matter yet more plain; for when all that were at the congregation in Mizpeth were found to have sworn they would not give their daughters to any of the tribe of Benjamin, no Israelite was free from the oath, but the men of Jabesh-gilead, who had not been at the assembly: all the rest of Israel was therefore comprehended; and they continuing to govern in a popular way with absolute power, sent twelve thousand of their most valiant men to destroy all the males of Jabesh-gilead, and the women that had lain by man, reserving the virgins for the Benjamites. This is enough for my purpose: for the question is not concerning the power that every householder in London hath over his wife, children, and servants; but whether they are all perpetually subject to one man and family; and I intend not to set up their wives, prentices, and children, against them, or to diminish their rights, but to assert them, as the gift of God and nature, no otherwise to be restrained than by laws made with their consent.

Jabesh-

Reason failing, our author pleases himself with terms of his own invention: "When the people begged a king of Samuel, they were governed by a kingly power: God out of a special love and care to the house of Israel, did chuse to be their king himself, and did govern them at that time by his viceroy Samuel and his sons." The behaviour of the Israelites towards Samuel has been thought proud, perverse, and obstinate; but the fine court-word "begging" was never before applied to them; and their insolent fury was not only seen against Samuel, but against God: "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me." And I think Filmer is the first who ever found that beggars in begging did reject him of whom they begged: or if they were beggars, they were such as would not be denied; for after all that Samuel had said to dissuade them from their wicked design, they said, "Nay, but we will have a king."

But lest I should be thought too much inclined to contradict our author, I confess that once he hath happened to be in the right. "God out of a special love to the house of Israel chose to be their king: he gave them laws, prescribed a form of government, raised up men in a wonderful manner to execute it, filled them with his spirit, was ever present when they called upon him: he gave them counsel in their doubts, and assistance in all their extremities: he made a covenant with them, and would be exalted by them." But what is this to an earthly monarch? Who can from hence derive a right to any one man to play the lord over his brethren, or a reason why any nation should set him up? God is our Lord by right of creation, and our only Lord, because he only hath created us. If any other were equal to him in wisdom, power, goodness, and beneficence to us, he might challenge the same duty from us. If growing out of ourselves, receiving being from none, depending on no providence, we were offered the protection of a wisdom subject to no error, a goodness that could never fail, and a power that nothing could resist; it were reasonable for us to enter into a covenant, submit ourselves to him, and with all the faculties of our minds to addict ourselves to his service. But what right can from hence accrue to a mortal creature like to one of us, from whom we have received nothing, and who stands in need of help as much as we? Who can from hence deduce an argument to persuade us to depend upon his wisdom, who has as little as other men? To submit to his will who is CHAP. II. subject to the same frailties, passions, and vices, with the rest of mankind?

Or to expect protection and defence from him whose life depends upon as slender threads as our own; and who can have no power but that which we confer upon him? If this cannot be done, but is of all things the most contrary to common sense, no man can in himself have any right over us; we are all as free as the four hundred twenty-six thousand seven hundred Hebrew kings: we can naturally owe allegiance to none; and I doubt whether all the lusts that have reigned amongst men since the beginning of the world, have brought more guilt and misery upon them than that preposterous and impudent pretence of imitating what God had instituted. When Saul set himself most violently to oppose the command of God, he pretended to fulfil it: when the Jews grew weary of God's government, and resolved to reject him, that he should not reign over them, they used some of Moses's words, and asked that king of God, whom they intended to set up against him: but this king had not been set up against God, the people had not rejected God, and sinned in asking for him, if every nation by a general law ought to have one, or by a particular law one had been appointed by him over them. There was therefore no king amongst them, nor any law of God or nature, particular or general, according to which they ought to have one.

S E C T. X.

Aristotle was not simply for monarchy, or against popular government; but approved or disapproved of either according to circumstances.

OUR author well observes, that Aristotle is hardly brought to give a general opinion in favour of monarchy, as if it were the best form of government, or to say true, never does it. He uses much caution, proposes conditions, and limitations, and makes no decision but according to circumstances. Men of wisdom and learning are subject to such doubts; but none ought to wonder if stupidity and ignorance defend Filmer and his followers from them; or that their hatred to the antient virtue should give them an aversion to the learning that was the nurse of it. Those who neither understand the several species of government, nor the various tempers of nations, may without fear or shame give their opinions in favour of that which best pleaseth them; but wise men will always proportion their praises to the merit of the subject, and never commend that simply which is good only according to circumstances. Aristotle highly applauds monarchy, when the monarch has more of those virtues that tend to the good of a commonwealth than all they who compose it. This is the king mentioned in his Ethics, and extolled in his Politics: he is above all by nature, and ought not by a municipal law to be made equal to others in power: he ought to govern, because it is better for a people to be governed by him, than to enjoy their liberty; or rather they do enjoy their liberty, which is never more safe, than when it is defended by one who is a living law to himself and others. SECT. 10. Wheresoever such a man appears, he ought to reign: he bears in his person the divine character of a sovereign: God has raised him above all; and such as will not submit to him, ought to be accounted sons of Belial, brought forth and slain. But he does withall confess, that if no such man be found, there is no natural king: all the prerogatives belonging to him vanish, for want of one who is capable of enjoying them. He lays severe censures upon those who, not being thus qualified, take upon them to govern men equal to or better than themselves; and judges the assumption of such powers by persons who are not naturally adapted to the administration of them, as barbarous usurpations, which no law or reason can justify; and is not so much transported with the excellency of this true king, as not to confess he ought to be limited by law: "Qui legem præesse jubet, videtur jubere præesse Deum & leges: qui autem hominem præesse jubet, adjungit & bestiam; libido quippe talis est, atque obliquos agit etiam viros optimos, qui sunt in potestate; ex quo mens atque appetitus lex est." Arist. Polit. l. iii. c. 12. This agrees with the words of the best king that is known to have been in the world, proceeding, as is most probable, from a sense of the passions that reigned in his own breast; "Man being in honour, hath no understanding, but is like to the beast that perisheth." This shews that such as deny that kings do reign by law, or that laws may be put upon kings, do equally set themselves against the opinions of wise men, and the word of God: and our author, having found that learning made the Grecians seditious, may reasonably doubt, that religion may make others worse; so as none will be fit subjects of his applauded government, but those who have neither religion nor learning; and that it cannot be introduced till both be extinguished.
or

Aristotle having declared his mind concerning government, in the books expressly written on that subject, whatsoever is said by the bye in his moral discourses, must be referred to and interpreted by the other; and if he said (which I do not find), that monarchy is the best form of government, and a popular state the worst, he cannot be thought to have meant otherwise, than that those nations were the most happy, who had such a man as he thinks fit to be made a monarch; and those the most unhappy, who neither had such a one, nor a few, that any way excelled the rest; but all being equally brutish, must take upon them the government they were unable to manage: for he does no-where admit any other end of just and civil government, than the good of the governed; nor any advantage due to one or a few persons, unless for such virtues as conduce to the common good of the society. And as our author thinks learning makes men seditious, Aristotle also acknowledges, that those who have understanding and courage, which may be taken for learning, or the effect of it, will never endure the government of one or a few that do not excel them in virtue; but no-where dispraises a popular government, unless the multitude be composed of such as are barbarous, stupid, lewd, vicious, and incapable of the happiness for which governments are instituted; who cannot live to themselves, but, like a herd of beasts, must be brought

CHAP. II. brought under the dominion of another; or who, having amongst themselves { such an excellent person as is above described, will not submit to him, but either kill, banish, or bring him to be equal with others, whom God had made to excel all. I do not trouble myself, or the reader, with citing here or there a line out of his books, but refer myself to those who have perused his moral and political writings, submitting to the severest censures, if this be not the true sense of them; and that virtue alone, in his opinion, ought to give the pre-eminence. And as Aristotle, following the wise men of those times, shews us how far reason, improved by meditation, can advance in the knowledge and love of that which is truly good; so we may in Filmer guided by Heylin, see an example of corrupted christians, extinguishing the light of religion by their vices, and degenerating into beasts, whilst they endeavour to support the personal interest of some men, who, being raised to dignities by the consent of nations, or by unwarrantable ways and means, would cast all the power into the hands of such as happen to be born in their families; as if governments had not been instituted for the common good of nations, but only to increase their pride, and foment their vices; or that the care and direction of a great people were so easy a work, that every man, woman, or child, how young, weak, foolish, or wicked soever, may be worthy of it and able to manage it.

S E C T. XI.

Liberty produceth virtue, order, and stability: slavery is accompanied with vice, weakness, and misery.

OUR author's judgment, as well as inclinations to virtue, are manifested in the preference he gives to the manners of the Assyrians, and other eastern nations, before the Grecians and Romans: whereas the first were never remarkable for any thing, but pride, lewdness, treachery, cowardice, madness, and hatred to all that is good, whilst the others excelled in wisdom, valour, and all the virtues that deserve imitation. This was so well observed DeCiv. Dei. by St. Augustin, that he brings no stronger argument to prove, that God leaves nothing that is good in man unrewarded, than that he gave the dominion of the best part of the world to the Romans, who in moral virtues excelled all other nations. And I think no example can be alledged of a free people that has ever been conquered by an absolute monarch, unless he did incomparably surpass them in riches and strength; whereas many great kings have been overthrown by small republics: and the success being constantly the same, it cannot be attributed to fortune, but must necessarily be the production of virtue and good order. Machiavel, discoursing of these matters, finds virtue to be so essentially necessary to the establishment and preservation of liberty, that he thinks it impossible for a corrupted people to set up a good government, government, or for a tyranny to be introduced, if they be virtuous; and makes SECT. II.

 this * conclusion, “That where the matter (that is, the body of the people) is “not corrupted, tumults and disorders do no hurt; and where it is corrupted, “good laws do no good:” which being confirmed by reason and experience,
 I think no wise man has ever contradicted him.

But I do not more wonder, that Filmer should look upon absolute monarchy to be the nurse of virtue, tho’ we see they did never subsist together, than that he should attribute order and stability to it; whereas order doth principally consist in appointing to every one his right place, office, or work; and this lays the whole weight of the government upon one person, who very often does neither deserve nor is able to bear, the least part of it. Plato, Aristotle, Hooker, and (I may say, in short) all wise men have held, that order required, that the wisest, best, and most valiant men, should be placed in the offices where wisdom, virtue, and valour, are requisite. If common sense did not teach us this, we might learn it from the scripture. When God gave the conduct of his people to Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and others, he endowed them with all the virtues and graces that were required for the right performance of their duty. When the Israelites were oppressed by the Midianites, Philistines, and Ammonites, they expected help from the most wise and valiant. When Hannibal was at the gates of Rome, and had filled Italy with fire and blood, or when the Gauls overwhelmed that country with their multitudes and fury, the senate and people of Rome put themselves under the conduct of Camillus, Manlius, Fabius, Scipio, and the like; and when they failed to chuse such as were fit for the work to be done, they received such defeats as convinced them of their error. But if our author say true, order did require, that the power of defending the country should have been annexed as an inheritance to one family, or left to him that could get it, and the exercise of all authority committed to the next in blood, tho’ the weakest of women, or the basest of men.

The like may be said of judging, or doing of justice; and it is absurd to pretend, that either is expected from the power, not the person, of the monarch; for experience doth too well shew how much all things halt in relation to justice or defence, when there is a defect in him that ought to judge us, and to fight our battles. But of all things this ought least to be alledged by the advocates for absolute monarchy, who deny that the authority can be separated from the person, and lay it as a fundamental principle, that whosoever hath it, may do what he pleases, and be accountable to no man.

Our author’s next work is to shew, that stability is the effect of this good order. But he ought to have known, that stability is then only worthy of praise

* Si puo far questa conclusione, che dove la materia non e corrotta, i tumulti ed altri scandali non nuocono: la dove la e corrotta le buone leggi non giovano. Machiav. Disc. sopra T. Livio, lib. 1. Livy in the admirable preface to his history has these remarkable words, “donec ad hæc tempora, quibus nec vitia nostra, nec remedia pati possumus, perventum est.” And Tacitus observes, “non aliud discordantis patriæ remedium fuisse, quam ut ab uno regeretur—necessitudo reipublicæ, in qua nullus tunc legibus locus”—Ann. l. i. c. 9. Seneca condemns Brutus’s conduct for a like reason that Cicero blames Cato, who considered himself as acting in Plato’s republic, and not “in fæce Romuli.” Sen. de ben. l. ii. c. 20. The whole chapter is really excellent.

CHAP. II. praise, when it is in that which is good. No man delights in sickness or pain, because it is long or incurable; nor in slavery and misery, because it is perpetual: much less will any man in his senses commend a permanency in vice and wickedness. He must therefore prove, that the stability he boasts of is in things that are good, or all that he says of it signifies nothing.

I might leave him here with as little fear, that any man who shall espouse his quarrel, will ever be able to remove this obstacle, as that he himself should rise out of his grave, and do it: but I hope to prove, that of all things under the sun, there is none more mutable or unstable than absolute monarchy; which is all that I dispute against, professing much veneration for that which is mixed, regulated by law, and directed to the public good.

This might be proved by many arguments; but I shall confine myself to two; the one drawn from reason, the other from matters of fact.

Nothing can be called stable, that is not so in principle and practice, in which respect human nature is not well capable of stability; but the utmost deviation from it that can be imagined, is, when such an error is laid for a foundation as can never be corrected. All will confess, that if there be any stability in man, it must be in wisdom and virtue, and in those actions that are thereby directed; for in weakness, folly, and madness, there can be none. The stability therefore that we seek, in relation to the exercise of civil and military powers, can never be found, unless care be taken, that such as shall exercise those powers, be endowed with the qualities that should make them stable. This is utterly repugnant to our author's doctrine: he lays, for a foundation, that the succession goes to the next in blood, without distinction of age, sex, or personal qualities; whereas even he himself could not have the impudence to say, that children and women (where they are admitted), or fools, madmen, and such as are full of all wickedness, do not come to be the heirs of reigning families, as well as of the meanest. The stability therefore that can be expected from such a government, either depends upon those who have none in themselves, or is referred wholly to chance, which is directly opposite to stability.

This would be the case, tho' it were (as we say) an even wager, whether the person would be fit or unfit, and that there were as many men in the world able as unable to perform the duty of a king. But experience shewing, that, among many millions of men, there is hardly one that possesses the qualities required in a king, it is so many to one, that he upon whom the lot shall fall, will not be the man we seek, in whose person and government there can be such a stability as is asserted. And that failing, all must necessarily fail; for there can be no stability in his will, laws, or actions, who has none in his person.

That we may see whether this be verified by experience, we need not search into the dark relations of the Babylonian and Assyrian monarchies: those rude ages afford us little instruction; and tho' the fragments of history remaining do sufficiently shew, that all things there were in perpetual fluctuation, by reason of the madness of their kings, and the violence of those who transported the empire from one place or family to another, I will not SECT. II. much rely upon them, but slightly touching some of their stories, pass to { those that are better known to us.
who

The kings of those ages seem to have lived rather like beasts in a forest, than men joined in civil society: they followed the example of Nimrod the mighty hunter; force was the only law that prevailed, the stronger devoured the weaker, and continued in power till he was ejected by one of more strength or better fortune. By this means the race of Ninus was destroyed by Belochus. Arbaces rent the kingdom asunder, and took Media to himself. Merodach extinguished the race of Belochus, and was made king: Nabuchodonosor like a flood overwhelmed all for a time, destroyed the kingdoms of Jerusalem and Egypt, with many others, and found no obstacle, till his rage and pride turned to a most bestial madness: and the Assyrian empire was wholly abolished at the death of his grandchild Belshazzar; and no stability can be found in the reigns of those great kings, unless that name be given to the pride, idolatry, cruelty, and wickedness, in which they remained constant. If we examine things more distinctly, we shall find that all things varied according to the humour of the prince. Whilst Pharaoh lived, who had received such signal services from Joseph, the Israelites were well used: but when another rose up who knew him not, they were persecuted with all the extremities of injustice and cruelty, till the furious king persisting in his design of exterminating them, brought destruction upon himself and the nation. Where the like power hath prevailed, it has ever produced the like effects. When some great men of Persia had persuaded Darius, that it was a fine thing to command that no man for the space of thirty days should make any petition to God or man, but to the king only, Daniel the most wise and holy man then in the world must be thrown to the lions. When God had miraculously saved him, the same sentence was passed against the princes of the nation. When Haman had filled Ahasuerus's ears with lyes, all the Jews were appointed to be slain; and when the fraud of that villain was detected, leave was given them, with the like precipitancy, to kill whom they pleased. When the Israelites came to have kings, they were made subject to the same storms, and always with their blood suffered the penalty of their prince's madness. When one kind of fury possessed Saul, he slew the priests, persecuted David, and would have killed his brave son Jonathan: when he fell under another, he took upon him to do the priest's office, pretended to understand the word of God better than Samuel, and spared those that God had commanded him to destroy: upon another whimsy he killed the Gibeonites, and never rested from finding new inventions to vex the people, till he had brought many thousands of them to perish with himself, and his sons, on mount Gilboa. We do not find any king, in wisdom, valour, and holiness, equal to David; and yet he, falling under the temptations that attend the greatest fortunes, brought civil wars, and a plague, upon the nation. When Solomon's heart was drawn away by strange women, he filled the land with idols, and oppressed the people with intolerable tributes. Rehoboam's folly made

P

that

CHAP. II. that rent in the kingdom which could never be made up. Under his successors the people served God, Baal, or Ashtaroth, as best pleased him who had the power; and no other marks of stability can be alledged to have been in that kingdom, than the constancy of their kings in the practice of idolatry, their cruelty to the prophets, hatred to the Jews, and civil wars producing such slaughters as are reported in few other stories: the kingdom was in the space of about two hundred years possessed by nine several families, not one of them getting possession otherwise than by the slaughter of his predecessor, and the extinction of his race; and ended in the bondage of the ten tribes, which continues to this day.

Plut. in vit.
Alex.

He that desires farther proofs of this point, may seek them in the histories of Alexander of Macedon, and his successors: he seems to have been endowed with all the virtues that nature improved by discipline did ever attain, so that he is believed to be the man meant by Aristotle, who on account of the excellency of his virtues, was by nature framed for a king; and Plutarch ascribes his conquests rather to those, than to his fortune: but even that virtue was overthrown by the successes that accompanied it: he burnt the most magnificent palace of the world, in a frolick, to please a mad drunken whore: upon the most frivolous suggestions of eunuchs and rascals, he killed the best and bravest of his friends; and his valour, which had no equal, not subsisting without his other virtues, perished when he became lewd, proud, cruel, and superstitious; so as it may be truly said, he died a coward. His successors did not differ from him: when they had killed his mother, wife, and children, they exercised their fury against one another; and tearing the kingdom to pieces, the survivors left the sword as an inheritance to their families, who perished by it, or under the weight of the Roman chains.

When the Romans had lost that liberty which had been the nurse of their virtue, and gained the empire in lieu of it, they attained to our author's applauded stability. Julius being slain in the senate, the first question was, whether it could be restored, or not? and that being decided by the battle of Philippi, the conquerors set themselves to destroy all the eminent men in the city, as the best means to establish the monarchy. Augustus gained it by the death of Antonius, and the corruption of the soldiers; and he dying naturally, or by the fraud of his wife, the empire was transferred to her son Tiberius; under whom the miserable people suffered the worst effects of the most impure lust, and inhuman cruelty: he being stifled, the government went on with much uniformity and stability; Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, regularly and constantly did all the mischief they could, and were not more like to each other in the villainies they committed, than in the deaths they suffered. Vespasian's more gentle reign did no way compensate the blood he spilt to attain the empire: and the benefits received from Titus's short-lived virtue were infinitely overbalanced by the detestable vices of his brother Domitian, who turned all things into the old channel of cruelty, lust, rapine, and perfidiousness. His slaughter gave a little breath to the gasping perishing

ing world; and men might be virtuous under the government of Nerva, Trajan, Antoninus, Aurelius, and a few more; tho' even in their time religion was always dangerous. But when the power fell into the hands of Commodus, Heliogabalus, Caracalla, and others of that sort, nothing was safe but obscurity, or the utmost excesses of lewdness and baseness. However, whilst the will of the governor passed for a law, and the power did usually fall into the hands of such as were most bold and violent, the utmost security that any man could have for his person or estate, depended upon his temper; and princes themselves, whether good or bad, had no longer leases of their lives, than the furious and corrupted soldiers would give them; and the empire of the world was changeable, according to the success of a battle.

Matters were not much mended when the emperors became christians: some favoured those who were called "orthodox," and gave great revenues to corrupt the clergy. Others supported arianism, and persecuted the orthodox with as much asperity as the pagans had done. Some revolted, and shewed themselves more fierce against the professors of christianity, than they that had never had any knowledge of it. The world was torn in pieces amongst them, and often suffered as great miseries by their sloth, ignorance, and cowardice, as by their fury and madness, till the empire was totally dissolved and lost. That which, under the weakness and irregularity of a popular government, had conquered all from the Euphrates to Britain, and destroyed the kingdoms of Asia, Egypt, Macedon, Numidia, and a multitude of others, was made a prey to unknown barbarous nations, and rent into as many pieces as it had been composed of when it enjoyed the stability that accompanies divine and absolute monarchy.

The like may be said of all the kingdoms in the world; they may have their ebblings and flowings according to the virtues or vices of princes, or their favourites; but can never have any stability, because there is, and can be none in them: or if any exception may be brought against this rule, it must be of those monarchies only which are mixed and regulated by laws, where diets, parliaments, assemblies of estates, or senates, may supply the defects of a prince, restrain him if he prove extravagant, and reject such as are found to be unworthy of their office, which are as odious to our author and his followers, as the most popular governments, and can be of no advantage to his cause.

There is another ground of perpetual fluctuation in absolute monarchies; or such as are grown so strong, that they cannot be restrained by law, tho' according to their institution they ought to be, distinct from, but in some measure relating to the inclinations of the monarch, that is, the impulse of ministers, favourites, wives, or whores, who frequently govern all things according to their own passions or interests. And tho' we cannot say who were the favourites of every one of the Assyrian or Egyptian kings, yet the examples before-mentioned of the different method followed in Egypt before and after the death of Joseph, and in Persia whilst the idolatrous princes,

CHAP. II. and Haman, or Daniel, Esther, and Mordecai, were in credit; the violent changes happening thereupon give us reason to believe the like were in the times of other kings: and if we examine the histories of later ages, and the lives of princes, that are more exactly known, we shall find, that kingdoms are more frequently swayed by those who have power with the prince, than by his own judgment: so that whosoever hath to deal with princes concerning foreign or domestic affairs, is obliged more to regard the humour of those persons, than the most important interests of a prince or people.

I might draw too much envy upon myself, if I should take upon me to cite all the examples of this kind that are found in modern histories, or the memoirs that do more precisely shew the temper of princes, and the secret springs by which they were moved. But as those who have well observed the management of affairs in France during the reigns of Francis the First, Henry the Second, Francis the Second, Charles the Ninth, Henry the Third, Henry the Fourth, and Lewis the Thirteenth, will confess, that the interests of the dukes of Montmorency and Guise, Queen Catherine de Medicis, the duke of Epernon, la Fosseuse, Madam de Guiche, de Gabriele, d'Entragues, the Marechal d'Ancre, the constable de Luines, and the cardinal de Richelieu, were more to be considered by those who had any private or public business to treat at court, than the opinions of those princes, or the most weighty concerns of the state; so it cannot be denied, that other kingdoms where princes legally have, or wrongfully usurp the like power, are governed in the like manner; or if it be, there is hardly any prince's reign that will not furnish abundant proof of what I have asserted.

I agree with our author, that "good order and stability produce strength." If monarchy therefore excel in them, absolute monarchies should be of more strength than those that are limited according to the proportion of their riches, extent of territory, and number of people that they govern; and those limited monarchies in the like proportion more strong than popular governments or commonwealths. If this be so, I wonder how a few of "those giddy Greeks" who, according to our author, "had learning enough only to make them seditious," came to overthrow those vast armies of the Persians as often as they met with them; and seldom found any other difficulty than what did arise from their own countrymen, who sometimes sided with the Barbarians. Seditions are often raised by a little prating; but when one man was to fight against fifty, or a hundred, as at the battles of Salamine, Platea, Marathon, and others, then industry, wisdom, skill, and valour, were required; and if their learning had not made them to excel in those virtues, they must have been overwhelmed by the prodigious multitudes of their enemies. This was so well known to the Persians, that when Cyrus the younger prepared to invade his brother Artaxerxes he brought together indeed a vast army of Asiatics; but chiefly relied upon the counsel and valour of ten thousand Grecians, whom he had engaged to serve him. These giddy heads, accompanied with good hands, in the great battle near Babylon, found no resistance from Artaxerxes's army; and when Cyrus was killed by accident accident in the pursuit of the victory they had gained, and their own officers SECT. II. treacherously murdered, they made good their retreat into Greece under the conduct of Xenophon, in despite of above four hundred thousand horse and foot, who endeavoured to oppose them. They were destitute of horse, money, provisions, friends, and all other help, except what their wisdom and valour furnished them; and thereupon relying, they passed over the bellies of all the enemies that ventured to appear against them in a march of a thousand miles. These things were performed in the weakness of popular confusion; but Agesilaus not being sensible of so great defects, accompanied only with six-and-thirty Spartans, and such other forces as he could raise upon his personal credit, adventured without authority or money to undertake a war against that great king Artaxerxes; and having often beaten Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes his lieutenants, was preparing to assault him in the heart of his kingdom, when he was commanded by the ephori to return for the defence of his own country.

Plut. vit.
Artax.

It may in like manner appear strange, that Alexander, with the forces of Greece, much diminished by the Phoecean, Peloponnesian, Theban, and other intestine wars, could overthrow all the powers of the east, and conquer more provinces than any other army ever saw; if so much order and stability were to be found in absolute monarchies, and if the liberty in which the Grecians were educated did only fit them for seditions: and it would seem no less astonishing, that Rome and Greece, whilst they were free, should furnish such numbers of men excelling in all moral virtues, to the admiration of all succeeding ages; and thereby become so powerful that no monarchs were able to resist them; and that the same countries since the loss of their liberty, have always been weak, base, cowardly, and vicious, if the same liberty had not been the mother and nurse of their virtue, as well as the root of their power.

It cannot be said that Alexander was a monarch in our author's sense; for the power of the Macedonian kings was small. Philip confessed the people were freemen, and his son found them to be so, when his fortune had overthrown his virtue, and he fell to hate and fear that generosity of spirit which it creates. He made his conquests by it, and loved it as long as he deserved to be loved. His successors had the same fortune: when their hearts came to be filled with barbaric pride, and to delight only in rendering men slaves, they became weak and base, and were easily overthrown by the Romans, whose virtue and fortune did also perish with their liberty. All the nations they had to deal with, had the same fate. They never conquered a free people without extreme difficulty: they received many great defeats, and were often necessitated to fight for their lives against the Latins, Sabines, Tuscans, Samnites, Carthaginians, Spaniards; and in the height of their power found it a hard work to subdue a few poor Etolians: but the greatest kings were easily overcome. When Antiochus had insolently boasted that he would cover Greece and Italy with the multitude of his troops, Quintius Flaminius ingeniously compared his army of Persians, Chaldeans, Syrians, Mesopotamians, Cappadocians, Arabians, and other base Asiatic slaves, to a supper set Plut. in vit. Q. Flamini. before

CHAP. II. before him by a Grecian friend, which seeming to be of several sorts of venison, was all cut out of one hog, variously dressed; and not long after was as easily slaughtered as the hog had been. The greatest danger of the war with Mithridates was to avoid his poisons and treacheries; and to follow him through the deserts where he fled. When Lucullus with less than twenty thousand men had put Tigranes with two hundred thousand to flight, the Roman soldiers, who for a while had pursued the chase, stood still on a sudden, and fell into loud laughter at themselves for using their arms against such wretched cowardly slaves. If this be not enough to prove the falshood of our author's proposition, I desire it may be considered, whether good order or stability be wanting in Venice: whether Tuscany be in a better condition to defend itself since it fell under the power of the Medices, or when it was full of free cities: whether it were an easy work to conquer Switzerland: whether the Hollanders are of greater strength since the recovery of their liberty, or when they groaned under the yoke of Spain: and lastly, whether the intire conquest of Scotland and Ireland, the victories obtained against the Hollanders when they were in the height of their power, and the reputation to which England did rise in less than five years after 1648, be good marks of the instability, disorder, and weakness of free nations: and if the contrary be true, nothing can be more absurdly false than our author's assertion.

Plut. in vit.
Lucul.

S E C T. XII.

The glory, virtue, and power, of the Romans began and ended with their liberty.

AMONG many fine things proposed by our author, I see none more to be admired, or that better declares the soundness of his judgment, than that he is only pleased with the beginning and end of the Roman empire; and says, "that their time of liberty" (between those two extremes) "had nothing of good in it, but that it was of short continuance:" whereas I dare affirm, that all that was ever desirable, or worthy of praise and imitation in Rome, did proceed from its liberty, grow up, and perish with it: which I think will not be contradicted by any, but those who prefer the most fordid vices before the most eminent virtues; who believe the people to have been more worthily employed by the Tarquins in cleansing jakes and common sewers, than in acquiring the dominion of the best part of mankind; and account it better for a people to be oppressed with hard labour under a proud master in a sterile, unhealthy ten-mile territory, than to command all the countries that lie between the Euphrates and Britain. Such opinions will hardly find any better patrons than Filmer and his disciples, nor the matters of fact, as they are represented, be denied by any that know the histories of those

those times. Many Romans may have had seeds of virtue in them, whilst SECT. 12. in the infancy of that city they lived under kings; but they brought forth little fruit. Tarquin surnamed the Proud, being a Grecian by extraction, had perhaps observed, that the virtue of that nation had rendered them averse to the divine government he desired to set up; and having by his well-natur'd Tullia poisoned his own brother her husband, and his own wife her sister, married her, killed her father, and spared none that he thought able to oppose his designs, to finish the work, he butchered the senate, with such as seemed most eminent among the people, and like a most pious father endeavoured to render the city desolate: during that time they who would not be made instruments of those villainies were obliged for their own safety to conceal their virtues; but, he being removed, they shined in their glory. Whilst he reigned, Brutus, Valerius, Horatius, Herminius, Lartius, and Coriolanus, lay hid and unregarded; but when they came to fight for themselves, and to employ their valour for the good of their country, they gave such testimonies of bravery, as have been admired by all succeeding ages; and settled such a discipline, as produced others like to them, or more excellent than they, as long as their liberty lasted. In two hundred and sixty years that they remained under the government of kings, tho' all of them, the last only excepted, were chosen by the senate and people, and did as much to advance the public service as could reasonably be expected from them, their dominion hardly extended so far as from London to Hounslow: but in little more than three hundred years after they recovered their liberty, they had subdued all the warlike nations of Italy, destroyed vast armies of the Gauls, Cimbri, and Germans, overthrown the formidable power of Carthage, conquered the Cisalpine and Transalpine Gauls, with all the nations of Spain, notwithstanding the ferocity of the one and the more constant valour of the other, and the prodigious multitudes of both: they had brought all Greece into subjection, and by the conquest of Macedon the spoils of the world to adorn their city; and found so little difficulty in all the wars that happened between them and the greatest kings after the death of Alexander of Epirus, and Pyrrhus, that the defeats of Syphax, Perseus, Antiochus, Prusias, Tigranes, Ptolemy, and many others, did hardly deserve to be numbered amongst their victories.

It were ridiculous to impute this to chance, or to think, that fortune, which of all things is the most variable, could for so many ages continue the same course, unless supported by virtue; or to suppose, that all these monarchies, which are so much extolled, could have been destroyed by that commonwealth, if it had wanted strength, stability, virtue, or good order. The secret counsels of God are impenetrable; but the ways by which he accomplishes his designs are often evident: when he intends to exalt a people, he fills both them and their leaders with the virtues suitable to the accomplishment of his end; and takes away all wisdom and virtue from those he resolves to destroy. The pride of the Babylonians and Assyrians fell thro' the baseness of Sardanapalus; and the great city was taken while Belshazzar lay drunk amongst his whores: the empire was transported to the Persians and Grecians

CHAP. II. Grecians by the valour of Cyrus, Alexander, and the brave armies that followed them. Histories furnish us with innumerable examples of this kind: but I think none can be found of a cowardly, weak, effeminate, foolish, ill-disciplin'd people, that have ever subdued such as were eminent in strength, wisdom, valour, and good discipline; or that these qualities have been found or subsisted any-where, unless they were cultivated and nourished by a well ordered government. If this therefore was found among the Romans, and not in the kingdoms they overthrew, they had the order and stability which the monarchies had not; and the strength and virtue by which they obtained such success was the product of them. But if this virtue, and the glorious effects of it, did begin with liberty, it did also expire with the same. The best men that had not fallen in battle were gleaned up by the proscriptions, or circumvented for the most part by false and frivolous accusations. Mankind is inclined to vice, and the way to virtue is so hard, that it wants encouragement; but when all honours, advantages, and preferments, are given to vice, and despised virtue finds no other reward than hatred, persecution, and death, there are few who will follow it. Tacitus well describes the state of the empire, when the power was absolutely fallen into the hands of

C. Tacit. hist. l. i. c. 2. one: "Italia novis cladibus, vel post longam seculorum seriem repetitis, afflicta; urbs incendiis vastata, consumtis antiquissimis delubris, ipso capitolio civium manibus incenso; pollutæ ceremoniæ; magna adulteria; plenum exiliis mare; infecti cædibus scopuli; atrocius in urbe sævitum; nobilitas, opes, omissi vel gesti honores pro crimine, & ob virtutes certissimum exitium." His following words shew, that the rewards of these abominations were not less odious than the things themselves: the highest dignities were bestowed upon the "delatores," who were a kind of rogues like to our Irish witnesses, or those that by a new coined word we call "trepanners." This is not a picture drawn by a vulgar hand, but by one of the best painters in the world; and being a model that so much pleases our author, it is good to see what it produced. The first fruit was such an intire degeneracy from all good, that Rome may be justly said never to have produced a brave man since the first age of her slavery. Germanicus and Corbulo were born "ex-pirante libertate;" and the recompence they received did so little encourage others to follow their example, that none have been found in any degree like to them; and those of the most noble families applied themselves to sleep, laziness, and luxury, that they might not be suspected to be better than their masters. Thraseas, Soranus, and Helvidius, were worthy men, who resolved to persist in their integrity, tho' they should die for it: but that was the only thing that made them eminent; for they were of unknown families, not Romans by birth, nor ever employ'd in war: and those emperors who did arrive to any degree of virtue, were Spaniards, Gauls, Africans, Thracians, and of all nations, except Romans. The patrician and plebeian families, which for many ages had filled the world with great commanders, and such as excelled in all virtues, being thus extinguished or corrupted, the common people fell into the lowest degree of baseness: "Plebs sordida circo & theatris fueta." That people which in magnanimity surpassed all that have been known known in the world; who never found any enterprize above their spirit to SECT. 12. undertake, and power to accomplish, with their liberty lost all their vigour and virtue. They who by their votes had disposed of kingdoms and provinces, fell to desire nothing but to live and see plays.

C. Tacit. hist. l. i. c. 4.

—Duas tantum res anxius optat, Panem & Circenses.—

Juven. Sat.
x. ver. 80.

Whether their emperors were good or bad, they usually rejoiced at their death, in hopes of getting a little money or victuals from the successor. Tho' the empire was by this means grown weak and bloodless, yet it could not fall on a sudden: so vast a body could not die in a moment: all the neighbouring nations had been so much broken by their power, that none was able to take advantage of their weakness; and life was preserved by the strength of hungry barbarians, allured by the greatness of the pay they received to defend those, who had no power left to defend themselves. This precarious and accidental help could not be durable. They who for a while had been contented with their wages, soon began to think it fit for them rather to fight for themselves, than for their weak masters; and thereupon fell to set up emperors depending on themselves, or to seize upon the naked provinces, where they found no other difficulty than to contend with other strangers, who might have the like design upon the same. Thus did the armies of the east and west set up emperors at their pleasure; and tho' the Goths, Vandals, Huns, Sueves, Alans, and others, had cruel wars among themselves, yet they feared and suffered little or nothing from the Romans. This state of things was so soon observed, that in the beginning of Tiberius's reign they who endeavoured to excite the Gauls to take arms, used no other arguments than such as were drawn from the extreme weakness of the Romans, "Quam inops Italia, plebs urbana imbellis, nihil in exercitibus validum præter externum." It was evident, that after the battles of Philippi and Actium, the strength of the Roman armies consisted of strangers; and even the victories that went under their name were gained by those nations which in the time of their liberty they had subdued. They had nothing left but riches gathered out of their vast dominions; and they learned by their ruin, that an empire acquired by virtue could not long be supported by money. They who by their valour had arrived at such a height of glory, power, greatness, and happiness, as was never equalled, and who in all appearance had nothing to fear from any foreign power, could never have fallen, unless their virtue and discipline had decayed, and the corruption of their manners had excited them to turn their victorious swords into their own bowels. Whilst they were in that flourishing condition, they thought they had nothing more to desire than continuance: but if our author's judgment is to be followed, there was "nothing of good in it, except the shortness of its continuance." They were beholden to those who wrought the change; they were the better for the battles of Pharsalia, Philippi, Munda, and Actium; the destruction of two thirds of the people, with

Q

C. Tacit.
An. iii. c. 40.

CHAP. II. with the slaughter of all the most eminent men among them was for their advantage: the proscriptions were wholesome remedies: Tacitus did not understand the state of his own country, when he seems to be ashamed Annal. l. iv. to write the history of it, "Nobis in arcto & inglorius labor;" when in-
 c. 32. stead of such glorious things as had been atchieved by the Romans, whilst either the senate, or the common people, prevailed, he had nothing left to
 c. 33. relate, but "sæva jussa, continuas accusationes, fallaces amicitias, perniciem innocentium:" they enjoyed nothing that was good from the expulsion of the Tarquins to the re-establishment of divine absolute monarchy in the persons of those pious fathers of the people, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, &c. There was no virtue in the Junii, Horatii, Cornelii, Quintii, Decii, Manlii; but the generous and tender-hearted princes before-mentioned were perfect examples of it: whilst annual magistrates governed, there was no stability; Sejanus, Macro, and Tigellinus, introduced good order: virtue was not esteemed by the antient senate and people; Messalina, Agrippina, Poppæa, Narcissus, Pallas, Vinnius, and Laco, knew how to put a just value upon it: the irregularities of popular assemblies, and want of prudence in the senate, were repaired by the temperate proceedings of the German, Pannonian, and eastern armies, or the modest discretion of the pretorian bands: the city was delivered by them from the burden of governing the world, and for its own good frequently plundered, fired, and at last, with the rest of desolated Italy, and the noblest provinces of Europe, Asia, and Africa, brought under the yoke of the most barbarous and cruel nations. By the same light we may see, that those who endeavoured to perpetuate the misery of liberty to Rome, or lost their lives in the defence of it, were the worst, or the most foolish of men; and that they were the best who did overthrow it. This rectifies all our errors; and if the highest praises are due to him that did the work, the next are well deserved by those who perished in attempting it: and if the sons of Brutus, with their companions the Vitellii and Aquilii, Claudius Appius the Decemvir, those that would have betrayed the city to Porsenna; Spurius Melius, Spur. Cassius, Manlius Capitolinus, Saturninus, Catiline, Cethegus, Lentulus, had been as fortunate as Julius Cæsar, they might as well have deserved an apotheosis. But if all this be false, absurd, bestial, and abominable, the principles that necessarily lead us to such conclusions are so also;
 which is enough to shew, that the strength, virtue, glory, wealth, power, and happiness of Rome, proceeding from liberty, did rise, grow, and perish with it.

S E C T. XIII.

There is no disorder or prejudice in changing the name or number of magistrates, whilst the root and principle of their power continues intire.

IN the next place, our author would persuade us, that the Romans were inconstant, because of their changes from annual consuls to military tribunes, decemviri, and dictators; and gives the name of sedition to the complaints made against usury, or the contests concerning marriages or magistracy: but I affirm,

1. That no change of magistracy, as to the name, number, or form, doth testify irregularity, or bring any manner of prejudice, as long as it is done by those who have a right of doing it, and he or they who are created continue within the power of the law to accomplish the end of their institution; many forms being in themselves equally good, and may be used as well one as another, according to times, and other circumstances.

2. In the second place, it is a rare thing for a city at the first to be rightly constituted: men can hardly at once foresee all that may happen in many ages, and the changes that accompany them ought to be provided for. Rome in its foundation was subject to these defects, and the inconveniences arising from them were by degrees discovered and remedied. They did not think of regulating usury, till they saw the mischiefs proceeding from the cruelty of usurers; or setting limits to the proportion of land that one man might enjoy, till the avarice of a few had so far succeeded, that their riches were grown formidable, and many by the poverty to which they were reduced became useless to the city. It was not time to make a law, that the plebeians might marry with the patricians, till the distinction had raised the Patricians to such pride, as to look upon themselves to have something of divine, and the others to be "inauspicati" or "profane," and brought the city into danger by that division; nor to make the plebeians capable of being elected to the chief magistracies, till they had men able to perform the duties of them. But these things being observed, remedies were seasonably applied without any bloodshed or mischief, tho' not without noise and wrangling.

3. All human constitutions are subject to corruption, and must perish, unless they are timely renewed, and reduced to their first principles: this was chiefly done by means of those tumults which our author ignorantly blames: the whole people, by whom the magistracy had been at first created, executed their power in those things which comprehend sovereignty in the highest degree, and brought every one to acknowledge it: there was nothing that they could not do, who first conferred the supreme honours upon the patricians, and then made the plebeians equal to them. Yet their

CHAP. II. modesty was not less than their power or courage: and therefore when by the law they might have made a plebeian consul, they did not chuse one in forty years; and when they did make use of their right in advancing men of their own order, they were so prudent, that they cannot be said to have been mistaken in their elections three times, whilst their votes were free: whereas, of all the emperors that came in by usurpation, pretence of blood from those who had usurped, or that were set up by the soldiers, or a few electors, hardly three can be named who deserved that honour, and most of them were such as seemed to be born for plagues to mankind.

4. He manifests his fraud or ignorance in attributing the legislative power sometimes to the senate, and sometimes to the people; for the senate never had it. The stile of "Senatus censuit, populus jussit," was never altered; but the right of advising continuing in the senate, that of enacting ever continued in the people.

5. An occasion of commending absolute power, in order to the establishment of hereditary monarchy, is absurdly drawn from their custom of creating a dictator in time of danger; for no man was ever created, but such as seemed able to bear so great a burden, which in hereditary governments is wholly left to chance. Tho' his power was great, it did arise from the law; and being confined to six months, it was almost impossible for any man to abuse it, or to corrupt so many of those who had enjoyed the same honour, or might aspire to it, as to bring them for his pleasure to betray their country: and as no man was ever chosen who had not given great testimonies of his virtues, so no one did ever forfeit the good opinion conceived of him. Virtue was then honoured, and thought so necessarily to comprehend a sincere love and fidelity to the commonwealth, that without it the most eminent qualities were reputed vile and odious, and the memory of former services could no-way expiate the guilt of conspiring against it. This seeming severity was in truth the greatest clemency: for tho' our author has the impudence to say, that during the "Roman liberty the best men thrived worst, and the worst best," he cannot alledge one example of any eminent Roman put to death (except Manlius Capitolinus) from the expulsion of the Tarquins to the time of the Gracchi, and the civil wars not long after ensuing: and of very few who were banished. By these means crimes were prevented; and the temptations to evil being removed, treachery was destroyed in the root; and such as might be naturally ambitious, were made to see there was no other way to honour and power than by acting virtuously.

But lest this should not be sufficient to restrain aspiring men, what power soever was granted to any magistrate, the sovereignty still remained in the people, and all, without exception, were subject to them. This may seem strange to those who think the dictators were absolute, because they are said to have been "sine provocatione;" but that is to be only understood in relation to other magistrates, and not to the people, as is clearly proved in the case of Q. Fabius, whom Papirius the dictator would have put to death: T. Liv. l. viii. c. 33. "Tribunos plebis appello," says Fabius Maximus's father, "& provocho ad populum, eumque tibi fugienti exercitus tui, fugienti senatus judicium, judicem fero;

“fero; qui certe unus plusquam tua dictatura potest polletque: videro, cess“furusne sis provocationi, cui Tullus Hostilius cessit.” And tho’ the people SECT. 13.
 did rather intercede for Fabius than command his deliverance, that modesty did evidently proceed from an opinion that Papirius was in the right; and tho’ they desired to save Fabius, who seems to have been one of the greatest and best men that ever the city produced, they would not enervate that military discipline, to which they owed, not only their greatness, but their subsistence; most especially when their sovereign authority was acknowledged by all, and the dictator himself had submitted. This right of appeals to T. Liv. l. i.
 the people was the foundation of the Roman commonwealth, laid in the days c. 26.
 of Romulus, submitted to by Hostilius in the case of Horatius, and never violated, till the laws and liberty which they supported, were overthrown by the power of the sword. This is confirmed by the speech of Metellus the tribune, who in the time of the second Carthaginian war, causelessly disliking the proceedings of Q. Fabius Maximus then dictator, in a public assembly of the people said, “Quod si antiquus animus plebi Romanæ esset, se audacter la- T. Liv. l.
 “turum de abrogando Q. Fabii imperio; nunc modicam rogationem pro- xxii. c. 25.
 “mulgaturum, de æquando magistri equitum & dictatoris jure:” which was done; and that action, which had no precedent, shews that the people needed none, and that their power, being eminently above that of all magistrates, was obliged to no other rule than that of their own will. Tho’ I do therefore grant, that a power like to the dictatorial, limited in time, circumscribed by law, and kept perpetually under the supreme authority of the people, may, by virtuous and well-disciplin’d nations, upon some occasions, be prudently granted to a virtuous man, it can have no relation to our author’s monarch, whose power is in himself, subject to no law, perpetually exercised by himself, and for his own sake, whether he have any of the abilities required for the due performance of so great a work, or be intirely destitute of them;
 nothing being more unreasonable than to deduce consequences from cases, which in substance and circumstances are altogether unlike: but to the contrary, these examples shewing that the Romans, even in the time of such magistrates as seemed to be most absolute, did retain and exercise the sovereign power, do most evidently prove, that the government was ever the same remaining in the people, who without prejudice might give the administration to one or more men, as best pleased themselves; and the success shews, that they did it prudently.

S E C T. XIV.

No sedition was hurtful to Rome, till through their prosperity some men gained a power above the laws.

LITTLE pains is required to confute our author, who imputes much bloodshed to the popular government of Rome; for he cannot prove, that one man was unjustly put to death, or slain, in any sedition before Publius Gracchus: the foundations of the commonwealth were then so shaken, that the laws could not be executed; and whatsoever did then fall out ought to be attributed to the monarchy for which the great men began to contend. Whilst they had no other wars than with neighbouring nations, they had a strict eye upon their commanders, and could preserve discipline among the soldiers: but when by the excellence of their valour and conduct the greatest powers of the world were subdued, and, for the better carrying on of foreign wars, armies were suffered to continue in the same hands longer than the law did direct, soldiery came to be accounted a trade, and those who had the worst designs against the commonwealth, began to favour all manner of licentiousness and rapine, that they might gain the favour of the legions, who by that means became unruly and seditious: it was hard, if not impossible, to preserve a civil equality, when the spoils of the greatest kingdoms were brought to adorn the houses of private men; and they who had the greatest cities and nations to be their dependents and clients, were apt to scorn the power of the law. This was the most dangerous disease, like to those to which human bodies are subject, when they are arrived to that which physicians call the athletic habit, proceeding from the highest perfection of health, activity, and strength, that the best constitution by diet and exercise can attain. Whosoever falls into them shews, that he had attained that perfection; and he who blames that which brings a state into the like condition, condemns that which is most perfect among men. Whilst the Romans were in the way to this, no sedition did them any hurt: they were composed without blood; and those that seemed to be the most dangerous, produced the best laws. But when they were arrived to that condition, no order could do them good, the fatal period set to human things was come; they could go no higher:

Lucan. l. i.

—“ Summisque negatum “ Stare diu.”

And all that our author blames, is not to be imputed to their constitution, but their departing from it. All men were ever subject to error; and it may be said, that the mistaken people in the space of about three hundred years did unjustly fine or banish five or six men; but those mistakes were so frankly acknowledged, and carefully repaired by honours bestowed upon the injured persons, as appears by the examples of Camillus, Livius Salinator, nator, Paulus Emilius, and others, that they deserve more praise than if they had not failed. SECT. 14.

If for the above-mentioned time seditions were harmless or profitable, they were also absolutely exempted from civil wars. Those of Apulia and Greece were revolts of conquered nations, and can no way fall under that name: but it is most absurdly applied to the servile and gladiatorian wars; for the gladiators were slaves also, and civil wars can be made only by those who are members of the civil society, which slaves are not. Those that made the "bellum sociale," were freemen, but not citizens; and the war they made could not be called civil. The Romans had three ways of dealing with conquered nations.

1. Some were received into the body of the city, "civitate donati," as the Latins by Romulus; the Albans by Hostilius; the Privernates, when their ambassador declared, that no peace could be durable unless it were just and easy; and the senate said, "Se viri & liberi vocem audivisse, talesque dignos esse ut Romani fiant;" and the like favour was shewn to many others. Liv. l. viii. c. 21.

2. By making leagues with them, as Livy says, "Populum Romanum de-victos bello populos, malle fide & societate habere conjunctos, quam tristic subjectos servitio:" of which sort were the Samnites, who, not liking their condition, joined with Hannibal; and afterwards, under the conduct of the brave Tullius, with other nations that lived under the condition of "focii," made an unprosperous attempt to deliver themselves. Lib. xxvi. c. 49.

3. Those who after many rebellions were "in provinciam redacti," as the Capuans, when their city was taken by Appius Claudius, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

We often hear of wars made by those of the two latter sorts; but of none that can be called civil, till the times of Marius, Sylla, and Cataline: and as they are to be esteemed the last strugglings of expiring liberty, when the laws, by which it had subsisted, were enervated; so those that happened between Cæsar and Pompey, Octavius and Antonius, with the proscriptions, triumvirate, and all the mischiefs that accompanied them, are to be imputed wholly to the monarchy for which they contended, as well as those between Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, and Vespasian, that hardly ever ceased till the empire was abolished; for the name of a commonwealth continued to the end; and I know not why Tiberius or Nero might not use it as well as Sylla or Marius.

Yet if our author be resolved to impute to popular government all that passed before Cæsar made himself perpetual dictator, he will find no more than is seen in all places. We have known few small states, and no great one free from revolts of subjects or allies; and the greatest empire of the east was overthrown by the rebellion of the Mamelukes their slaves. If there is any difference to be observed between what happened at Rome, it is chiefly, that whilst there was any shadow of liberty, the slaves, gladiators, subjects or allies, were always beaten and suppressed; whereas in the time of the emperors the revolt of a province was sufficient to give a new master to the best part of mankind; and he having no more power than was required

CHAP. II. required for a present mischief, was, for the most part, in a short time, destroyed by another. But to please our author, I will acknowledge a second defect, even that wantonness to which he ascribes all their disorders; tho' I must withal desire him to consider from whence wantonness doth proceed. If the people of Turkey or France did rebel, I should think they were driven to it by misery, beggary, or despair; and could lay wantonness only to the charge of those who enjoy much prosperity. Nations that are oppressed and made miserable, may fall into rage, but can never grow wanton. In the time of the Roman emperors, the pretorian cohorts, or the armies that had the liberty of ravaging the richest provinces, might be proud of their strength, or grow wanton through the abundance of their enjoyments: the janizaries in later ages may, for the same reasons, have fallen into the like excesses; but such as have lost their liberty are in no danger of them. When all the nobility of Rome was destroyed, and those who excelled in reputation or virtue, were fallen in the wars, or by the proscriptions; when two thirds of the people were slain, the best cities and colonies burnt, the provinces exhausted, and the small remains left in them oppressed with a most miserable slavery, they may have revolted, and sometimes did, as the Britons, Batavians, and others mentioned in the Roman history: but they were driven to those revolts by fury and necessity, arising from the miseries and indignities they suffered under an insupportable tyranny; and wantonness had no part in them. The people of Rome, when they were a little freed from the terror of the soldiers, did sometimes for the same reasons conspire against the emperors; and when they could do no more, expressed their hatred by breaking their statues: but after the battles of Pharsalia, Philippi, and the proscriptions, they never committed any folly through wantonness. In the like manner Naples and Sicily have revolted within these few years; and some who are well acquainted with the state of those kingdoms, think them ready again to do the like; but if it should so happen, no man of understanding would impute it to wantonness. The pressures under which they groan, have cured them of all such diseases; and the Romans since the loss of their liberty could never fall into them. They may have grown wanton when their authority was revered, their virtue admired, their power irresistible, and the riches of the world were flowing in upon them, as it were, to corrupt their manners, by enticing them to pleasure: but when all that was lost, and they found their persons exposed to all manner of violence from the basest of men; their riches exhausted by tributes and rapine, whilst the treasures of the empire were not sufficient to supply the luxury of their masters; the misery they suffered, and the shame of suffering it, with the contemptible weakness to which they were reduced, did too strongly admonish them, that the vices of wantonness belonged only to those who enjoyed a condition far different from theirs; and the memory of what they had lost, sharpened the sense of what they felt. This is the state of things which pleases our author; and, by praising that government, which deprived those who were under it of all that is most desirable in the world, and introduced all that ought to be detested, he sufficiently sufficiently shews, that he delights only in that which is most abominable, SECT. 15.

and would introduce his admired absolute monarchy, only as an instrument of bringing vice, misery, devastation, and infamy, upon mankind.

S E C T. XV.

The empire of Rome perpetually decayed, when it fell into the hands of one man.

IN pursuance of his design our author, with as much judgment as truth, denies that Rome became mistress of the world under the popular government: "It is not so," says he, "for Rome began her empire under kings, and did perfect it under emperors: it did only increase under that popularity: her greatest exaltation was under Trajan, and longest peace under Augustus." For the illustration of which, I desire these few things may be considered.

1. That the first monarchy of Rome was not absolute: the kings were made by the people without regard to any man's title, or other reason than the common good, chusing him that seemed most likely to procure it; setting up at the same time a senate consisting of a hundred of the most eminent men among them; and, after the reception of the Sabines into the city, adding as many more to them, and committing the principal part of the government to their care, retaining the power of making those laws to which the kings who reigned by their command were subject, and reserving to themselves the judgment of all great matters upon appeal. If any of their kings deserved to be called a monarch, according to Filmer's definition, it was the last Tarquin; for he alone of all their kings reigned not "jussu populi," but came in by treachery and murder. If he had continued, he had cured the people of all vices proceeding from wantonness; but his farthest conquest was of the small town of Gabii ten miles distant from Rome, which he effected by the fraud of his detestable son; and that being then the utmost limit of the Roman empire, must deserve to be called the world, or the empire of it was not gained by their kings. T. Liv. l. ii.

2. The extent of conquests is not the only, nor the chief thing that ought to be considered in them; regard is to be had to the means whereby they are made, and the valour or force that was employed by the enemy. In these respects not only the overthrow of Carthage, and the conquests of Spain, but the victories gained against the Sabines, Latins, Tuscans, Samnites, and other valiant nations of Italy, who most obstinately defended their liberty, when the Romans had no forces but their own, shew more virtue, and deserve incomparably more praise, than the defeats of any nations whatsoever, when they were increased in number, riches, reputation, and power, and had many other warlike people instructed in their discipline, and fighting under their ensigns. But I deny that the Romans did ever make any considerable acquisition

R

CHAP. II. acquisition after the loss of their liberty. They had already subdued all Italy, Greece, Macedon, the islands of the Mediterranean Sea, Thracia, Illyrium, Asia the less, Pontus, Armenia, Syria, Egypt, Africa, Gaul, and Spain. The forces of Germany were broken; a bridge laid over the Rhine, and all the countries on this side subdued. This was all that was ever gained by the valour of their own forces, and that could bring either honour or profit. But I know of no conquest made after that time, unless the name of conquest be given to Caligula's expedition, when he said he had subdued the sea, in making an useless bridge from Puteoli to Baiæ; or that of the other fool, who entered Rome in triumph, for having gathered shells on the sea-shore. Trajan's expedition into the east was rather a journey than a war: he rambled over the provinces that Augustus had abandoned as not worth keeping, and others that had nothing to defend them, but ill-armed and unwarlike barbarians: upon the whole matter, he seems to have been led only by curiosity; and the vanity of looking upon them as conquests, appears in their being relinquished as soon as gained. Britain was easily taken from a naked and unskilful, tho' a brave people; hardly kept, and shamefully lost. But tho' the emperors had made greater wars than the commonwealth, vanquished nations of more valour and skill than their Italian neighbours, the Grecians or Carthaginians; subdued and slaughtered those that in numbers and ferocity had exceeded the Cimbri, Gauls, and Teutons, encountered captains more formidable than Pyrrhus and Hannibal, it might indeed increase the glory of him that should have done it, but could add nothing of honour or advantage to the Roman name: the nobility was extirpated long before, the people corrupted and enslaved, Italy lay desolate, so as a Roman was hardly to be found in a Roman army, which was generally composed of such, as fighting for themselves or their commander, never thought of any thing less than the interest of Rome: and as it is impossible that what is so neglected and betrayed, should be durable, that empire which was acquired by the valour and conduct of the bravest and best disciplined people of the world, decayed and perished in the hands of those absolute monarchs, who ought to have preserved it.

3. Peace is desirable by a state that is constituted for it, who contenting themselves with their own territories, have no desires of enlarging them: or perhaps it might simply deserve praise, if mankind were so framed that a people intending hurt to none could preserve themselves: but the world being so far of another temper that no nation can be safe without valour and strength, those governments only deserve to be commended, which by discipline and exercise increase both, and the Roman above all, that excelled in both. Peace therefore may be good in its season, and was so in Numa's reign: yet two or three such kings would have encouraged some active neighbours to put an end to that aspiring city, before its territory had extended beyond Fidenæ. But the discipline that best agreed with the temper and designs of a warlike people, being renewed by his brave successors, the dangers were put on their enemies; and all of them, the last only excepted, persisting in the same way, did reasonably well perform their duty. When they were removed, and the affairs of the city depended no longer upon the temper or capacity of one man, the ends for which the city was constituted were vigourously pursued, and such magistrates annually chosen, as would not long continue in an universal peace, till they had gotten the empire to which they aspir'd, or were by ill fortune brought to such a weakness, as to be no longer able to make war. Both of these happened in the so much magnified reign of Augustus. He found the empire so great, that all additions might rationally be rejected as useless or prejudicial; and Italy so exhausted, that wars could only be carried on by the strength of strangers: it was time to lie still, when they had no power to act; and they might do it safely, whilst the reputation gained by former victories preserved them from foreign invasions. When Crassus, Pompey, and Cæsar, who had torn the commonwealth into three monarchies, were killed, and the flower of the Roman nobility and people destroyed with them, or by them; when Cato's virtue had proved too weak to support a falling state, and Brutus with Cassius had perished in their noble attempt to restore their liberty; when the best part of the senate had been exposed for a prey to the vulturs and wolves of Theffaly, and one hundred and thirty of those who deserved the hatred of tyrants, and had escaped the fury of war, had been destroyed by the proscriptions; when neither captains nor soldiers remained in the desolate city; when the tyrant abhorred and feared all those who had either reputation or virtue, and by the most subtle arts endeavoured so to corrupt or break the spirits of the remaining people, that they might not think of their former greatness, or the ways of recovering it; we ought not to wonder, that they ceased from war. But such a peace is no more to be commended, than that which men have in the grave; as in the epitaph of the marquis Trivultio seen at Milan, "Qui nunquam quievit, quiescit. Tace." This peace is in every wilderness: the Turks have established it in the empty provinces of Asia and Greece. Where there are no men, or if those men have no courage, there can be no war. Our ancestors the Britons observed, that the peace which in that age the Romans established in the provinces, consisted in the most wretched slavery and solitude: "Miser-
the

 "rimam servitutem pacem appellant." And in another place, "solitudinem "faciunt, pacem vocant." This is the peace the Spaniards settled in their dominions of the West-Indies, by the destruction of * forty millions of souls:
 the countries were very quiet, when wild beasts only were left to fight in them, or a few miserable wretches, who had neither strength nor courage to resist their violence. This was the peace the Romans enjoyed under Augustus: a few of those who made themselves subservient to his pleasure, and ministers of the public calamities, were put into a flourishing condition; but the rest pined, withered, and never recovered. If yet our author will have us to think the liberty and people of Rome obliged to Augustus who procured such a peace for them, he ought to remember, that, besides what they suffered in settling it, they paid dear for it even in the future; for Italy was thereby so weakned, as never to recover any strength or virtue to defend itself; but, depending absolutely upon barbarous nations, or armies composed of them, was ravaged and torn in pieces by every invader.

CHAP. II. 4. That peace only is to be valued, which is accompanied with justice; and those governments only deserve praise, who put the power into the hands of the best men. This was wholly wanting during the reigns of Augustus and his successors. The worst of men gained the sovereignty by alliance, fraud, or violence, and advanced such as most resembled themselves. Augustus, was worse in the beginning than in the latter end of his reign; but his bloody and impure successor grew every day more wicked as long as he lived: whilst he sat upon the rocks at Capreæ with his Chaldeans, he meditated nothing but lust or mischief, and had Sejanus and Macro always ready to execute his detestable designs. Caligula could find none equal to himself in all manner of villainies; but favour'd those most, who were likest to him. Claudius's stupidity, drunkenness, and subjection to the fury of two impudent strumpets and manumised slaves, proved as hurtful to the empire, as the savage fury of his predecessor. Tho' Nero was a monster that the world could not bear, yet the raging soldiers killed Galba, and gave the empire to Otho, for no other reason, than that he had been the companion of his debauches, and of all men was thought most to resemble him: with them all evils came in like a flood; and their successors finding none so bad as themselves, but the favourites, whores, and slaves, that governed them, would suffer no virtue to grow up; and filled the city with a base, lewd, and miserable rabble, that cared for nothing beyond stage-plays and bread. Such a people could not be seditious; but Rome had been desolate, if they had not thus filled it. And tho' this temper and condition of a people may please our author; yet it was an incurable wound to the state, and in consequence to the best part of the world.

When the city had been burnt by the Gauls, it was soon restored; the defeats of Ticinum, Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannæ, were repaired with equal or greater victories: the war of the allies ended in their overthrow: the fury of the gladiators was extinguished with their blood: the commonwealth lost battles, but was never conquered in any war; and in the end triumphed over all that had contended with them. Whilst liberty continued, it was the nurse of virtue; and all the losses suffered in foreign or civil wars were easily recovered: but when liberty was lost, valour and virtue was torn up by the roots, and the Roman power proceeding from it perished.

I have not dwelt so long upon this point to expose the folly of our author, but to shew, that the above-mentioned evils did proceed from a permanent cause, which will always produce the like effects; and histories testify, that it hath done the same in all places. Carthage was rebuilt, after it had been destroyed by Scipio, and continued to be a rich city for almost a thousand years; but produced no such men as Amilcar, Asdrubal, and Hannibal: Cleomenes and Euclidas were the last that deserved to be called Spartans: Athens never had an eminent man, after it felt the weight of the Macedonian yoke: and Philopemen was the last of the Achæians. Tho' the commonwealths of Italy in later ages, having too much applied themselves to the acquisition of money, and wanted that greatness of spirit which had SECT. 15. reigned in their ancestors, yet they have not been without valour and virtue. That of Pisa was famous for power at sea, till the Genoefes overthrew them. Florence had a brave nobility, and a stout people. Arezzo, Pistoia, Cortona, Sienna, and other small towns of Tuscany, were not without strength, tho' for the most part unhappily exercised in the factions of Ghibelins and Guelphs, Neri and Bianchi, that divided all Italy; but since the introduction of Filmer's divine absolute monarchy, all power, virtue, reputation, and strength, is utterly perished from among them, and no man dares to oppose the public mischiefs. They usually decide private quarrels by assassination or poison; and in other respects they enjoy the happiness of that peace which is always found within empty walls, and desolated countries: and if this be according to the laws of God and nature, it cannot be denied, that weakness, baseness, cowardice, destruction, and desolation, are so likewise. These are the blessings our well-natured author would confer upon us; but if they were to be esteemed so, I cannot tell why those that felt them, complained so much of them. Tacitus, reciting what passed in his time, and somewhat before (for want of a christian spirit) in the bitterness of his soul, says, "Nec unquam atrocioribus populi C. Tacit. l. i. c. 3. hist. "Romani cladibus, magisque justis indiciis probatum est, non esse curæ "Deis securitatem nostram, esse ultionem." Some thought that no punishments could be justly deserved by a people that had so much favoured virtue; others, that even the gods they adored, envied their felicity and glory; but all confessed they were fallen from the highest pitch of human happiness into the lowest degree of infamy and misery: and our author being the first that ever found they had gained by the change, we are to attribute the discovery of so great a secret to the excellency of his wisdom. If suspending my judgment in this point, till it be proved by better authority than his word, I in the mean time follow the opinion of those who think slavery doth naturally produce meanness of spirit, with its worst effect, flattery, which Tacitus calls "foedum servitutis crimen;" I must believe, that the impu- H. l. i. c. 1. dence of carrying it to such a height, as to commend nothing in the most glorious liberty, that made the most virtuous people in the world, but the shortness of its continuance, and to prefer the tyranny of the basest of men, or worst of monsters, is peculiar to Filmer; and that their wickedness, which had never been equalled, is surpassed by him, who recommends as the ordinance of God, the principles that certainly produce them.

"But," says our author, "tho' Rome was for a while miraculously upheld in glory by a greater prudence than its own, yet in a short time, after manifold alterations, she was ruined by her own hand." But it is absurd to say, that the overthrow of a government, which had nothing of good in it, can be a ruin; or that the glory in which it continued, had nothing of good in it; and most of all, that it could be ruined by no hands but its own, if that glory had not been gained, and immediately or instrumentally supported by such virtue and strength as is worthily to be preferred before all other temporal happiness, and does ever produce it. This shews that liars ought

CHAP. II. ought to have good memories. But passing over such foolish contradictions, I desire to know, how that "prudence, greater than its own" (which, till I am better informed, I must think to be inseparably united to justice and goodness) came miraculously to support a government, which was not only evil in itself, as contrary to the laws of God and nature; but so perpetually bent against that monarchy, which he says is according to them, as to hate all monarchs, despise all that would live under them, destroy as many of them as came within their reach; and make a law by which any man was authorized to kill him, who should endeavour to set up this divine power among them. Moreover, no human prudence preserved the Roman glory but their own: the others directly set themselves to oppose it, and the most eminent fell under it. We know of no prudence surpassing the human, unless it be the divine: but the divine prudence did never miraculously exert itself, except to bear witness to the truth, and to give authority to those that announced it. If therefore the glory of this popular government was miraculously supported by a more than human prudence, it was good in itself; the miracles done in favour of it did testify it, and all that our author says against it is false and abominable.

If I lay aside the word "miraculous," as put in by chance, it will be hard to know how God (who in the usual course of his providence guides all things by such a gentle and undiscerned power, that they seem to go on of themselves) should give such virtue to this popular government, and the magistrates bred up under it, that the greatest monarchs of the earth were as dust before them, unless there had been an excellency in their discipline, far surpassing that of their enemies; or how that can be called ill in its principle, and said to comprehend no good, which God did so gloriously support, and no man was ever able to resist. This cannot be better answered than by our author's citation, "Suis & ipsa Roma viribus ruit;" that city which had overthrown the greatest powers of the world must, in all appearance, have lasted for ever, if their virtue and discipline had not decayed, or their forces been turned against themselves. If our author therefore say true, the greatest good that ever befel the Romans, was the decay of their virtue and discipline; and the turning of their own arms against themselves, was not their ruin but their preservation.

When they had brought the warlike nations of Italy into subjection, or association; often repressed the fury of the Gauls, Cimbri, and Teutons; overthrown the wealth, power, and wit of Carthage supported by the skill, industry, and valour of Hannibal, and his brave relations; almost extirpated the valiant Spaniards, who would no other way be subdued; defeated Philip, Perseus, Antiochus, Gentius, Syphax, and Jugurtha; struck an awe into Ptolemy; avoided the snares and poisons of Mithridates; followed him in his flights, revenged his treacheries, and carried their victorious arms beyond his conquered kingdoms to the banks of Tygris; when neither the revolt of their Italian associates, nor the rebellion of their slaves led by Spartacus (who in skill seems to have been equal to Hannibal, and above him him in courage) could put a stop to their victories: when Greece had been reduced to yield to a virtue rather than a power greater than their own, we may well say that government was supported by a more than human prudence, which led them through virtue to a height of glory, power, and happiness, that till that day had been unknown to the world, and could never have been ruined, if by the decay of that virtue they had not turned their victorious arms against themselves. That city was a giant that could die by no other hand than his own; like Hercules poisoned and driven into madness, after he had destroyed thieves, monsters, and tyrants, and found nothing on the earth able to resist him. The wisest of men in antient times, looking upon this as a point of more than human perfection, thought or feigned to think, that he was descended from the gods, and at his death received into their number, tho' perhaps Filmer would prefer a weak, base, and effeminate slave, before him. The matter will not be much different, if we adhere to the forementioned similitude of the athletic habit; for the danger proceeds only from the perfection of it, and he who dislikes it, must commend that weakness and vice which may perish, but can never be changed into any thing worse than itself, as those that lie upon the ground can never fall. However, this fall of the Romans, which our author, speaking truth against his will, calls their ruin, was into that which he recommends as the ordinance of God: which is as much as to say, that they were ruined when they fell from their own unnatural inventions to follow the law of God, and of nature; that luxury also through which they fell, was the product of their felicity; and that the nations that had been subdued by them, had no other way of avenging their defeats, than by alluring their masters to their own vices: this was the root of their civil wars. When that proud city found no more resistance, it grew wanton.

———Sævior armis
Luxuria incubuit, victumque ulciscitur orbem.      Lucan.

Honest poverty became uneasy, when honours were given to ill-gotten riches. This was so monarchical, that a people infected with such a custom must needs fall by it. They who by vice had exhausted their fortunes, could repair them only by bringing their country under a government that would give impunity to rapine; and such as had not virtues to deserve advancement from the senate and people, would always endeavour to set up a man that would bestow the honours that were due to virtue, upon those who would be most abjectly subservient to his will and interests. When mens minds are filled with this fury, they sacrifice the common good to the advancement of their private concerns. This was the temper of Catiline expressed by Sallust. Sallust, "Luxuria principi gravis, paupertas vix a privato toleranda;" and this put him upon that desperate extremity to say, "Incendium meum ruina extinguam." Others in the same manner being filled with the same rage, he could not want companions in his most villainous designs. It is not long since a person of the highest quality, and no less famous for learning and wit, CHAP. II. wit, having observed the state of England, as it stood not many years ago, and that to which it has been reduced since the year sixty, as is thought very much by the advice and example of France, said, that they now were taking a most cruel vengeance upon us for all the overthrows received from our ancestors, by introducing their most damnable maxims, and teaching us the worst of their vices. It is not for me to determine whether this judgment was rightly made or not; for I intend not to speak of our affairs: but all historians agreeing, that the change of the Roman government was wrought by such means as I have mentioned; and our author acknowledging that change to have been their ruin, as in truth it was, I may justly conclude, that the overthrow of that government could not have been a ruin to them, but good for them, unless it had been good; and that the power which did ruin it, and was set up in the room of it, cannot have been according to the laws of God or nature, for they confer only that which is good, and destroy nothing that is so; but must have been most contrary to that good which was overthrown by it.

S E C T. XVI.

The best governments of the world have been composed of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy.

OUR author's cavils concerning I know not what vulgar opinions that democracies were introduced to curb tyranny, deserve no answer; for our question is, whether one form of government be prescribed to us by God and nature, or we are left according to our own understanding, to constitute such as seem best to ourselves. As for democracy, he may say what pleases him of it; and I believe it can suit only with the convenience of a small town, accompanied with such circumstances as are seldom found. But this no way obliges men to run into the other extreme, inasmuch as the variety of forms between mere democracy and absolute monarchy is almost infinite: and if I should undertake to say, there never was a good government in the world, that did not consist of the three simple species of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, I think I might make it good. This at the least is certain, that the government of the Hebrews, instituted by God, had a judge, the great sanhedrin, and general assemblies of the people: Sparta had two kings, a senate of twenty-eight chosen men, and the like assemblies: all the Dorian cities had a chief magistrate, a senate, and occasional assemblies: the Ionian, Athens, and others, had an archon, the areopagi; and all judgments concerning matters of the greatest importance, as well as the election of magistrates, were referred to the people. Rome in the beginning had a king and a senate, whilst the election of kings, and judgments upon appeals peals, remained in the people; afterwards consuls representing kings, and SECT. 16.

vested with equal power, a more numerous senate, and more frequent meetings of the people. Venice has at this day a duke, the senate of the "pre-gadi," and the great assembly of the nobility, which is the whole city, the rest of the inhabitants being only "incolæ," not "cives;" and those of the other cities or countries are their subjects, and do not participate of the government. Genoa is governed in like manner: Luca not unlike to them. Germany is at this day governed by an emperor, the princes or great lords in their several precincts, the cities by their own magistrates, and by general diets, in which the whole power of the nation resides, and where the emperor, princes, nobility, and cities, have their places in person, or by their deputies. All the northern nations, which, upon the dissolution of the Roman empire, possessed the best provinces that had composed it, were under that form which is usually called the Gothic polity: they had king, lords, commons, dyets, assemblies of estates, cortez, and parliaments, in which the sovereign powers of those nations did reside, and by which they were exercised. The like was practised in Hungary, Bohemia, Sweden, Denmark, Poland; and if things are changed in some of these places within few years, they must give better proofs of having gained by the change than are yet seen in the world, before I think myself obliged to change my opinion.

Some nations, not liking the name of king, have given such a power as kings enjoyed in other places to one or more magistrates, either limited to a certain time, or left to be perpetual, as best pleased themselves: others, approving the name, made the dignity purely elective. Some have in their elections principally regarded one family as long as it lasted: others considered nothing but the fitness of the person, and reserved to themselves a liberty of taking where they pleased. Some have permitted the crown to be hereditary, as to its ordinary course; but restrained the power, and instituted officers to inspect the proceedings of kings, and to take care, that the laws were not violated: of this sort were the ephori of Sparta, the maires du palais, and afterwards the constable of France; the justicia in Arragon; rijckshofmeister in Denmark; the high-steward in England; and in all places such assemblies as are before-mentioned under several names, who had the power of the whole nation. Some have continued long, and it may be always in the same form; others have changed it: some, being incensed against their kings, as the Romans exasperated by the villainies of Tarquin, and the Tuscans by the cruelties of Mezentius, abolished the name of king: others, as Athens, Sicyon, Argos, Corinth, Thebes, and the Latins, did not stay for such extremities; but set up other governments when they thought it best for themselves, and by this conduct prevented the evils that usually fall upon nations, when their kings degenerate into tyrants, and a nation is brought to enter into a war by which all may be lost, and nothing can be gained which was not their own before. The Romans took not this salutary course; the mischief was grown up before they perceived, or set themselves against it; and when the effects of pride, avarice, cruelty, and lust, were grown to such a height, that they could no longer be endured, they could not free them-

CHAP. II. themselves without a war : and whereas upon other occasions their victories had brought them increase of strength, territory, and glory ; the only reward of their virtue in this was, to be delivered from a plague they had unadvisedly suffered to grow up among them. I confess this was most of all to be esteemed ; for if they had been overthrown, their condition under Tarquin would have been more intolerable, than if they had fallen under the power of Pyrrhus or Hannibal ; and all their following prosperity was the fruit of their recovered liberty : but it had been much better to have reformed the state after the death of one of their good kings, than to be brought to fight for their lives against that abominable tyrant. Our author, in pursuance of his aversion to all that is good, disapproves this ; and, wanting reasons to justify his dislike, according to the custom of impostors and cheats, hath recourse to the ugly terms of a “ back-door, sedition,” and “ faction :” as if it were not as just for a people to lay aside their kings when they receive nothing but evil, and can rationally hope for no benefit by them, as for others to set them up in expectation of good from them. But if the truth be examined, nothing will be found more orderly than the changes of government, or of the persons and races of those that governed, which have been made by many nations. When Pharamond’s grandson seemed not to deserve the crown he had worn, the French gave it to Meroveus, who more resembled him in virtue : in process of time when this race also degenerated, they were rejected, and Pepin advanced to the throne ; and the most remote in blood of his descendents having often been preferred before the nearest, and bastards before the legitimate issue, they were at last all laid aside ; and the crown remains to this day in the family of Hugh Capet, on whom it was bestowed upon the rejection of Charles of Lorraine. In like manner the Castilians took Don Sancho surnamed the Brave, second son to Alphonso the Wise, before Alphonso el Desheredado, son of the elder brother Ferdinand. The states of Arragon preferred Martin, brother to John the First, before Mary his daughter married to the count de Foix, tho’ females were not excluded from the succession ; and the house of Austria now enjoys that crown from Joan daughter to Ferdinand. In that and many other kingdoms, bastards have been advanced before their legitimate brothers. Henry count of Trastamara, bastard to Alphonso the Eleventh king of Castile, received the crown as a reward of the good service he had done to his country against his brother Peter the Cruel, without any regard had to the house of La Cerda descended from Alphonso el Desheredado, which to this day never enjoyed any greater honour than that of duke de Medina Celi. Not long after, the Portuguese, conceiving a dislike of their king Ferdinand, and his daughter married to John king of Castile, rejected her and her uncle by the father’s side, and gave the crown to John a knight of Calatrava, and bastard to an uncle of Ferdinand their king. About the beginning of this age the Swedes deposed their king Sigismund for being a papist, and made Charles his uncle king. Divers examples of the like nature in England have been already mentioned. All these transportations of crowns were acts performed by assemblies of the three estates in the several kingdoms ; and these crowns

crowns are to this day enjoyed under titles derived from such as were thus SECT. 16.
brought in by the deposition or rejection of those, who according to descent of blood had better titles than the present possessors. The acts therefore were lawful and good, or they can have no title at all; and they who made them, had a just power so to do.

If our author can draw any advantage from the resemblance of regality that he finds in the Roman consuls, and Athenian archons, I shall without envy leave him the enjoyment of it; but I am much mistaken if that do not prove my assertion, that those governments “were composed of the three “simple species:” for if the monarchical part was in them, it cannot be denied that the aristocratical was in the senate or areopagi, and the democratical in the people. But he ought to have remembered, that if there was something of monarchical in those governments when they are said to have been popular, there was something of aristocratical and democratical in those that were called regal; which justifies my proposition on both sides, and shews, that the denomination was taken from the part that prevailed; and if this were not so, the governments of France, Spain, and Germany, might be called democracies, and those of Rome and Athens monarchies, because the people have a part in the one, and an image of monarchy was preserved in the other.

If our author will not allow the cases to be altogether equal, I think he will find no other difference, than that the consuls and archons were regularly made by the votes of the consenting people, and orderly resigned their power, when the time was expired for which it was given; whereas Tarquin, Dionysius, Agathocles, Nabis, Phalaris, Cæsar, and almost all his successors, whom he takes for complete monarchs, came in by violence, fraud, and corruption, by the help of the worst men, by the slaughter of the best, and most commonly (when the method was once established) by that of his predecessor, who, if our author say true, was the father of his country, and his also. This was the root and foundation of the only government that deserves praise: this is that which stamped the divine character upon Agathocles, Dionysius and Cæsar, and that had bestowed the same upon Manlius, Marius, or Cataline, if they had gained the monarchies they affected. But I suppose that such as God has blessed with better judgment, and a due regard to justice and truth, will say, that all those who have attained to such greatness as destroys all manner of good in the places where they have set up themselves by the most detestable villainies, came in by a “back-door;” and that such magistrates as were orderly chosen by a willing people, were the true shepherds who came in by the gate of the sheepfold, and might justly be called the ministers of God, so long as they performed their duty in providing for the good of the nations committed to their charge.

S E C T. XVII.

Good governments admit of changes in the superstructures, whilst the foundations remain unchangeable.

IF I go a step farther, and confess the Romans made some changes in the outward form of their government, I may safely say they did well in it, and prospered by it. After the expulsion of the kings, the power was chiefly in the nobility, who had been leaders of the people; but it was necessary to humble them, when they began to presume too much upon the advantages of their birth; and the city could never have been great, unless the plebeians, who were the body of it, and the main strength of their armies, had been admitted to a participation of honours. This could not be done at the first: they who had been so vilely oppressed by Tarquin, and harassed with making or cleansing finks, were not then fit for magistracies, or the command of armies; but they could not justly be excluded from them, when they had men who in courage and conduct were equal to the best of the patricians; and it had been absurd for any man to think it a disparagement to him to marry the daughter of one whom he had obeyed as dictator or consul, and perhaps followed in his triumph. Rome, that was constituted for war, and sought its grandeur by that means, could never have arrived to any considerable height, if the people had not been exercised in arms, and their spirits raised to delight in conquests, and willing to expose themselves to the greatest fatigues and dangers to accomplish them. Such men as these were not to be used like slaves, or oppressed by the unmerciful hand of usurers. They who by their sweat and blood were to defend and enlarge the territories of the state, were to be convinced they fought for themselves; and they had reason to demand a magistracy of their own, vested with a power that none might offend, to maintain their rights, and to protect their families, whilst they were abroad in the armies. These were the tribunes of the people, made, as they called it, "sacrosancti" or inviolable; and the creation of them was the most considerable change that happened till the time of Marius, who brought all into disorder. The creation or abolition of military tribunes with consular power, ought to be accounted as nothing; for it imported little whether that authority were exercised by two, or by five: that of the decemviri was as little to be regarded, they were intended only for a year; and tho' new ones were created for another, on pretence that the laws they were to frame could not be brought to perfection in so short a time, yet they were soon thrown down from the power they usurped, and endeavoured to retain contrary to law: the creation of dictators was no novelty, they were made occasionally from the beginning, and never otherwise than occasionally, till Julius Cæsar subverted all order, and, invading that supreme magistracy by force, * usurped the right which belonged to all. This indeed was a mortal change even in root root and principle. All other magistrates had been created by the people SECT. 17.

* Jura omnium in se transiit. Suet.

 for the public good, and always were within the power of those that had created them. But Cæsar coming in by force, sought only the satisfaction of his own raging ambition, or that of the soldiers, whom he had corrupted to destroy their country: and his successors governing for themselves by the help of the like rascals, perpetually exposed the empire to be ravaged by them. But whatever opinion any man may have of the other changes, I dare affirm, there are few or no monarchies (whose histories are so well known to us as that of Rome) which have not suffered changes incomparably greater, and more mischievous, than those of Rome, whilst it was free.
 The Macedonian monarchy fell into pieces immediately after the death of Alexander: it is thought he perished by poison: his wives, children, and mother, were destroyed by his own captains: the best of those who had escaped his fury, fell by the sword of each other. When the famous Argyraſpides might have expected some reward of their labours, and a little rest in old age, they were maliciously sent into the east by Antigonus to perish by hunger and misery, after he had corrupted them to betray Eumenes.
 No better fate attended the rest; all was in confusion, every one followed whom he pleased, and all of them seemed to be filled with such a rage, that they never ceased from mutual slaughters till they were consumed; and their kingdoms continued in perpetual wars against each other, till they all fell under the Roman power. The fortune of Rome was the same after it became a monarchy: treachery, murder, and fury, reigned in every part;
 there was no law but force; he that could corrupt an army, thought he had a sufficient title to the empire: by this means there were frequently three or four, and at one time thirty several pretenders, who called themselves emperors; of which number he only reigned that had the happiness to destroy all his competitors; and he himself continued no longer than till another durst attempt the destruction of him and his posterity. In this state they remained, till the wasted and bloodless provinces were possessed by a multitude of barbarous nations. The kingdoms established by them enjoyed as little peace or justice; that of France was frequently divided into as many parts as the kings of Meroveus or Pepin's race had children, under the names of the kingdoms of Paris, Orleans, Soissons, Arles, Burgundy, Auſtraſia, and others: these were perpetually vexed by the unnatural fury of brothers or nearest relations, whilst the miserable nobility and people were obliged to fight upon their foolish quarrels, till all fell under the power of the strongest. This mischief was in some measure cured by a law made in the time of Hugh Capet, that the kingdom should no more be divided:
 but the appanages, as they call them, granted to the king's brothers, with the several dukedoms and earldoms erected to please them, and other great lords, produced frequently almost as bad effects. This is testified by the desperate and mortal factions, that went under the names of Burgundy and Orleans, Armagnac and Orleans, Montmorency and Guise: these were followed by those of the league, and the wars of the Huguenots: they were no sooner finished by the taking of Rochel, but new ones began
 by

CHAP. II. by the intrigues of the duke of Orleans, brother to Lewis the Thirteenth, and his mother; and pursued with that animosity by them, that they put themselves under the protection of Spain: to which may be added, that the houses of Condé, Soissons, Montmorency, Guise, Vendosme, Angoulême, Bouillon, Rohan, Longueville, Rochfoucault, Epernon, and I think I may say every one that is of great eminency in that kingdom, with the cities of Paris, Bourdeaux, and many others, in the space of these last fifty years, have sided with the perpetual enemies of their own country.

Again, other great alterations have happened within the same kingdom: the races of kings four times wholly changed: five kings deposed in less than 150 years after the death of Charles the Great: the offices of mair du palais, and constable, erected and laid aside: the great dukedoms and earldoms, little inferior to sovereign principalities, established and suppressed: the decision of all causes, and the execution of the laws, placed absolutely in the hands of the nobility, their deputies, seneschals, or vice-seneschals, and taken from them again: parliaments set up to receive appeals from the other courts, and to judge sovereignly in all cases expressly to curb them: the power of these parliaments, after they had crushed the nobility, brought so low, that within the last twenty years they are made to register, and give the power of laws, to edicts, of which the titles only are read to them; and the general assemblies of estates, that from the time of Pepin had the power of the nation in their hands, are now brought to nothing, and almost forgotten.

Tho' I mention these things, it is not with a design of blaming them, for some of them deserve it not; and it ought to be considered that the wisdom of man is imperfect, and unable to foresee the effects that may proceed from an infinite variety of accidents, which according to emergencies, necessarily require new constitutions, to prevent or cure the mischiefs arising from them, or to advance a good that at the first was not thought on: and as the noblest work in which the wit of man can be exercised, were (if it could be done) to constitute a government that should last for ever, the next to that is to suit laws to present exigencies, and so much as is in the power of man to foresee: and he that should resolve to persist obstinately in the way he first entered upon, or to blame those who go out of that in which their fathers had walked, when they find it necessary, does, as far as in him lies, render the worst of errors perpetual. Changes therefore are unavoidable, and the wit of man can go no farther than to institute such, as in relation to the forces, manners, nature, religion, or interests of a people, and their neighbours, are suitable and adequate to what is seen, or apprehended to be seen: and he who would oblige all nations at all times to take the same course, would prove as foolish as a physician who should apply the same medicine to all distempers, or an architect that would build the same kind of house for all persons, without considering their estates, dignities, the number of their children or servants, the time or climate in which they live, and many other circumstances; or which is, if possible, more sottish, a general who should obstinately resolve always to make war in the same way, and to draw up his army in the same form, without examining the nature, SECT. 17.
and

number, and strength of his own and his enemies forces, or the advantages and disadvantages of the ground. But as there may be some universal rules in phyfic, architecture, and military discipline, from which men ought never to depart; so there are some in politics also which ought always to be observed: and wise legislators adhering to them only, will be ready to change all others as occasion may require, in order to the public good. This we may learn from Moses, who laying the foundation of the law given to the Israelites in that justice, charity, and truth, which having its root in God is subject to no change, left them the liberty of having judges or no judges, kings or no kings, or to give the sovereign power to high-priests or captains, as best pleased themselves; and the mischiefs they afterwards suffered, proceeded not simply from changing, but changing for the worse. The like judgment may be made of the alterations that have happened in other places.
They who aim at the public good, and wisely institute means proportionable and adequate to the attainment of it, deserve praise; and those only are to be disliked, who either foolishly or maliciously set up a corrupt private interest in one or a few men. Whosoever therefore would judge of the Roman changes, may see, that in expelling the Tarquins, creating consuls, abating the violence of usurers, admitting plebeians to marry with the patricians, rendering them capable of magistracies, deducing colonies, dividing lands gained from their enemies, erecting tribunes to defend the rights of the commons, appointing the decemviri to regulate the law, and abrogating their power when they abused it, creating dictators and military tribunes with a consular power, as occasions required; they acted in the face of the sun for the good of the public; and such acts having always produced effects suitable to the rectitude of their intentions, they consequently deserve praise. But when another principle began to govern, all things were changed in a very different manner: evil designs, tending only to the advancement of private interests, were carried on in the dark by means as wicked as the end. If Tarquin when he had a mind to be king, poisoned his first wife and his brother, contracted an incestuous marriage with his second by the death of her first husband, murdered her father, and the best men in Rome, yet Cæsar did worse: he favoured Catiline, and his villainous associates; bribed and corrupted magistrates; conspired with Crassus and Pompey; continued in the command of an army beyond the time prescribed by law, and turned the arms with which he had been entrusted for the service of the commonwealth, to the destruction of it; which was rightly represented by his dream, that he had conspired his mother: in the like manner, when Octavius, An-tonius, and Lepidus, divided the empire, and then quarrelled among themselves; and when Galba, Otho, Vitellius, and Vespasian, set up parties in several provinces, all was managed with treachery, fraud, and cruelty; nothing was intended but the advancement of one man, and the recompence of the villains that served him: and when the empire had suffered infinite calamities by pulling down or rejecting one, and setting up another, it was

CHAP. II. for the most part difficult to determine who was the worst of the two; or whether the prevailing side had gained or lost by their victory. The question therefore upon which a judgment may be made to the praise or dispraise to the Roman government, before or after the loss of their liberty, ought not to be, whether either were subject to changes, for neither they nor any thing under the sun were ever exempted from them; but whether the changes that happened after the establishment of absolute power in the emperors, did not solely proceed from ambition, and tend to the public ruin: whereas those alterations related by our author concerning consuls, dictators, decemviri, tribunes, and laws, were far more rare, less violent, tending to, and procuring the public good, and therefore deserving praise. The like having been proved by the examples of other kingdoms, and might be farther confirmed by many more, which on account of brevity I omit, is in my opinion sufficient to manifest, that whilst the foundation and principle of a government remains good, the superstructures may be changed according to occasions, without any prejudice to it.

S E C T. XVIII.

Xenophon in blaming the disorders of democracies, favours aristocracies, not monarchies.

IN the next place our author introduces Xenophon "disallowing popular governments;" cites Rome and Athens as places "where the best men thrived worst, and the worst best;" and condemns the Romans for making it capital to pass sentence "of death, banishment, loss of liberty, or stripes, upon any citizen of Rome." But lest his fraud in this should be detected, he cites no precise passage of any author, alledges few examples, and those mistaken; never tells us what that law was, when made, or where to be found: whereas I hope to prove, that he has upon the whole matter abominably prevaricated, and advanced things that he knows to be either impertinent or false.

1. To this end we are in the first place to consider, whether Xenophon speaks of popular governments simply, or comparatively: if simply, it is confessed, that a pure democracy can never be good, unless for a small town; if comparatively, we must examine to what he compares it: we are sure it was not to absolute monarchy; there was no such thing amongst the Greeks established by law: the little tyrants who had enslaved their own countries, as Jason, Pheræus, Phalaris, and the like, had no pretence to it, and were accounted as the worst of beasts: none but such as in all bestiality were like to them, did ever speak or think well of them: Xenophon's opinion in this point, may be easily found out by what passed between his master Plato and the Sicilian tyrant; and the matter will not be mended by referring to his own experience: he had seen the vast monarchy of Persia torn in pieces by the
the

the fury of two brothers, and more than a million of men brought to fight SECT. 18.
upon their private quarrel: instead of that order, stability, and strength } which our author ascribes to absolute monarchy as the effect of wisdom and justice, he knew, that by filling one man with pride and cruelty, it brought unspeakable miseries upon all others, and infected them with all the vices that accompany slavery: men lived like fishes; the great ones devoured the small; and as appeared by Tissaphernes, Pharnabazus, and others with whom he had to deal, the worst and basest were made to be the greatest:
the satrapæ insulted over those of meaner rank with an insolence and cruelty that equaled the depth of their servile submission to their proud master. Luxury and avarice reigned in all: many great nations were made to live for the service of one man, and to foment his vices. This produced weakness and cowardice: no number of those slaves were able to stand against a few free Grecians. No man knew this better than Xenophon, who after the death of Cyrus the younger, and the treacherous murder of Clearchus, and other officers that commanded the Greeks who had served him, made his retreat from Babylon to the Hellespont with ten thousand foot, and passed over the bellies of all that dared to oppose him. He would never have spent his life in exciting his countrymen to attempt the conquest of Asia, nor persuaded Agésilas to put himself at the head of the enterprize, if he had thought there was such admirable order, stability, and strength, in that monarchy, and in the Greeks nothing but "giddiness of spirit, and so much learning
" as made them seditious:" nor could he, being a wise man, and an excellent captain, have conceived such a design, if he had not by experience found, that liberty inspired his countrymen with such solid virtue, and produced such stability, good order, and strength, that with small numbers of them he might hope to overthrow the vain pomp of the barbarians, and to possess himself of their riches tho' they could bring more than a hundred men to fight against one; which design being interrupted in his time by domestic wars, was soon after his death accomplished by Alexander.

But that Xenophon's meaning may be better understood, it is good to consider, that he spoke of such governments as were then in use among the Greeks; which, tho' mixed, yet took their denomination from the prevailing part: so that the Dorians, who placed the power chiefly in the hands of a few chosen men, were said to be governed aristocratically; and the Ionians giving more power to the common people, democratically: and he, tho' an Ionian, either through friendship to Agésilas, conversation with the Spartans, or for other reasons best known to himself, preferred the government of Sparta, or some other which he thought he could frame, and desired to introduce, before that of Athens; as Cimon, Thucydides, and many other excellent men of that city, are said to have done: and if I acknowledge they were in the right, and that Athens was more subject to disorder, and had less stability than Sparta, I think it will be of little advantage to absolute monarchy.

2. The Athenians did banish some worthy men, and put others to death; but our author, like the devil, never speaking truth, unless to turn it into a lye, prevaricates in his report of them. The temporary banishment which

T

they

CHAP. II. they called "ostracism," was without hurt or dishonour, never accounted as a punishment, nor intended for any other end, than to put a stop to the too eminent greatness of a man, that might prove dangerous to the city; and some excellent persons who fell under it, were soon recalled, and brought home with glory. But I am not solicitous whether that reason be sufficient to justify it or not: we are upon a general thesis relating to the laws of God and nature; and if the Athenians, by a fancy of their own, did make an imprudent use of their liberty, it cannot prejudice the public cause. They who make the worst of it can only say, that by such means they, for a time, deprived themselves of the benefits they might have received from the virtues of some excellent men, to the hurt of none but themselves; and the application of it as an injustice done to Themistocles is absolutely false: he was a man of great wit, industry, and valour, but of uncertain faith, too much addicted to his own interest, and held a most dangerous correspondence with the Persians, who then threatened the destruction of Greece. Through envy and spite to Aristides, and to increase his own power, he raised dangerous factions in the city; and being summoned to render an account of his proceedings, he declined the judgment of his country, fled to their enemies, and justly deserved the sentence pronounced against him. Some among them were unjustly put to death, and above all Socrates; but the people, who, deceived by false witnesses, (against whom neither the laws of God or man have ever prescribed a sufficient defence) had condemned him, did so much lament their crime, when the truth was discovered to them, that I doubt whether a more righteous judgment had given better testimony of their righteous intentions. But our author's impudence appears in the highest excess in imputing the death of Phocion to the popular state of Athens: their forces had been broken in the Sicilian war; and the city taken, and the principal men slain by Lysander; the remains of the most worthy destroyed by the thirty tyrants set up by him; their ill-recovered liberty overthrown by the Macedonians, and the death of Phocion compassed by Polyperchon, who with foreign soldiers, slaves, vagabonds, and outlaws, overpowered the people.

Plut. in vita
Themist.

The proceedings of Rome may be more completely justified: Coriolanus was duly condemned: he set too great a price upon his own valour, and arrogated to himself a power in Rome, which would hardly have been endured in Corioli: his violence and pride overbalanced his services; and he that would submit to no law, was justly driven from the society which could subsist only by law. Quintius was not unlike him, and Manlius Capitolinus far worse than either. Their virtues were not to be considered when they departed from them. Consideration ought to be had of human frailty, and some indulgence may be extended to those who commit errors, after having done important services; but a state cannot subsist, which, compensating evil actions with good, gives impunity to the most dangerous crimes, in remembrance of any services whatever. He that does well, performs his duty, and ought always to do so; justice and prudence concur in this; and it is no less just than profitable, that every action be considered by itself, and such a reward or punishment allotted to it, as in nature and proportion it doth SECT. 18. best deserve.

This, as I suppose, is enough for their cases; but relates not to those of Mamercus, Camillus, Livius Salinator, and Emilius Paulus; their virtue was complete, they were wrongfully sentenced. But the best princes, senate, or people, that ever was in the world, by the deceit of evil men, may and have been drawn out of the way of justice: yet of all the states that are known to us, none was ever so free from crimes of malice and wilful injustice, none was ever guilty of so few errors as that of Rome; and none did ever give better testimonies of repentance, when they were discovered, than the Romans did by the veneration they shewed to those worthy persons, and the honours they conferred upon them afterwards. Mamercus was made dictator, to repair the unjust mark of infamy laid upon him by the censors. T. Liv. l. iv. c. 31. Camillus being recalled from his banishment, often enjoyed the same honour, l. v. c. 32, 46. l. vi. c. 38. l. vii. c. 1. and died the most revered man that had ever been in that city. Livius Salinator was not only made consul after he had been fined, but the people Liv. l. xxvii. c. 36. & l. xxxix. c. 37. (as it were to expiate the guilt of having condemned him) suffered that asperity of speech and manners, which might have persuaded such as had been less confident of his virtue, and their own, that he desired to be revenged, tho' it were with the ruin of the city. They dealt in the like manner with l. xxxix. c. 56. Paulus Emilius, repairing the injury of a fine unduly imposed. Their generosity in leaving the tribunes in the Forum with their accusation against Scipio l. xxxviii. c. 51. Africanus, and following him to celebrate an annual sacrifice in the capitol, in commemoration of his victory against Hannibal, was no less admirable than the greatness of his mind, who thought his virtue should be so well known, that no account ought to be expected from him; which was an error proceeding from a noble root, but not to be borne in a well-governed commonwealth. The laws that aim at the public good, make no distinction of persons; and none can be exempted from the penalties of them, otherwise than by approved innocence, which cannot appear without a trial: he that will not bend his mind to them shakes off the equality of a citizen, and usurps a power above the law, to which no man submits upon any other condition, than that none should be exempted from the power of it. And Scipio being the first Roman that thus disdained the power of the law, I do not know whether the prejudice brought upon the city by so dangerous an example, did not outweigh all the services he had done: nevertheless the people, contented with his retirement to his own house, and afterwards convinced of his innocence, would probably (if he had not died in a few months) have brought him back with the honours that fate reserved for his ashes.

I do not at present remember any other eminent men, who can be said in any respect to have "thrived ill," whilst the people and senate of Rome acted freely; and if this be not sufficient to clear the point, I desire to know the names of those "worst men that thrived best." If they may have been judged to thrive, who were frequently advanced to the supreme magistracies, and enjoyed the chief honours; I find no men so eminent as Brutus, Pub-

CHAP. II. licola, Quintius Cincinnatus, and Capitolinus, the two Fabii surnamed { Maximi, Corvinus, Torquatus, Camillus, and the like: and if these were the worst men that Rome produced in those ages, valour, wisdom, industry in the service of their country, and a most intire love to it, must have been the worst of qualities; and I presume our author may have thought them so, since they were invincible obstacles to the introduction of that divine monarchy which Appius Claudius the decemvir, Manlius Capitolinus, Spurius Cassius, Sp. Melius, and some others, may be thought to have affected.

However, these instances are not to be understood as they are simply in themselves, but comparatively with what has happened in other places under absolute monarchies: for our inquiry is not after that which is perfect, well knowing that no such thing is found among men; but we seek that human constitution which is attended with the least, or the most pardonable inconveniences. And if we find, that in the space of three hundred years, whilst the senate, people, and legally created magistrates, governed Rome, not one worthy man was put to death, not above five or six condemned to fines by the beguiled people, and those injuries repaired by the most honourable satisfaction that could be given; so that virtue continued ever flourishing; the best men that could be found were put into the chief commands, and the city was filled with more excellent men than were ever known to be in any other place: and on the other side, if the emperors so soon as the government was changed, made it their business to destroy the best, and so far succeeded in their design, that they left none; and never failed to advance the worst, unless it fell out as to queen Catharine de Medicis, who is said never to have done any good but by mistake, and some few may have proved better than was intended; it will appear, that our author's assertions are in the utmost degree false. Of this we need no better witness than Tacitus. The civil wars, and the proscriptions upon which he touches, are justly to be attributed to that monarchy which was then setting up, the only question being, who should be the monarch, when the liberty was already overthrown. And if any eminent men escaped, it was much against the will of those who had usurped the power: he acknowledges his histories to be a continued relation of the slaughter of the most illustrious persons, and that in the times of which he writes, virtue was attended with certain destruction. After the death of Germanicus, and his eldest children, Valerius Asiaticus, Seneca, Corbulo, and an infinite number more who were thought most to resemble them, found this to be true at the expence of their lives: Nero, in pursuance of the same tyrannical design, murdered Helvidius and Thraseas, that he might "tear up " virtue by the roots:" Domitian spared none willingly that had either virtue or reputation; and tho' Trajan, with perhaps some other, might grow up under him in the remote provinces, yet no good man could escape who came under his eye, and was so eminent as to be observed by him. Whilst these, who were thought to be the best men that appeared in the Roman empire, did thrive in this manner, Sejanus, Macro, Narcissus, Pallas, Tigellinus, Icetus, Vinnius, Laco, and others like to them, had the power of the empire

*Ipsam exscindere virtutem. Ta-cit. Hist. xvi.
 21.*

pire in their hands. Therefore, unless mankind has been mistaken to this day, and that these, who have hitherto been accounted the worst of villains, were indeed the best men in the world, and that those destroyed by them, who are thought to have been the best, were truly the worst, it cannot be denied, that the best men, during the liberty of Rome, thrived best; that good men suffered no indignity, unless by some fraud imposed upon the well-meaning people; and that so soon as the liberty was subverted, the worst men thrived best. The best men were exposed to so many calamities and snares, that it was thought a matter of great wonder to see a virtuous man die in his bed: and if the account were well made, I think it might appear, that every one of the emperors before Titus shed more noble and innocent blood than Rome and all the commonwealths in the world have done whilst they had the free enjoyment of their own liberty. But if any man in favour of our author seek to diminish this vast disproportion between the two differing sorts of government, and impute the disorders that happened in the time of the Gracchi, and others, whilst Rome was struggling for her liberty, to the government of a commonwealth, he will find them no more to be compared with those that fell out afterwards, than the railings of a turbulent tribune against the senate, to the villainies and cruelties that corrupted and depopled the provinces from Babylon to Scotland: and whereas the state never failed to recover from any disorders, as long as the root of liberty remained untouched, and became more powerful and glorious than ever, even after the wars of Marius and Sylla; when that was destroyed, the city fell into a languishing condition, and grew weaker and weaker, till that, and the whole empire, were ruined by the barbarians.

3. Our author, to shew that his memory is as good as his judgment, having represented Rome in the times of liberty as a public slaughter-house, soon after blames the clemency of their laws; whereas it is impossible that the same city could at the same time be guilty of those contrary extremities; and no less certain, that it was perfectly free from them both. His assertion seems to be grounded upon Cæsar's speech (related by Sallust) in favour of Lentulus and Cethegus, companions of Catiline: but tho' he there endeavoured to put the best colour he could upon their cause, it signified only thus much, that a Roman citizen could not be put to death, without being heard in public; which law will displease none that in understanding and integrity may not be compared to Filmer, and his followers. It is a folly to extend it farther; for it is easily proved, that there was always a power of putting citizens to death, and that it was exercised when occasion required. The laws were the same in the time of the kings, and when that office was executed by consuls, excepting such changes as are already mentioned. The "lex perduellionis," cited by Livy in the case of Horatius, who had killed his sister, continued in force from the foundation to the end of that government: the condemnation was to death, the words of the sentence these, "Caput obnubito, infelici arbore recte suspendito; verberato intra pomerium vel extra pomerium." He was tried by this law upon an appeal made to the people by his father, and absolved "admiratione magis
 " virtutis

SECT. 18.

Sallust. Bell. Catilin.

T. Liv. l. ii. c. 26.

CHAP. II. "virtutis quam jure causæ;" which could not have been, if by the law
 Liv. l. ii. c. 4, 5. no citizen might be put to death. The sons of Brutus were condemned
 l. vi. c. 20. to death in public, and executed with the Aquilii and Vitellii their com-
 l. viii. c. 7. panions in the same conspiracy: Manlius Capitolinus was put to death
 l. ii. c. 59. by the vote of the people: Titus Manlius by the command of his father
 l. iv. c. 14, Torquatus, for fighting without order: two legions were decimated by Appius Claudius: Spurius Melius refusing to appear before the dictator, 15. was killed by Servilius Ahala general of the horse, and pronounced "jure
 l. viii. c. 30, "cæsum:" Quintus Fabius was by Papirius the dictator condemned to 35. die, and could not have been saved but by the intercession and authority of Tac. Ann. l. the people. If this be not so, I desire to be informed what the senate meant
 xiv. c. 48. by condemning Nero to be put to death "more majorum," if "more majorum" no citizen might be put to death: why the consuls, dictators, military tribunes, decemviri, caused rods and axes to be carried before them, as well within as without the city, if no use was to be made of them.
 Were they only vain badges of a power never to be executed; or upon whom was the supreme power, signified by them, to be exercised within and without the city, if the citizens were not subject to it? It is strange that a man who had ever read a book of matters relating to the affairs of Rome, should fancy these things; or hope to impose them upon the world, if he knew them to be foolish, false, and absurd. But of all the marks of a most supine stupidity that can be given by a man, I know no one equal to this of our author, who in the same clause wherein he says no citizen could be put to death or banished, adds, that the magistrates were upon pain of death forbidden to do it; for if a magistrate might be put to death for banishing a citizen, or causing him to be executed, a citizen might be put to death; for the magistrates were not strangers, but citizens. If this was not so, he must think, that no crime was capital, but the punishment of capital crimes; or that no man was subject to the supreme power, but he that was created for the execution of it. Yet even this will not stop the gap; for the law that condemned the magistrate to die, could be of no effect, if there were no man to execute it; and there could be none if the law prohibited it, or that he who did it was to die for it: and this goes on to infinity.
 For if a magistrate could not put a citizen to death, I suppose a citizen could not put to death a magistrate; for he also is a citizen. So that upon the whole matter we may conclude, that malice is blind, and that wickedness is madness. It is hard to say more in praise of popular governments than will result from what he says against them: his reproaches are praises, and his praises reproaches. As government is instituted for the preservation of the governed, the Romans were sparing of blood, and are wisely commended by Livy for it: "Nulli unquam populo mitiores placuere "pœna"; which gentleness will never be blamed, unless by those who are pleased with nothing so much as the fury of those monsters, who with the ruin of the best part of mankind, usurped the dominion of that glorious city. But if the Romans were gentle in punishing offences, they were also diligent in preventing them: the excellence of their discipline led the youth to virtue,
 and

and the honours they received for recompence confirmed them in it. By SECT. 19.
 this means many of them became laws to themselves; and they who were not the most excellent, were yet taught so much of good, that they had a veneration for those they could not equal, which not only served to incite them to do well according to their talents, but kept them in such awe as to fear incurring their ill opinion by any bad action, as much as by the penalty of the law. This integrity of manners made the laws as it were useless; and, whilst they seemed to sleep, ignorant persons thought there were none: but their discipline being corrupted by prosperity, those vices came in which made way for the monarchy; and wickedness being placed in the throne, there was no safety for any but such as would be of the same spirit, and the empire was ruined by it.

S E C T. XIX.

That corruption and venality which is natural to courts, is seldom found in popular governments.

OUR author's next work is, with that modesty and truth which is natural to him, to impute corruption and venality to commonwealths.
 He knows that monarchies are exempted from those evils, and has discovered this truth from the integrity observed in the modern courts of England, France, and Spain, or the more antient of Rome and Persia: but after many falsehoods in matter of fact, and misrepresentations of that which is true, he shews that the corruption, venality, and violence, he blames, were neither the effects of liberty, nor consistent with it. Cneius Manlius, who with his Asiatic army brought in the luxury that gave birth to those mischiefs, did probably follow the looseness of his own disposition: yet the best and wisest men of that time knew from the beginning, that it would ruin the city, unless a stop might be put to the course of that evil: but they who had seen kings under their feet, and could no longer content themselves with that equality which is necessary among citizens, fomented it as the chief means to advance their ambitious designs. Tho' Marius was rigid in his nature, and cared neither for money, nor sensual pleasure; yet he favoured those vices in others, and is said to be the first that made use of them to his advantage. Catiline was one of the lewdest men in the world, and had no other way of compassing his designs than by rendering others as bad as himself: and Caesar set up his tyranny by spreading that corruption farther than the others had been able to do; and tho' he, Caligula, and some others were slain, yet the best men found it as impossible to restore liberty to the city when it was corrupted, as the worst had done to set up a tyranny whilst the integrity of their manners did continue. Men have a strange propensity to run into all manner of excesses, when plenty of means invite, and there is no power to deter; of which the succeeding emperors took advantage, and knowing that even their subsistence depended upon it, they thought themselves

CHAP. II. selves obliged by interest as well as inclination to make honours and preferments the rewards of vice: and tho' it be not always true in the utmost extent, that all men follow the example of the king; yet it is of very great efficacy: tho' some are so good, that they will not be perverted; and others so bad, that they will not be corrected; yet a great number does always follow the course that is favoured and rewarded by those that govern. There were idolaters doubtless among the Jews in the days of David and Hezekiah; but they prospered better under Jeroboam and Ahab: England was not without papists in the time of queen Elizabeth; but they thrived much better during the reign of her furious sister. False witnesses and accusers had a better trade under Tiberius, who called them "custodes legum," than under Trajan, who abhorred them; and whores, players, fidlers, with other such vermin, abounded certainly more when encouraged by Nero, than when despised by Antoninus and Marcus Aurelius. But as every one of these manifested what he was by those he favoured or punished, and that a man can only be judged by his principles or practices, he that would know whether absolute monarchies, or mixed governments, do most foment or punish venality and corruption, ought to examine the principle and practice of both, and compare them one with the other.

As to the principle, the above-mentioned vices may be profitable to private men; but they can never be so to the government, if it be popular or mixed: no people was ever the better for that which renders them weak or base; and a duly created magistracy, governing a nation with their consent, can have no interest distinct from that of the public, or desire to diminish the strength of the people, which is their own, and by which they subsist. On the other side, the absolute monarch, who governs for himself, and chiefly seeks his own preservation, looks upon the strength and bravery of his subjects as the root of his greatest danger, and frequently desires to render them weak, base, corrupt, and unfaithful to each other, that they may neither dare to attempt the breaking of the yoke he lays upon them, nor trust one another in any generous design for the recovery of their liberty. So that the same corruption which preserves such a prince, if it were introduced by a people, would weaken, if not utterly destroy them.

Again, all things have their continuance from a principle in nature suitable to their original: all tyrannies have had their beginnings from corruption. The histories of Greece, Sicily, and Italy, shew that all those who made themselves tyrants in several places, did it by the help of the worst, and the slaughter of the best: men could not be made subservient to their lust whilst they continued in their integrity; so as their business was to destroy those who would not be corrupted. They must therefore endeavour to maintain or increase the corruption by which they attain their greatness: if they fail in this point, they must fall, as Tarquin, Pisistratus, and others, have done; but if they succeed so far, that the vicious part do much prevail, the government is secure, tho' the prince may be in danger. And the same thing does in great measure accidentally conduce to the safety of his person: for they who for the most part are the authors of great revolutions, not being so much much led by a particular hatred to the man, as by a desire to do good to the public, seldom set themselves to conspire against the tyrant, unless he be altogether detestable and intolerable, if they do not hope to overthrow the tyranny. SECT. 19.

The contrary is seen in all popular and well-mixed governments: they are ever established by wise and good men, and can never be upheld otherwise than by virtue: the worst men always conspiring against them they must fall, if the best have not power to preserve them. Wheresoever therefore a people is so governed, the magistrates will obviate afar off the introduction of vices, which tend as much to the ruin of their persons and government, as to the preservation of the prince and his. This is evidenced by experience. It is not easy to name a monarch that had so many good qualities as Julius Cæsar, till they were extinguished by his ambition, which was inconsistent with them: he knew that his strength lay in the corruption of the people, and that he could not accomplish his designs without increasing it. He did not seek good men, but such as would be for him; and thought none sufficiently addicted to his interests, but such as stuck at the performance of no wickedness that he commanded: he was a soldier according to Cæsar's heart, who said,

“Pectore si fratris gladium, juguloque parentis, “Condere me jubeas, gravidæve in viscera partu
“Conjugis, invita peragam tamen omnia dextra.”

Lucan l. i. v. 376.

And lest such as were devoted to him should grow faint in villainy, he industriously inflamed their fury:

———“Vult omnia certe
“A se sæva peti, vult præmia Martis amari.” Ib. l. v. 307.

Having spread this poison amongst the soldiers, his next work was, by corrupting the tribunes to turn that power to the destruction of the people, which had been erected for their preservation; and pouring the treasures he had gained by rapine in Gaul into the bosom of Curio, made him an instrument of mischief, who had been a most eminent supporter of the laws. Tho' he was thought to have affected the glory of sparing Cato, and with trouble to have found, that he despised life when it was to be accounted his gift; yet in suspecting Brutus and Cassius, he shewed he could not believe that virtuous men who loved their country could be his friends. Such as carry on the like designs with less valour, wit, and generosity of spirit, will always be more bitterly bent to destroy all that are good, knowing, that the deformity, of their own vices is rendered most manifest; when they are compared with the good qualities of those who are most unlike them; and that they can never defend themselves against the scorn and hatred they incur by their vices, unless such a number can be infected with the same, and made to delight in the recompences of iniquity that foment them, as may be able to keep the rest of the people in subjection.

CHAP. II. The same thing happens even when the usurpation is not so violent as that of Agathocles, Dionysius, or the last king of Denmark, who in one day by the strength of a mercenary soldiery overthrew all the laws of his country: and a lawfully created magistrate is forced to follow the same ways as soon as he begins to affect a power which the laws do not confer upon him. I wish I could say there were few of these; but experience shews, that such a proportion of wisdom, moderation of spirit, and justice, is required in a supreme magistrate, to render him content with a limited power, as is seldom found. Man is of an aspiring nature, and apt to put too high a value upon himself: they who are raised above their brethren, tho' but a little, desire to go farther; and if they gain the name of king, they think themselves wronged and degraded, when they are not suffered to do what they please.

Sen. Thyest.

“——Sanctitas, pietas, fides

“ Privata bona sunt: qua juvat, reges cant.”

In these things they never want masters; and the nearer they come to a power that is not easily restrained by law, the more passionately they desire to abolish all that opposes it: and when their hearts are filled with this fury, they never fail to chuse such ministers as will be subservient to their will: and this is so well known, that those only approach them who resolve to be so. Their interests as well as their inclinations incite them to diffuse their own manners as far as they can, which is no less than to bring those who are under their power to all that wickedness of which the nature of man is capable; and no greater testimony can be given of the efficacy of these means towards the utter corruption of nations, than the accursed effects we see of them in our own and the neighbouring countries.

It may be said, that some princes are so full of virtue and goodness, as not to desire more power than the laws allow, and are not obliged to chuse ill men, because they desire nothing but what the best are willing to do. This may be, and sometimes is: the nation is happy that has such a king: but he is hard to find, and more than a human power is required to keep him in so good a way. The strength of his own affections will ever be against him: wives, children, and servants, will always join with those enemies that arise in his own breast to pervert him: if he has any weak side, any lust unsubdued, they will gain the victory. He has not searched into the nature of man, who thinks that any one can resist when he is thus on all sides assaulted: nothing but the wonderful and immediate power of God's Spirit can preserve him; and to alledge it, will be nothing to the purpose, unless it can be proved, that all princes are blessed with such an assistance, or that God hath promised it to them and their successors for ever, by what means soever they came to the crowns they enjoy.

Nothing is farther from my intention than to speak irreverently of kings; and I presume no wise man will think I do so, if I profess, that, having observed, as well as I can, what history, and daily experience, teach us concerning the virtues and religions that are or have been from the beginning of the world encouraged and supported by monarchs, the methods they

they have followed since they have gone under the name of christians, their moral as well as their theological graces, together with what the scriptures tell us of those who in the last days will principally support the throne of antichrist; I cannot be confident, that they are generally in an extraordinary manner preserved by the hand of God from the vices and frailties to which the rest of mankind is subject. If no man can shew that I am in this mistaken, I may conclude, that as they are more than any other men in the world exposed to temptations and snares, they are more than any in danger of being corrupted, and made instruments of corrupting others, if they are no otherwise defended than the rest of men. SECT. 19.

This being the state of the matter on both sides, we may easily collect, that all governments are subject to corruption and decay; but with this difference, that absolute monarchy is by principle led unto, or rooted in it; whereas mixed or popular governments are only in a possibility of falling into it: as the first cannot subsist, unless the prevailing part of the people be corrupted; the other must certainly perish, unless they be preserved in a great measure free from vices: and I doubt whether any better reason can be given, why there have been and are more monarchies than popular governments in the world, than that nations are more easily drawn into corruption than defended from it; and I think that monarchy can be said to be natural in no other sense, than that our depraved nature is most inclined to that which is worst.

To avoid unnecessary disputes, I give the name of popular governments to those of Rome, Athens, Sparta, and the like, though improperly, unless the same may also be given to many that are usually called monarchies, since there is nothing of violence in either; the power is conferred upon the chief magistrates of both by the free consent of a willing people, and such a part as they think fit is still retained and executed in their own assemblies; and in this sense it is that our author seems to speak against them. As to popular government in the strictest sense (that is pure democracy, where the people in themselves, and by themselves, perform all that belongs to government) I know of no such thing; and if it be in the world, have nothing to say for it. In asserting the liberty, generally, as I suppose granted by God to all mankind, I neither deny, that so many as think fit to enter into a society, may give so much of their power as they please to one or more men, for a time, or perpetually, to them and their heirs, according to such rules as they prescribe; nor approve the disorders that must arise if they keep it intirely in their own hands: and looking upon the several governments, which, under different forms and names, have been regularly constituted by nations, as so many undeniable testimonies, that they thought it good for themselves, and their posterity, so to do, I infer, that as there is no man who would not rather chuse to be governed by such as are just, industrious, valiant, and wise, than by those that are wicked, slothful, cowardly, and foolish; and to live in society with such as are qualified like those of the first sort, rather than with those who will be ever ready to commit all manner of villanies, or want experience, strength or courage, to join in

CHAP. II. repelling the injuries that are offered by others: so there are none who do not according to the measure of understanding they have, endeavour to set up those who seem to be best qualified, and to prevent the introduction of those vices, which render the faith of the magistrate suspected, or make him unable to perform his duty, in providing for the execution of justice, and the public defence of the state, against foreign or domestic enemies. For as no man who is not absolutely mad, will commit the care of a flock to a villain, that has neither skill, diligence, nor courage, to defend them, or perhaps is maliciously set to destroy them, rather than to a stout, faithful, and wise shepherd; it is less to be imagined, that any would commit the same error in relation to that society which comprehends himself, with his children, friends, and all that is dear to him.

The same considerations are of equal force in relation to the body of every nation: for since the magistrate, tho' the most perfect in his kind, cannot perform his duty, if the people be so base, vicious, effeminate, and cowardly, as not to second his good intentions; those who expect good from him, cannot desire so to corrupt their companions that are to help him, as to render it impossible for him to accomplish it. Tho' I believe there have been in all ages bad men in every nation; yet I doubt whether there was one in Rome, except a Cataline or a Cæsar, who designed to make themselves tyrants, that would not rather have wished the whole people as brave and virtuous as in the time of the Carthaginian wars, than vile and base, as in the days of Nero and Domitian. But it is madness to think, that the whole body would not rather wish to be as it was when virtue flourished, and nothing upon earth was able to resist their power, than weak, miserable, base, slavish, and trampled under foot by any that would invade them; and forced as a chattel to become a prey to those that were strongest. Which is sufficient to shew, that a people acting according to the liberty of their own will, never advance unworthy men, unless it be by mistake, nor willingly suffer the introduction of vices: whereas the absolute monarch always prefers the worst of those who are addicted to him, and cannot subsist unless the prevailing part of the people be base and vicious.

If it be said, that those governments in which the democratical part governs most, do more frequently err in the choice of men, or the means of preserving that purity of manners which is required for the well-being of a people, than those wherein aristocracy prevails; I confess it, and that in Rome and Athens the best and wisest men did for the most part incline to aristocracy. Xenophon, Plato, Aristotle, Thucydides, Livy, Tacitus, Cicero, and others, were of this sort: but if our author there seek patrons for his absolute monarchy, he will find none but Phalaris, Agathocles, Dionysius, Catiline, Cethegus, Lentulus, with the corrupted crew of mercenary rascals, who did, or endeavoured to set them up. These are they "quibus ex honesto nulla est spes; they abhor the dominion of the law, because it curbs their vices, and make themselves subservient to the lusts of a man who may nourish them. Similitude of interests, manners, manners, and designs, is a link of union between them: both are enemies SECT. 20.

 to popular and mixed government; and those governments are enemies to them, and by preserving virtue and integrity oppose both; knowing, that if they do not, they and their governments must certainly perish.

S E C T. XX.

Man's natural love to liberty is tempered by reason, which originally is his nature.

THAT our author's book may appear to be a heap of incongruities and contradictions, it is not amiss to add to what has already been observed, that having asserted absolute monarchy to be "the only natural government," he now says, "that the nature of all people is to desire liberty without restraint." But if monarchy be that power which above all restrains liberty, and subjects all to the will of one; this is as much as to say, that all people naturally desire that which is against nature; and by wonderful excess of extravagance and folly to assert contrary propositions, that on both sides are equally absurd and false. For, as we have already proved that no government is imposed upon men by God or nature, it is no less evident, that, man being a rational creature, nothing can be universally natural to him, that is not rational. But this liberty without restraint being inconsistent with any government, and the good which man naturally desires for himself, children, and friends, we find no place in the world where the inhabitants do not enter into some kind of society or government to restrain it: and to say that all men desire liberty without restraint, and yet that all do restrain it, is ridiculous. The truth is, man is hereunto led by reason, which is his nature. Every one sees they cannot well live asunder, nor many together, without some rule to which all must submit. This submission is a restraint of liberty, but could be of no effect as to the good intended, unless it were general; nor general, unless it were natural. When all are born to the same freedom, some will not resign that which is their own, unless others do the like. This general consent of all to resign such a part of their liberty as seems to be for the good of all is the voice of nature, and the act of men (according to natural reason) seeking their own good: and if all go not in the same way, according to the same form, it is an evident testimony that no one is directed by nature; but as a few or many may join together, and frame smaller and greater societies, so those societies may institute such an order or form of government as best pleases themselves; and if the ends of government are obtained, they all equally follow the voice of nature in constituting them.

Again, if man were by nature so tenacious of his liberty without restraint, he must be rationally so. The creation of absolute monarchies, which entirely extinguishes it, must necessarily be most contrary to it, tho' the people were willing; for they thereby abjure their own nature. The usurpation of them

CHAP. II. them can be no less than the most abominable and outrageous violation of the laws of nature that can be imagined: the laws of God must be in the like measure broken; and of all governments, democracy, in which every man's liberty is least restrained, because every man hath an equal part, would certainly prove to be the most just, rational, and natural; whereas our author represents it as a perpetual spring of disorder, confusion, and vice. This consequence would be unavoidable, if he said true; but it being my fate often to differ from him, I hope to be excused if I do so in this also, and affirm, that nothing but the plain and certain dictates of reason can be generally applicable to all men as the law of their nature; and they who, according to the best of their understanding, provide for the good of themselves and their posterity, do all equally observe it. He that inquires more exactly into the matter may find, that reason enjoins every man not to arrogate to himself more than he allows to others, nor to retain that liberty which will prove hurtful to him; or to expect that others will suffer themselves to be restrained, whilst he, to their prejudice, remains in the exercise of that freedom which nature allows. He who would be exempted from this common rule, must shew for what reason he should be raised above his brethren; and, if he do it not, he is an enemy to them. This is not popularity, but tyranny; and tyrants are said "exuisse hominem," to throw off the nature of men, because they do unjustly and unreasonably assume to themselves that which agrees not with the frailty of human nature, and set up an interest in themselves contrary to that of their equals, which they ought to defend as their own. Such as favour them are like to them; and we know of no tyranny that was not set up by the worst, nor of any that have been destroyed, unless by the best of men. The several tyrannies of Syracuse were introduced by Agathocles, Dionysius, Hieronymus, Hippocrates, Epicydes, and others, by the help of lewd dissolute mercenary villains; and overthrown by Timoleon, Dion, Theodorus, and others, whose virtues will be remembered in all ages. These, and others like to them, never sought liberty without restraint, but such as was restrained by laws tending to the public good; that all might concur in promoting it, and the unruly desires of those who affected power and honours, which they did not deserve, might be repressed.

The like was seen in Rome: when Brutus, Valerius, and other virtuous citizens, had thrown out the lewd Tarquins, they trusted to their own innocence and reputation; and thinking them safe under the protection of the law, contented themselves with such honours as their countrymen thought they deserved. This would not satisfy the dissolute crew that used to be companions to the Tarquins. "Sodales adolescentium Tarquiniorum affueti

T. Liv. l. ii. "more regio vivere, eam tum æquato jure omnium licentiam quærentes, libertatem aliorum in suam vertisse servitutem conquerebantur. Regem hominem esse, à quo impetres ubi jus, ubi injuria opus sit. Esse gratiæ locum, esse beneficio: & irasci & ignoscere posse. Leges rem surdam esse & inexorabilem, salubriorem inopi quam potenti: nihil laxamenti nec veniæ habere, si modum excesseris: periculosum esse in tot humanis erroribus"

"roribus sola innocentia vivere." I cannot say, that either of these sought a liberty without restraint; for the virtuous were willing to be restrained by the law, and the vicious to submit to the will of a man, to gain impunity in offending. But if our author say true, the licentious fury of these lewd young men, who endeavoured to subvert the constitution of their country, to procure the impunity of their own crimes, would have been more natural, that is more reasonable than the orderly proceedings of the most virtuous, who desired that the law might be the rule of their actions, which is most absurd. SECT. 20.

The like vicious wretches have in all times endeavoured to put the power into the hands of one man, who might protect them in their villainies, and advance them to exorbitant riches, or undeserved honours; whilst the best men, trusting in their innocence, and desiring no other riches or preferments than what they were by their equals thought to deserve, were contented with a due liberty, under the protection of a just law: and I must transcribe the histories of the world, or at least so much of them as concerns the tyrannies that have been set up or cast down, if I should here insert all the proofs that might be given of it. But I shall come nearer to the point, which is not to compare democracy with monarchy, but a regular mixed government with such an absolute monarchy, as leaves all to the will of that man, woman, or child, who happens to be born in the reigning family, how ill soever they may be qualified. I desire those who are lovers of truth to consider, whether the wisest, best, and bravest of men, are not naturally led to be pleased with a government that protects them from receiving wrong, when they have not the least inclination to do any? Whether they who desire no unjust advantage above their brethren, will not always desire that a people or senate constituted as that of Rome, from the expulsion of Tarquin to the setting up of Cæsar, should rather judge of their merit, than Tarquin, Cæsar, or his successors? Or whether the lewd or corrupted pretorian bands, with Macro, Sejanus, Tigellinus, and the like, commanding them, will not ever, like Brutus's sons, abhor the inexorable power of the laws, with the necessity of living only by their innocence, and favour the interest of princes like to those that advanced them? If this be not sufficient, they may be pleased a little to reflect upon the affairs of our own country, and seriously consider, whether Hyde, Clifford, Falmouth, Arlington and Danby, could have pretended to the chief places, if the disposal of them had been in a free and well-regulated parliament? Whether they did most resemble Brutus, Publicola, and the rest of the Valerii, the Fabii, Quintii, Corneli, &c. or Narcissus, Pallas, Icetus, Laco, Vinnius, and the like? Whether all men, good or bad, do not favour that state of things, which favours them, and such as they are? Whether Cleaveland, Portsmouth, and others of the same trade, have attained to the riches and honours they enjoy by services done to the commonwealth? And what places Chiffinch, Fox and Jenkins, could probably have attained, if our affairs had been regulated as good men desire? Whether the old arts of begging, stealing, and bawling, or the new ones of informing and trepanning, thrive best under one man

CHAP. II. man who may be weak or vicious, and is always subject to be circumvented by flatterers, or under the severe scrutinies of a senate or people? In a word, whether they who live by such arts, and know no other, do not always endeavour to advance the government under which they enjoy, or may hope to obtain the highest honours, and abhor that, in which they are exposed to all manner of scorn and punishment? Which being determined, it will easily appear why the worst men have ever been for absolute monarchy, and the best against it; and which of the two in so doing can be said to desire an unrestrained liberty of doing that which is evil.

S E C T. XXI.

Mixed and popular governments preserve peace, and manage wars, better than absolute monarchies.

BEING no-way concerned in the defence of democracy; and having proved, that Xenophon, Thucydides, and others of the antients, in speaking against the over-great power of the common people, intended to add reputation to the aristocratical party to which they were addicted, and not to set up absolute monarchy, which never fell under discourse among them, but as an object of scorn and hatred, even in itself, and only to be endured by base and barbarous people, I may leave our knight, like Don Quixote, fighting against the phantasms of his own brain, and saying what he pleases against such governments as never were, unless in such a place as San Marino near Sinigaglia in Italy, where a hundred clowns govern a barbarous rock that no man invades, and relates nothing to our question. If his doctrine be true, the monarchy he extols is not only to be preferred before unruly democracy, and mixed governments, but is the only one that, without a gross violation of the laws of God and nature, can be established over any nation. But having, as I hope, sufficiently proved, that God did neither institute, nor appoint any such to be instituted, nor approve those that were; that nature does not incline us to it, and that the best as well as the wisest men have always abhorred it; that it has been agreeable only to the most stupid and base nations; and if others have submitted to it, they have done so only as to the greatest of evils brought upon them by violence, corruption, or fraud; I may now proceed to shew, that the progress of it has been in all respects suitable to its beginning.

To this end it will not be amiss to examine our author's words: "Thus," says he, "do they paint to the life this beast with many heads: let me give the cypher of their form of government: as it is begot by sedition, so it is nourished by crimes: it can never stand without wars, either with an enemy abroad, or with friends at home;" and in order to this I will not criticize upon the terms, tho' the cypher of a form, and war with friends, may be justly called nonsense; but coming to his assertions, that popular or mixed governments have their birth in sedition, and are ever afterwards vexed with with civil or foreign wars, I take liberty to say, that whereas there is no SECT. 21. form appointed by God or nature, those governments only can be called just, which are established by the consent of nations. These nations may at the first set up popular or mixed governments, and without the guilt of sedition introduce them afterwards, if that which was first established prove unprofitable or hurtful to them; and those that have done so, have enjoyed more justice in times of peace, and managed wars, when occasion required, with more virtue, and better success, than any absolute monarchies have done. And whereas he says, that "in popular governments each man hath a care of his particular, and thinks basely of the common good; they look upon approaching mischiefs as they do upon thunder, only every man wisheth it may not touch his own person:" I say, that men can no otherwise be engaged to take care of the public, than by having such a part in it, as absolute monarchy does not allow; for under it they can neither obtain the good for themselves, posterity, and friends, that they desire, nor prevent the mischiefs they fear, which are the principal arguments that persuade men to expose themselves to labours or dangers. It is a folly to say, that the vigilance and wisdom of the monarch supplies the defect of care in others; for we know, that no men under the sun were ever more void of both, and all manner of virtue required to such a work, than very many monarchs have been: and, which is yet worse, the strength and happiness of the people being frequently dangerous to them, they have not so much as the will to promote it; nay, sometimes set themselves to destroy it. Antient monarchies afford us frequent examples of this kind; and if we consider those of France and Turkey, which seem most to flourish in our age, the people will appear to be so miserable under both, that they cannot fear any change of governor or government; and all, except a few ministers, are kept so far from the knowledge of, or power in the management of affairs, that if any of them should fancy a possibility of something that might befall them worse than what they suffer, or hope for that which might alleviate their misery, they could do nothing towards the advancement of the one, or prevention of the other. Tacitus observes, that in his time no man was able to write what passed, "inscitia reipublicæ ut alienæ." They neglected the public affairs in which they had no part. Tacit.an.1.i. In the same age it was said, that the people, who, whilst they fought for their own interests, had been invincible, being enslaved, were grown sordid, idle, base, running after stage-plays and shows; so as the whole strength of the Roman armies consisted of strangers. When their spirits were depressed by servitude, they had neither courage to defend themselves, nor will to fight for their wicked masters; and least of all to increase their power, which was destructive to themselves: the same thing is found in all places. Tho' the Turk commands many vast provinces, that naturally produce as good soldiers as any, yet his greatest strength is in children that do not know their fathers; who not being very many in number, may perish in one battle, and the empire by that means be lost, the miserable nations that groan under that tyranny having neither courage, power, nor will, to defend it. This was the fate of the Mamalukes. They had CHAP. II. for the space of almost two hundred years domineered in Egypt, and a great part of Asia; but the people under them being weak and disaffected, they could never recover the defeat they received from Selim near Tripoli, who, pursuing his victory, in a few months utterly abolished their kingdom.

Notwithstanding the present pride of France, the numbers and warlike inclinations of that people, the bravery of the nobility, extent of dominion, convenience of situation, and the vast revenues of their king, his greatest advantages have been gained by the mistaken counsels of England, the valour of our soldiers unhappily sent to serve him, and the strangers of whom the strength of his armies consists; which is so unsteady a support, that many who are well versed in affairs of this nature, incline to think he subsists rather by little arts, and corrupting ministers in foreign courts, than by the power of his own armies; and that some reformation in the counsels of his neighbours might prove sufficient to overthrow that greatness which is grown formidable to Europe; the same misery to which he has reduced his people, rendering them as unable to defend him, upon any change of fortune, as to defend their own rights against him.

This proceeds not from any particular defect in the French government, but that which is common to all absolute monarchies. And no state can be said to stand upon a steady foundation, except those whose strength is in their own soldiery, and the body of their own people. Such as serve for wages, often betray their masters in distress, and always want the courage and industry which is found in those who fight for their own interests, and are to have a part in the victory. The business of mercenaries is so to perform their duty, as to keep their employments, and to draw profit from them; but that is not enough to support the spirits of men in extreme dangers. The shepherd, who is a hireling, flies when the thief comes; and this adventitious help failing, all that a prince can reasonably expect from a disaffected and oppressed people, is, that they should bear the yoke patiently in the time of his prosperity; but upon the change of his fortune, they leave him to shift for himself, or join with his enemies to avenge the injuries they had received. Thus did Alphonso, and Ferdinand, kings of Naples, and Ludovico Sforza duke of Milan fall, in the times of Charles the Eighth, and Louis the Twelfth, kings of France. The two first had been false, violent, and cruel; nothing within their kingdom could oppose their fury: but when they were invaded by a foreign power, they lost all, as Guicciardin says, without breaking one lance; and Sforza was by his own mercenary soldiers delivered into the hands of his enemies.

I think it may be hard to find examples of such as proceeding in the same way have had better success: but if it should so fall out, that a people living under an absolute monarchy, should through custom, or fear of something worse (if that can be) not only suffer patiently, but desire to uphold the government; neither the nobility, nor commonalty, can do any thing towards it. They are strangers to all public concerns: all things are governed by one or a few men, and others know nothing either of action or counsel. Filmer will tell us it is no matter; the profound wisdom dom of the prince provides for all. But what if this prince be a child, a fool, a superannuated dotard, or a madman? Or if he does not fall under any of these extremities, and possesses such a proportion of wit, industry, and courage, as is ordinarily seen in men, how shall he supply the office that indeed requires profound wisdom, and an equal measure of experience and valour? It is to no purpose to say a good council may supply his defects; for it does not appear how he should come by this council, nor who should oblige him to follow their advice: if he be left to his own will to do what he pleases, tho' good advice be given to him; yet his judgment being perverted, he will always incline to the worst: if a necessity be imposed upon him of acting according to the advice of his council, he is not that absolute monarch of whom we speak, nor the government monarchical, but aristocratical. These are imperfect fig-leaf-coverings of nakedness. It was in vain to give good counsel to Sardanapalus; and none could defend the Assyrian empire, when he lay wallowing amongst his whores, without any other thought than of his lusts. None could preserve Rome, when Domitian's chief business was to kill flies, and that of Honorius to take care of his hens. The monarchy of France must have perished under the base kings they call "les roys faineants," if the scepter had not been wrested out of their unworthy hands. The world is full of examples in this kind: and when it pleases God to bestow a just, wise, and valiant king, as a blessing upon a nation, it is only a momentary help, his virtues end with him; and there being neither any divine promise nor human reason moving us to believe that they shall always be renewed and continued in his successors, men cannot rely upon it; and to alledge a possibility of such a thing is nothing to the purpose.

On the other side, in a popular or mixed government every man is concerned: every one has a part, according to his quality or merit; all changes are prejudicial to all: whatsoever any man conceives to be for the public good, he may propose it in the magistracy, or to the magistrate: the body of the people is the public defence, and every man is armed and disciplined: the advantages of good success are communicated to all, and every one bears a part in the losses. This makes men generous and industrious; and fills their hearts with love to their country: * this, and the desire of that praise * Amor patriæ laudisque which is the reward of virtue, raised the Romans above the rest of mankind; and wheresoever the same ways are taken, they will in a great measure have the same effects. By this means they had as many soldiers to fight for their country as there were freemen in it. Whilst they had to deal with the free nations of Italy, Greece, Africa, or Spain, they never conquered a country, till the inhabitants were exhausted: but when they came to fight against kings, the success of a battle was enough to bring a kingdom under their power. Antiochus upon a ruffe received from Acilius at Thermopylæ, left all that he possessed in Greece; and being defeated by Scipio Nasica, he quitted all the kingdoms and territories of Asia on this side Taurus. Paulus Emilius became master of Macedon by one prosperous fight against Perseus. Syphax, Tigranes, Ptolemy, and others, were more easily subdued. The mercenary

CHAP. II.  armies on which they relied being broken, the cities and countries not caring for their masters, submitted to those who had more virtue, and better fortune. If the Roman power had not been built upon a more sure foundation, they could not have subsisted. Notwithstanding their valour, they were often beaten; but their losses were immediately repaired by the excellence of their discipline. When Hannibal had gained the battles of Trebia, Ticinum, Thrasimene, and Cannæ; defeated the Romans in many other encounters, and slain above two hundred thousand of their men, with Paulus Emilius, C. Servilius, Sempronius Gracchus, Quintius, Marcellus, and many other excellent commanders: when about the same time the two brave Scipio's had been cut off with their armies in Spain, and many great losses had been sustained in Sicily, and by sea, one would have thought it impossible for the city to have resisted: but their virtue, love to their country, and good government, was a strength that increased under all their calamities, and in the end overcame all. The nearer Hannibal came to the walls, the more obstinate was their resistance. Tho' he had killed more great captains than any kingdom ever had, others daily stepped up in their place, who excelled them in all manner of virtue. I know not, if at any time that conquering city could glory in a greater number of men fit for the highest enterprizes, than at the end of that cruel war, which had consumed so many of them; but I think, that the finishing victories by them obtained, are but ill proofs of our author's assertion, that they "thought basely of the common good, and sought only to save themselves." We know of none except Cecilius Metellus, who, after the battle of Cannæ, had so base a thought as to design the withdrawing himself from the public ruin; but Scipio (afterwards surnamed Africanus) threatening death to those who would not swear never to abandon their country, forced him to leave it. This may in general be imputed to good government and discipline, with which all were so seasoned from their infancy, that no affection was so rooted in them, as an ardent love to their country, and a resolution to die for it, or with it; but the means by which they accomplished their great ends, so as after their defeats to have such men as carried on their noblest designs with more glory than ever, was their annual elections of magistrates, many being thereby advanced to the supreme commands, and every one by the honours they enjoyed, filled with a desire of rendering himself worthy of them.

It is told differently in Livy, l. xxiii. c. 53.

Liv. l. xxiii. c. 42.

I should not much insist upon these things, if they had been seen only in Rome: but tho' their discipline seems to have been more perfect, better observed, and to have produced a virtue that surpassed all others; the like has been found, tho' perhaps not in the same degree, in all nations that have enjoyed their liberty, and were admitted to such a part of the government, as might give them a love to it. This was evident in all the nations of Italy. The Sabines, Volsci, Æqui, Tuscans, Samnites, and others, were never conquered till they had no men left. The Samnites alone inhabiting a small and barren province, suffered more defeats before they were subdued, than all the kingdoms of Numidia, Egypt, Macedon, and Asia; and, as it is expressed in their embassy to Hannibal, never yielded, till they who had brought vast

vast numbers of men into the field, and by them defeated some of the Roman SECT. 22. armies, were reduced to such weakness, that they could not resist one legion. We hear of few Spartans who did not willingly expose their lives for the service of their country: and the women themselves were so far inflamed with the same affection, that they refused to mourn for their children and husbands, who died in the defence of it. When the brave Brasidas was slain, some eminent men went to comfort his mother upon the news of his death; and telling her he was the most valiant man in the city, she answered, that he was indeed a valiant man, and died as he ought to do; but that, through the goodness of the gods, many others were left as valiant as he. Thucyd. de bel. Pelopon.

When Xerxes invaded Greece, there was not a citizen of Athens able to bear arms, who did not leave his wife and children to shift for themselves in the neighbouring cities, and their houses to be burnt, when they embarked with Themistocles; and never thought of either, till they had defeated the Barbarians at Salamis by sea, and at Platea by land. When men are thus spirited, some will ever prove excellent; and as none did ever surpass those who were bred under this discipline, in all moral, military, and civil virtues; those very countries where they flourished most, have not produced any eminent men since they lost that liberty which was the mother and nurse of them.

Tho' I should fill a volume with examples of this kind (as I might easily do), such as our author will say, that in popular governments men look upon mischiefs as thunder, and only wish it may not touch themselves: but, leaving them to the scorn and hatred they deserve by their impudence and folly, I conclude this point with the answer, that Trajano Boccalini puts into the mouth of Apollo, to the princes who complained that their subjects had not that love to their countries, as had been, and was daily seen, in those who lived under commonwealths; which did amount to no more than to tell them, that their ill government was the cause of that defect, and that the prejudices incurred by rapine, violence, and fraud, were to be repaired only by liberality, justice, and such a care of their subjects, that they might live happily under them. Racion. 99.

S E C T. XXII.

Commonwealths seek peace or war, according to the variety of their constitutions.

IF I have hitherto spoken in general of popular or mixed governments, as if they were all founded on the same principle, it was only because our author without distinction has generally blamed them all, and generally imputed to every one those faults, which perhaps never were in any; but most certainly are directly opposite to the temper and constitution of many among them. Malice and ignorance reign so equally in him, that it is not easy to determine from

CHAP. II. from which of the two this false representation proceeds. But lest any man should thereby be imposed upon, it is time to observe, that the constitutions of commonwealths have been so various, according to the different temper of nations and times, that if some of them seem to have been principally constituted for war, others have as much delighted in peace: and many, having taken the middle, and (as some think) the best way, have so moderated their love to peace, as not to suffer the spirits of the people to fall, but kept them in a perpetual readiness to make war when there was occasion: and every one of those having followed several ways and ends, deserve our particular consideration.

The cities of Rome, Sparta, Thebes, and all the associations of the Etolians, Achaïans, Sabines, Latins, Samnites, and many others that antiently flourished in Greece and Italy, seem to have intended nothing but the just preservation of liberty at home, and making war abroad. All the nations of Spain, Germany, and Gaul, sought the same things. Their principal work was to render their people valiant, obedient to their commanders, lovers of their country, and always ready to fight for it: and for this reason when the senators of Rome had killed Romulus, they persuaded Julius Proculus to affirm, that he had seen him in a most glorious form ascending to heaven, and promising great things to the city: "Proinde rem militarem colant." The Athenians were not less inclined to war; but applied themselves to trade, as subservient to that end, by increasing the number of the people, and furnishing them with the means of carrying it on with more vigour and power. The Phenician cities, of which Carthage was the most eminent, followed the same method; but, knowing that riches do not defend themselves, or scorning slothfully to enjoy what was gained by commerce, they so far applied themselves to war, that they grew to a power, which Rome only was able to overthrow. Venice, Florence, Genoa, Lucca, and some other cities of Italy, seem chiefly to have aimed at trade; and placing the hopes of their safety in the protection of more powerful states, unwillingly entered into wars, especially by land; and when they did, they made them by mercenary soldiers.

Again, some of those that intended war, desired to enlarge their territories by conquest; others only to preserve their own, and to live with freedom and safety upon them. Rome was of the first sort; and knowing that such ends cannot be accomplished without great numbers of men, they freely admitted strangers into the city, senate, and magistracy. Numa was a Sabine: Tarquinius Priscus was the son of a Grecian: one hundred of those Sabines who came with Tatius were admitted into the senate: Appius Claudius of the same people came to Rome, was made a member of the senate, and created consul. They demolished several cities, and brought the inhabitants to their own; gave the right of citizens to many others (sometimes to whole cities and provinces) and cared not how many they received, so they could engraft them upon the same interest with the old stock, and season them with the same principles, discipline, and manners. On the other side, the Spartans desiring only to continue free, virtuous, and safe in the enjoyment of their their own territory, and thinking themselves strong enough to defend it, SECT. 22.

framed a most severe discipline, to which few strangers would submit. They banished all those curious arts, that are useful to trade; prohibited the importation of gold and silver; appointed the helotes to cultivate their lands, and to exercise such trades as are necessary to life; admitted few strangers to live amongst them; made none of them free of their city, and educated their youth in such exercises only as prepared them for war. I will not take upon me to judge whether this proceeded from such a moderation of spirit, as placed felicity rather in the fulness and stability of liberty, integrity, virtue, and the enjoyment of their own, than in riches, power, and dominion over others; nor which of these two different methods deserves most to be commended: but certain it is, that both succeeded according to the intention of the founders.

Rome conquered the best part of the world, and never wanted men to defend what was gained: Sparta lived in such happiness and reputation, that till it was invaded by Epaminondas, an enemy's trumpet had not been heard by those within the town for the space of eight hundred years, and never suffered any great disaster, till receding from their own institutions, they were brought by prosperity to affect the principality of Greece, and to undertake such wars as could not be carried on without money, and greater numbers of men than a small city was able to furnish; by which means they were obliged to beg assistance from the Barbarians, whom they scorned and hated, as appears by the stories of Callicratidas, Lyfander, and Agefilaus, and fell into such streights as were never recovered.

The like variety has been observed in the constitutions of those northern nations that invaded the Roman empire; for tho' all of them intended war, and looked upon those only to be members of their commonwealths, who used arms to defend them, yet some did immediately incorporate themselves with those of the conquered countries. Of this number were the Franks, who presently became one nation with the Gauls; others kept themselves in a distinct body, as the Saxons did from the Britons: and the Goths for more than three hundred years that they reigned in Spain, never contracted marriages, or otherwise mixed with the Spaniards, till their kingdom was overthrown by the Moors.

These things, and others of the like nature, being weighed, many have doubted whether it were better to constitute a commonwealth for war, or for trade; and of such as intend war, whether those are most to be praised who prepare for defence only, or those who design by conquest to enlarge their dominions: or, if they admit of trade, whether they should propose the acquisition of riches for their ultimate end, and depend upon foreign and mercenary forces to defend them; or to be as helps to enable their own people to carry on those wars, in which they may be frequently engaged. These questions might perhaps be easily decided, if mankind were of a temper to suffer those to live in peace, who offer no injury to any; or that men who have money to hire soldiers when they stand in need of them, could find such as would valiantly and faithfully defend them, whilst they apply themselves to their trades.

But

CHAP. II. But experience teaching us, that those only can be safe who are strong; and that no people was ever well defended, but those who fought for themselves; the best judges of these matters have always given the preference to those constitutions that principally intend war, and make use of trade as assisting to that end: and think it better to aim at conquest, rather than simply to stand upon their own defence; since he that loses all if he be overcome, fights upon very unequal terms; and if he obtain the victory, gains no other advantage, than for the present to repel the danger that threatened him.

These opinions are confirmed by the examples of the Romans, who prospered much more than the Spartans: and the Carthaginians, who made use of trade as a help to war, raised their city to be one of the most potent that ever was in the world: whereas the Venetians having relied on trade, and mercenary soldiers, are always forced too much to depend upon foreign potentates; very often to buy peace with ignominious and prejudicial conditions; and sometimes to fear the infidelity of their own commanders, no less than the violence of their enemies. But that which ought to be valued above all in point of wisdom as well as justice, is, the government given by God to the Hebrews, which chiefly fitted them for war, and to make conquests. Moses divided them under several captains, into thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens: this was a perpetual ordinance amongst them: in numbering them, those only were counted, who were able to bear arms: every man was obliged to go out to war, except such as had married a wife, or upon other special occasions, were for a time excused; and the whole series of the sacred history shews, that there were always as many soldiers to fight for their country as there were men able to fight. And if this be taken for a picture of a many-headed beast, delighting in blood, begotten by sedition, and nourished by crimes, God himself was the drawer of it.

In this variety of constitutions and effects proceeding from them, I can see nothing more justly and generally to be attributed to them all, than that love to their country, which our author impudently affirms to be wanting in all. In other matters their proceedings are not only different, but contrary to each other: yet it cannot be said, that any nations have enjoyed so much peace as some republics. The Venetians too great inclination to peace is accounted to be a mortal error in their constitution, and they have not been less free from domestic seditions than foreign wars: the conspiracies of the Falerii and Tiepoli were extinguished by their punishment, and that of La Cueva crushed before it was ripe. Genoa has not been altogether so happy: the factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelins, that spread themselves over all Italy, infected that city; and the malice of the Spaniards and French raised others under the Fregosi and Adorni; but they being composed, they have for more than an hundred and fifty years rested in quiet.

There is another sort of commonwealth, composed of many cities associated together, and living "æquo jure;" every one retaining and exercising a sovereign power within itself, except in some cases expressed in the act of union, or league made between them. These I confess are more hardly preserved in peace. Disputes may arise among them concerning limits, jurisdiction, jurisdiction, and the like. They cannot always be equally concerned in the same things. The injuries offered to one do not equally affect all. Their neighbours will sow divisions among them; and not having a mother-city to decide their controversies by her authority, they may be apt to fall into quarrels, especially if they profess christianity; which having been split into variety of opinions ever since it was preached, and the papists, by their cruelty to such as dissent from them, shewing to all, that there is no other way of defending themselves against them, than by using the same, almost every man is come to think he ought (as far as in him lies) to impose his belief on others, and that he can give no better testimony of his zeal, than the excess of his violence on that account. Nevertheless the cantons of the Switzers, tho' accompanied with all the most dangerous circumstances that can be imagined, being thirteen in number, independent on each other, governed in a high degree popularly, professing christianity differing in most important points; eight of them much influenced by the Jesuits, and perpetually excited to war against their brethren by the powerful crowns of Spain and France, have ever since they cast off the insupportable yoke of the earls of Hapsburg, enjoyed more peace than any other state of Europe, and, from the most inconsiderable people, are grown to such a power, that the greatest monarchs do most solicitously seek their friendship; and none have dared to invade them, since Charles duke of Burgundy did it to his ruin: and he who for a long time had been a terror to the great, dangerous, and subtle king of France, gave by the loss of three armies, and his own life, a lasting testimony of his temerity in assaulting a free and valiant, tho' a poor people, fighting in their own quarrel. Commynes well relates that war; but a vast heap of bones remaining to this day at Muret with this inscription, "Caroli fortissimi Burgundiorum ducis exercitus Muretum obsidens ab Helvetiis cæsus, hoc sui monumentum reliquit," best shews the success of it. Since that time their greatest wars have been for the defence of Milan; or such as they have undertaken for pay under the ensigns of France or Spain, that by the use of arms they may keep up that courage, reputation, and experience, which is required for the defence of their own country. No government was ever more free from popular seditions; the revolts of their subjects have been few, weak, and easily suppressed; the dissension raised by the Jesuits between the cantons of Zurich and Lucern was as soon composed as the rebellion of the country of Vaux against the canton of Bern; and those few of the like nature that have happened among them have had the like success: so that Thuanus, in the history of his time, comprehending about fifty years, and relating the horrid domestic and foreign wars that distracted Germany, France, Spain, Italy, Flanders, England, Scotland, Poland, Denmark, Sweden, Hungary, Transilvania, Muscovy, Turkey, Afric, and other places, has no more to say of them, than to shew what arts had been in vain used to disturb their so much envied quiet. But if the modest temper of the people, together with the wisdom, justice, and strength of their government, could not be discomposed by the measures of Spain and France, by the industry of their ambassadors, or the malicious craft of the Jesuits, we may safely

Y

CHAP. II. safely conclude, that their state is as well settled as any thing among men can be, and can hardly comprehend what is like to interrupt it. As much might be said of the cities of the Hanseatic society, if they had an intire sovereignty in themselves: but the cities of the United Provinces in the Low Countries, being every one of them sovereign within themselves, and many in number, still continuing in their union in spite of all the endeavours that have been used to divide them, give us an example of such steadiness in practice and principle, as is hardly to be paralleled in the world, and that undeniably proves a temper in their constitutions directly opposite to that which our author imputes to all popular governments: and if the death of Barnevelt and De Wit, or the preferment of some most unlike to them, be taken for a testimony that the best men thrive worst, and the worst best, I hope it may be considered that those violences proceeded from that which is most contrary to popularity, tho' I am not very willing to explain it.

If these matters are not clear in themselves, I desire they may be compared with what has happened between any princes that from the beginning of the world have been joined in league to each other, whether they were of the same or of different nations. Let an example be brought of six, thirteen, or more princes or kings, who entered into a league; and for the space of one or more ages, did neither break it, nor quarrel upon the explication of it. Let the states of the Switzers, Grisons, or Hollanders, be compared with that of France, when it was sometimes divided between two, three, or four brothers of Meroveus or Pepin's races; with the heptarchy of England; the kingdoms of Leon, Arragon, Navarre, Castile, and Portugal, under which the christians in Spain were divided; or those of Cordua, Sevil, Malaga, Granada, and others under the power of the Moors; and if it be not evident, that the popular states have been remarkable for peace among themselves, constancy to their union, and fidelity to the leagues made with their associates; whereas all the above-mentioned kingdoms, and such others as are known among men to have been joined in the like leagues, were ever infested with domestic rebellions and quarrels, rising from the ambition of princes, so as no confederacy could be so cautiously made, but they would find ways to elude it, or so solemn and sacred, but they would in far less time break through it: I will confess, that kingdoms have sometimes been as free from civil disturbances; and that leagues made between several princes have been as constantly and religiously observed, as by commonwealths. But if no such thing do appear in the world, and no man who is not impudent or ignorant dare pretend it, I may justly conclude, that tho' every commonwealth hath its action suitable to its constitution, and that many associated together are not so free from disturbances, as those that wholly depend upon the authority of a mother-city; yet we know of none that have not been, and are more regular and quiet than any principalities; and as to foreign wars, they seek or avoid them according to their various constitutions.

S E C T. XXIII.

That is the best government, which best provides for war.

OUR author, having huddled up all popular and mixed governments into one, has, in some measure, forced me to explain the various constitutions and principles upon which they are grounded: but as the wisdom of a father is seen, not only in providing bread for his family, or increasing his patrimonial estate, but in making all possible provision for the security of it; so that government is evidently the best, which, not relying upon what it does at first enjoy, seeks to increase the number, strength, and riches, of the people; and by the best discipline to bring the power so improved into such order as may be of most use to the public. This comprehends all things conducing to the administration of justice, the preservation of domestic peace, and the increase of commerce, that the people, being pleased with their present condition, may be filled with love to their country, encouraged to fight boldly for the public cause, which is their own; and as men do willingly join with that which prospers, that strangers may be invited to fix their habitations in such a city, and to espouse the principles that reign in it. This is necessary for several reasons; but I shall principally insist upon one, which is, that all things in their beginning are weak: the whelp of a lion newly born has neither strength nor fierceness. He that builds a city, and does not intend it should encrease, commits as great an absurdity, as if he should desire his child might ever continue under the same weakness in which he is born. If it do not grow, it must pine and perish; for in this world nothing is permanent; that which does not grow better will grow worse. This increase also is useless, or perhaps hurtful, if it be not in strength, as well as in riches, or number: for every one is apt to seize upon ill-guarded treasures; and the terror that the city of London was possessed with, when a few Dutch ships came to Chatham, shews, that no numbers of men, tho' naturally valiant, are able to defend themselves, unless they be well armed, disciplined, and conducted. Their multitude brings confusion: their wealth, when it is like to be made a prey, increases the fears of the owners; and they, who, if they were brought into good order, might conquer a great part of the world, being destitute of it, durst not think of defending themselves.

If it be said, that the wise father, mentioned by me, endeavours to secure his patrimony by law, not by force; I answer, that all defence terminates in force; and if a private man does not prepare to defend his estate with his own force, it is because he lives under the protection of the law, and expects the force of the magistrate should be a security to him: but kingdoms and commonwealths, acknowledging no superior, except God alone, can reasonably hope to be protected by him only; and by him,

CHAP. II. if with industry and courage they make use of the means he has given them for their own defence. God helps those who help themselves; and men are by several reasons (suppose to prevent the increase of a suspected power) induced to succour an industrious and brave people: but such as neglect the means of their own preservation, are ever left to perish with shame. Men cannot rely upon any league: the state that is defended by one potentate against another becomes a slave to the protector: mercenary soldiers always want fidelity or courage, and most commonly both. If they are not corrupted or beaten by the invader, they make a prey of their masters. These are the followers of camps, who have neither faith nor piety *, but prefer gain before right. They who expose their blood to sale, look where they can make the best bargain, and never fail of pretences for following their interests.

* —Ibi fas,
ubi maxima
merces.
Lucan.

Moreover, private families may by several arts increase their wealth, as they increase in number; but when a people multiplies (as they will always do in a good climate under a good government) such an enlargement of territory as is necessary for their subsistence can be acquired only by war. This was known to the northern nations that invaded the Roman empire; but for want of such constitutions as might best improve their strength and valour, the numbers they sent out when they were overburdened, provided well for themselves, but were of no use to the countries they left; and whilst those Goths, Vandals, Franks, and Normans, enjoyed the most opulent and delicious provinces of the world, their fathers languished obscurely in their frozen climates. For the like reasons, or through the same defect, the Switzers are obliged to serve other princes; and often to employ that valour in advancing the power of their neighbours, which might be used to increase their own. Genoa, Lucca, Geneva, and other small commonwealths, having no wars, are not able to nourish the men they breed; but sending many of their children to seek their fortunes abroad, scarce a third part of those that are born among them die in those cities; and if they did not take this course, they would have no better than the nations inhabiting near the river Niger, who sell their children as the increase of their flocks.

This does not less concern monarchies than commonwealths; nor the absolute less than the mixed: all of them have been prosperous or miserable, glorious or contemptible, as they were better or worse armed, disciplined, or conducted. The Assyrian valour was irresistible under Nabuchodonozor; but was brought to nothing under his base and luxurious grandson Belshazzar: the Persians, who under Cyrus conquered Asia, were like swine exposed to slaughter when their discipline failed, and they were commanded by his proud, cruel, and cowardly successors. The Macedonian army overthrown by Paulus Emilius was not less in number than that with which Alexander gained the empire of the east; and perhaps had not been inferior in valour, if it had been as well commanded. Many poor and almost unknown nations have been carried to such a height of glory by the bravery of their princes, that I might incline to think their government vernment as fit as any other for disciplining a people to war, if their virtues continued in their families, or could be transmitted to their successors. The impossibility of this is a breach never to be repaired; and no account is to be made of the good that is always certain, and seldom enjoyed. This disease is not only in absolute monarchies, but in those also where any regard is had to succession of blood, tho' under the strictest limitations. The fruit of all the victories gained by Edward the First and Third, or Henry the Fifth of England, perished by the baseness of their successors: the glory of our arms was turned into shame; and we, by the loss of treasure, blood, and territory, suffered the punishment of their vices. The effects of these changes are not always equally violent; but they are frequent, and must fall out as often as occasion is represented. It was not possible for Lewis the Thirteenth of France to pursue the great designs of Henry the Fourth: Christina of Sweden could not supply the place of her brave father; nor the present king in his infancy accomplish what the great Charles Gustavus had nobly undertaken: and no remedy can be found for this mortal infirmity, unless the power be put into the hands of those who are able to execute it, and not left to the blindness of fortune. When the regal power is committed to an annual or otherwise chosen magistracy, the virtues of excellent men are of use, but all does not depend upon their persons: one man finishes what another had begun; and when many are by practice rendered able to perform the same things, the loss of one is easily supplied by the election of another. When good principles are planted, they do not die with the person that introduced them; and good constitutions remain, tho' the authors of them perish. Rome did not fall back into slavery when Brutus was killed, who had led them to recover their liberty: others like to him pursued the same ends; and notwithstanding the loss of so many great commanders consumed in their almost continual wars, they never wanted such as were fit to execute whatever they could design. A well-governed state is as fruitful to all good purposes, as the seven-headed serpent is said to have been in evil; when one head is cut off, many rise up in the place of it. Good order being once established, makes good men; and as long as it lasts, such as are fit for the greatest employments will never be wanting. By this means the Romans could not be surprised: no king or captain ever invaded them, who did not find many excellent commanders to oppose him; whereas they themselves found it easy to overthrow kingdoms, tho' they had been established by the bravest princes, through the baseness of their successors.

But if our author say true, it is of no advantage to a popular state to have excellent men; and therefore he imposes "a necessity upon every people to " chuse the worst men for being the worst, and most like to themselves; lest
" that if virtuous and good men should come into power, they should be " excluded for being vicious and wicked, &c. Wise men would seize upon
" the state, and take it from the people." For the understanding of these words, it is good to consider whether they are to be taken simply, as usually applied to the devil, and some of his instruments, or relatively, as to the thing

CHAP. II. thing in question: if simply, it must be concluded, that Valerius, Brutus, Cincinnatus, Capitolinus, Mamercus, Paulus Emilius, Nafica, and others like to them, were not only the worst men of the city; but that they were so often advanced to the supreme magistracies because they were so: if in the other sense relating to magistracy, and the command of armies, the worst are the most ignorant, unfaithful, slothful, or cowardly; and our author to make good his proposition, must prove, that when the people of Rome, Carthage, Athens, and other states, had the power of chusing whom they pleased, they did chuse Camillus, Corvinus, Torquatus, Fabius, Rullus, Scipio, Amilcar, Hannibal, Asdrubal, Pelopidas, Epaminondas, Pericles, Aristides, Themistocles, Phocion, Alcibiades, and others like to them, for their ignorance, infidelity, sloth, and cowardice; and on account of those vices, most like to those who chose them. But if these were the worst, I desire to know what wit or eloquence can describe or comprehend the excellency of the best; or of the discipline that brings whole nations to such perfection, that worse than these could not be found among them? And if they were not so, but such as all succeeding ages have justly admired for their wisdom, virtue, industry, and valour, the impudence of so wicked and false an assertion ought to be rejected with scorn and hatred.

But if all governments, whether monarchical or popular, absolute or limited, deserve praise or blame as they are well or ill constituted for making war; and that the attainment of this end do intirely depend upon the qualifications of the commanders, and the strength, courage, number, affection, and temper of the people out of which the armies are drawn; those governments must necessarily be the best which take the best care that those armies may be well commanded; and so provide for the good of the people, that they may daily increase in number, courage, and strength, and be so satisfied with the present state of things, as to fear a change, and fight for the preservation or advancement of the public interest as of their own. We have already found, that in hereditary monarchies no care at all is taken of the commander: he is not chosen, but comes by chance; and does not only frequently prove defective, but for the most part utterly incapable of performing any part of his duty; whereas in popular governments excellent men are generally chosen; and there are so many of them, that if one or more perish, others are ready to supply their places. And this discourse having (if I mistake not) in the whole series, shewn, that the advantages of popular governments, in relation to the increase of courage, number, and strength in a people, out of which armies are to be formed, and bringing them to such a temper as prepares them bravely to perform their duty, are as much above those of monarchies, as the prudence of choice surpasses the accidents of birth; it cannot be denied, that in both respects the part which relates to war is much better performed in popular governments than in monarchies.

That which we are by reason led to believe, is confirmed to us by experience. We every-where see the difference between the courage of men fighting for themselves, and their posterity, and those that serve a master who by good success is often rendered insupportable. This is of such efficacy, ficacy, that no king could ever boast to have overthrown any considerable SECT. 23.

commonwealth, unless it were divided within itself, or weakened by wars made with such as were also free; which was the case of the Grecian commonwealths, when the Macedonians fell in upon them: whereas the greatest kingdoms have been easily destroyed by commonwealths; and these also have lost all strength, and valour, and spirit, after the change of their government. The power and virtue of the Italians grew up, decayed, and perished, with their liberty. When they were divided into many commonwealths, every one of them was able to send out great armies, and to suffer many defeats before they were subdued; so that their cities were delivered up by the old men, women, and children, when all those who were able to bear arms had been slain: and when they were all brought under the Romans, either as associates or subjects, they made the greatest strength that ever was in the world.

Alexander of Epirus was in valour thought equal, and in power little inferior, to Alexander of Macedon: but having the fortune to attack those who had been brought up in liberty, taught to hazard or suffer all things for it, and to think that God has given to men hands and swords only to defend it, he perished in his attempt; whilst the other encountering slavish nations, under the conduct of proud, cruel, and for the most part unwarlike tyrants, became master of Asia.

Pyrrhus seems to have been equal to either of them; but the victories he obtained by an admirable valour and conduct, cost him so dear, that he desired peace with those enemies who might be defeated, not subdued.

Hannibal, wanting the prudence of Pyrrhus, lost the fruits of all his victories; and being torn out of Italy, where he had nested himself, fell under the sword of those whose fathers he had defeated or slain; and died a banished man from his ruined country.

The Gauls did once bring Rome, when it was small, to the brink of destruction; but they left their carcases to pay for the mischiefs they had done;
and in succeeding times their invasions were mentioned as tumults rather than wars.

The Germans did perhaps surpass them in numbers and strength, and were equal to them in fortune as long as Rome was free. They often entered Italy; but they continued not long there, unless under the weight of their chains; whereas the same nations, and others like to them, assaulting that country, or other provinces under the emperors, found no other difficulty than what did arise upon contests among themselves who should be master of them. No manly virtue or discipline remained among the Italians:
those who governed them, relied upon tricks and shifts; they who could not defend themselves, hired some of those nations to undertake their quarrels against others. These trinklings could not last: the Goths, scorning to depend upon those who in valour and strength were much inferior to themselves, seized upon the city that had commanded the world, whilst Honorius was so busy in providing for his hens, that he could not think of defending it.
Arcadius had the luck not to lose his principal city; but passing his time among

CHAP. II. among fidlers, players, eunuchs, cooks, dancers, and buffoons, the provinces were securely plundered and ransacked by nations, that are known only from their victories against him.

It is in vain to say, that this proceeded from the fatal corruption of that age; for that corruption proceeded from the government, and the ensuing desolation was the effect of it. And as the like disorder in government has been ever since in Greece, and the greatest part of Italy, those countries, which for extent, riches, convenience of situation, and numbers of men, are equal to the best in the world, and for the wit, courage, and industry of the natives, perhaps justly preferable to any, have since that time been always exposed as a prey to the first invader. Charles the Eighth of France is by Guicciardin, and other writers, represented as a prince equally weak in body, mind, money, and forces: but as an ill hare is said to make a good dog, he conquered the best part of Italy without breaking a lance. Ferdinand and Alphonso of Arragon, kings of Naples, had governed by trepanners, false witnesses, corrupt judges, mercenary soldiers, and other ministers of iniquity; but these could afford no help against an invader; and neither the oppressed nobility, nor people, concerning themselves in the quarrel, they who had been proud, fierce, and cruel, against their poor subjects, never durst look an enemy in the face; and the father dying with anguish and fear, the son shamefully fled from his ill governed kingdom.

The same things are no less evident in Spain. No people ever defended themselves with more obstinacy and valour than the Spaniards did against the Carthaginians and Romans, who surpassed them in wealth and skill. Livy calls them "gentem ad bella gerenda & reparanda natam," and who generally killed themselves when they were mastered and disarmed, "nullam sine armis vitam esse rati." But tho' the mixture of Roman blood could not impair their race, and the conjunction of the Goths had improved their force; yet no more was required for the overthrow of them all, than the weakness and baseness of the two lewd tyrants Witza and Rodrigo, who disdained all laws, and resolved to govern according to their lust. They who for more than two hundred years had resisted the Romans, were intirely subdued by the vile, half-naked Moors, in one slight skirmish; and do not to this day know what became of the king who brought the destruction upon them. That kingdom after many revolutions is with many others come to the house of Austria, and enjoys all the wealth of the Indies; whereupon they are thought to have affected an universal monarchy. "Sed ut sunt levia aulicorum ingenia," this was grounded upon nothing except their own vanity: they had money and craft; but, wanting that solid virtue and strength, which makes and preserves conquests, their kings have nothing but Milan that did not come to them by marriage: and tho' they have not received any extraordinary disasters in war, yet they languish and consume through the defects of their own government, and are forced to beg assistance from their mortal and formerly despised enemies. These are the best hopes of defence that they have from abroad; and the only enemy an invader ought to fear in their desolate territories, is that want and famine which which testifies the good order, strength, and stability of our author's divine SECT. 23.

monarchy; the profound wisdom of their kings in subtilly finding out so sure a way of defending the country; their paternal care in providing for the good of their subjects; and that whatsoever is defective in the prince, is assuredly supplied by the sedulity of a good council.

We have already said enough to obviate the objections that may be drawn from the prosperity of the French monarchy. The beauty of it is false and painted. There is a rich and haughty king, who is blessed with such neighbours as are not likely to disturb him, and has nothing to fear from his miserable subjects; but the whole body of that state is full of boils, and wounds, and putrid sores: there is no real strength in it. The people are so unwilling to serve him, that he is said to have put to death above fourscore thousand of his own soldiers within the space of fifteen years, for flying from their colours; and if he were vigorously attacked, little help could be expected from a discontented nobility, or a starving and despairing people. If to diminish the force of these arguments and examples, it be said, that in two or three thousand years all things are changed; the antient virtue of mankind is extinguished; and the love that every one had to his country is turned into a care of his private interests: I answer, that time changes nothing, and the changes produced in this time proceed only from the change of governments. The nations which have been governed arbitrarily, have always suffered the same plagues, and been infected with the same vices; which is as natural, as for animals ever to generate according to their kinds, and fruits to be of the same nature with the roots and seeds from which they come. The same order that made men valiant and industrious in the service of their country during the first ages, would have the same effect, if it were now in being: men would have the same love to the public as the Spartans and Romans had, if there was the same reason for it. We need no other proof of this than what we have seen in our own country, where, in a few years, good discipline, and a just encouragement given to those who did well, produced more examples of pure, complete, incorruptible, and invincible virtue than Rome or Greece could ever boast; or if more be wanting, they may easily be found among the Switzers, Hollanders, and others: but it is not necessary to light a candle to the sun.

S E C T. XXIV.

Popular governments are less subject to civil disorders than monarchies; manage them more ably, and more easily recover out of them.

IT is in vain to seek a government in all points free from a possibility of civil wars, tumults, and seditions: that is a blessing denied to this life, and reserved to complete the felicity of the next. But if these are to be accounted the greatest evils that can fall upon a people, the rectitude or defects of governments will best appear, if we examine which species is more or less exposed to or exempted from them.

This may be done two ways.

1. By searching into the causes from whence they may or usually do arise.
2. Which kind has actually been most frequently and dangerously disturbed by them.

To the first: seditions, tumults, and wars, do arise from mistake, or from malice; from just occasions, or unjust: from mistake, when a people thinks an evil to be done or intended, which is not done nor intended, or takes that to be evil which is done, tho' in truth it be not so. Well regulated cities may fall into these errors. The Romans being jealous of their newly recovered liberty, thought that Valerius Publicola designed to make himself king, when he built a house in a place that seemed too strong and eminent for a private man. The Spartans were not less suspicious of Lycurgus; and a lewd young fellow in a sedition put out one of his eyes: but no people ever continued in a more constant affection to their best deserving citizens, than both the Romans and Spartans afterwards manifested to those virtuous and wrongfully suspected men.

Sometimes the fact is true, but otherwise understood than was intended. When the Tarquins were expelled from Rome, the patricians retained to themselves the principal magistracies; but never thought of bringing back kings, or of setting up a corrupt oligarchy among themselves, as the plebeians imagined: and this mistake being discovered, the fury they had conceived, vanished; and they who seemed to intend nothing less than the extirpation of all the patrician families, grew quiet. Menenius Agrippa appeased one of the most violent seditions that ever happened amongst them (till civil interests were pursued by armed troops) with a fable of the several parts of the body that murmured against the belly: and the most dangerous of all was composed by creating tribunes to protect them. Some of the patrician young men had favoured the decemviri, and others being unwilling to appear against them, the people believed they had all conspired with those new tyrants: but Valerius and Horatius putting themselves at the head of those who fought their their destruction, they perceived their error, and looked upon the patricians SECT. 24. as the best defenders of their liberties: "et inde," says Livy, "auram libertatis captare, unde servitutem timuissent." Democratical governments are most liable to these mistakes: in aristocracies they are seldom seen, and we hear of none in Sparta after the establishment of the laws by Lycurgus; but absolute monarchies seem to be totally exempted from them. The mischiefs designed are often dissembled or denied, till they are past all possibility of being cured by any other way than force: and such as are by necessity driven to use that remedy, know they must perfect their work, or perish. He that draws his sword against the prince, say the French, ought to throw away the scabbard; for tho' the design be never so just, yet the authors are sure to be ruined if it miscarry. Peace is seldom made, and never kept, unless the subject retain such a power in his hands, as may oblige the prince to stand to what is agreed; and in time some trick is found to deprive them of that benefit.

Seditions proceeding from malice are seldom or never seen in popular governments; for they are hurtful to the people, and none have ever willingly and knowingly hurt themselves. There may be, and often is malice in those who excite them; but the people is ever deceived, and whatsoever is thereupon done, ought to be imputed to error, as I said before. If this be discovered in time, it usually turns to the destruction of the contriver; as in the cases of Manlius Capitolinus, Spurius Melius, and Sp. Cassius: if not, for the most part it produces a tyranny, as in those of Agathocles, Dionysius, Pisistratus, and Cæsar. But in absolute monarchies, almost all the troubles that arise, proceed from malice; they cannot be reformed, the extinction of them is exceeding difficult, if they have continued long enough to corrupt the people; and those who appear against them, seek only to set up themselves, or their friends. Thus we see, that in the civil wars of the east, the question was, whether Artaxerxes or Cyrus, Phraartes or Bardanes, should reign over the Persians and Parthians: the people suffered equally from both whilst the contests lasted; and the decision left them under the power of a proud and cruel master. The like is seen in all places. After the death of Brutus and Cassius, no war was ever undertaken in the Roman empire upon a better account than one man's private concernments: the provinces suffered under all; and he, whom they had assisted to overthrow one wicked tyrant, very often proved worse than his predecessor. And the only ground of all the dissensions with which France was vexed under the princes of Meroveus and Pepin's races, were, which of them should reign, the people remaining miserable under them all.

The case is not much different in mixed monarchies: some wars may be undertaken upon a just and public account, but the pretences are commonly false: a lasting reformation is hardly introduced, an intire change often disliked. And tho' such kingdoms are frequently and terribly distracted, as appears by the before-mentioned examples of England, Spain, &c. the quarrels are, for the most part, begun upon personal titles, as between Henry the First and Robert; Stephen and Maud; or the houses of Lancaster and

CHAP. II. York: and the people who get nothing by the victory which way soever it fall, and might therefore prudently leave the competitors to decide their own quarrels, like Theorestes and Polinices, with their own swords, become cruelly engaged in them.

It may seem strange to some that I mention seditions, tumults, and wars, upon just occasions; but I can find no reason to retract the term. God intending that men should live justly with one another, does certainly intend, that he or they who do no wrong, should suffer none; and the law that forbids injuries, were of no use, if no penalty might be inflicted on those that will not obey it. If injustice therefore be evil, and injuries forbidden, they are also to be punished; and the law instituted for their prevention must necessarily intend the avenging of such as cannot be prevented. The work of the magistracy is to execute this law; the sword of justice is put into their hands to restrain the fury of those within the society who will not be a law to themselves; and the sword of war to protect the people against the violence of foreigners. This is without exception, and would be in vain if it were not. But the magistrate, who is to protect the people from injury, may, and is often known not to have done it: he sometimes renders his office useless by neglecting to do justice; sometimes mischievous by overthrowing it. This strikes at the root of God's general ordinance, that there should be laws; and the particular ordinances of all societies that appoint such as seem best to them. The magistrate therefore is comprehended under both, and subject to both, as well as private men.

The ways of preventing or punishing injuries are judicial or extrajudicial. Judicial proceedings are of force against those who submit or may be brought to trial, but are of no effect against those who resist, and are of such power that they cannot be constrained. It were absurd to cite a man to appear before a tribunal who can awe the judges, or has armies to defend him; and impious to think, that he who has added treachery to his other crimes, and usurped a power above the law, should be protected by the enormity of his wickedness. Legal proceedings therefore are to be used when the delinquent submits to the law; and all are just, when he will not be kept in order by the legal.

The word sedition is generally applied to all numerous assemblies; without or against the authority of the magistrate, or of those who assume that power. Athaliah and Jezebel were more ready to cry out treason than David; and examples of that sort are so frequent, that I need not alledge them.

Tumult is from the disorderly manner of those assemblies, where things can seldom be done regularly; and war is that "decertatio per vim," or trial by force, to which men come when other ways are ineffectual.

If the laws of God and men are therefore of no effect, when the magistracy is left at liberty to break them; and if the lusts of those who are too strong for the tribunals of justice, cannot be otherwise restrained than by sedition, tumults, and war, those seditions, tumults, and wars, are justified by the laws of God and man.

I will

I will not take upon me to enumerate all the cases in which this may be done, but content myself with three, which have most frequently given occasion for proceedings of this kind. SECT. 24.

The first is, When one or more men take upon them the power and name of a magistracy, to which they are not justly called.

The second, When one or more, being justly called, continue in their magistracy longer than the laws by which they are called do prescribe.

And the third, When he or they who are rightly called, do assume a power, tho' within the time prescribed, that the law does not give; or turn that which the law does give, to an end different and contrary to that which is intended by it.

For the first; Filmer forbids us to examine titles: he tells us, we must submit to the power, whether acquired by usurpation or otherwise, not observing the mischievous absurdity of rewarding the most detestable villainies with the highest honours, and rendering the veneration due to the supreme magistrate as father of the people, to one who has no other advantage above his brethren, than what he has gained by injuriously dispossessing or murdering him that was so. Hobbes, fearing the advantages that may be taken from such desperate nonsense, or not thinking it necessary to his end to carry the matter so far, has no regard at all to him who comes in without title or consent; and, denying him to be either king or tyrant, gives him no other name than "hostis & latro;" and allows all things to be lawful against him, that may be done to a public enemy or pirate: which is as much as to say, any man may destroy him how he can. Whatever he may be guilty of in other respects, he does in this follow the voice of mankind, and the dictates of common sense: for no man can make himself a magistrate for himself; and no man can have the right of a magistrate, who is not a magistrate. If he be justly accounted an enemy to all, who injures all; he above all must be the public enemy of a nation, who, by usurping a power over them, does the greatest and most public injury that a people can suffer: for which reason, by an established law among the most virtuous nations, every man might kill a tyrant; and no names are recorded in history with more honour, than of those who did it. De Civ. l. ii.

These are by other authors called "tyranni sine titulo:" and that name is given to all those who obtain the supreme power by illegal and unjust means. The laws which they overthrow can give them no protection; and every man is a soldier against him who is a public enemy.

The same rule holds, tho' they are more in number; as the magi, who usurped the dominion of Persia after the death of Cambyfes; the thirty tyrants at Athens overthrown by Thrasylbulus; those of Thebes slain by Pelopidas; the decemviri of Rome, and others: for tho' the multitude of offenders may sometimes procure impunity, yet that act which is wicked in one, must be so in ten or twenty; and whatsoever is lawful against one usurper, is so against them all.

2. If those who were rightly created, continue beyond the time limited by the law, it is the same thing. That which is expired, is as if it had never been. He that was created consul for a year, or dictator for six months,

CHAP. II. months, was after that a private man; and if he had continued in the exercise of his magistracy, had been subject to the same punishment as if he had usurped it at the first. This was known to Epaminondas, who finding that his enterprize against Sparta could not be accomplished within the time for which he was made Bœotarches, rather chose to trust his countrymen with his life than to desist; and was saved merely through an admiration of his virtue, assurance of his good intentions, and the glory of the action.

The Roman decemviri, tho' duly elected, were proceeded against as private men usurping the magistracy, when they continued beyond their time. Other magistrates had ceased; there was none that could regularly call the senate or people to an assembly: but when their ambition was manifest, and the people exasperated by the death of Virginia, they laid aside all ceremonies. The senate and people met; and, exercising their authority in the same manner as if they had been regularly called by the magistrate appointed to that end, they abrogated the power of the decemviri, proceeded against them as enemies and tyrants, and by that means preserved themselves from utter ruin.

3. The same course is justly used against a legal magistrate, who takes upon him (tho' within the time prescribed by the law) to exercise a power which the law does not give; for in that respect he is a private man, "quia," as Grotius says, "eatenus non habet imperium;" and may be restrained as well as any other, because he is not set up to do what he lists, but what the law appoints for the good of the people; and as he has no other power than what the law allows, so the same law limits and directs the exercise of that which he has. This right, naturally belonging to nations, is no-way impaired by the name of supreme given to their magistrates; for it signifies no more, than that they do act sovereignly in the matters committed to their charge. Thus are the parliaments of France called "cours souveraines;" for they judge of life and death, determine controversies concerning estates; and there is no appeal from their decrees: but no man ever thought, that it was therefore lawful for them to do what they pleased; or that they might not be opposed, if they should attempt to do that which they ought not. And tho' the Roman dictators and consuls were supreme magistrates, they were subject to the people, and might be punished, as well as others, if they transgressed the law. Thuanus carries the word so far, that when Barlotta, Giustiniano, and others who were but colonels, were sent as commanders in chief of three or four thousand men upon an enterprize, he always says, "Summum imperium ei delatum." Grotius explains, this point, by distinguishing those who have the "summum imperium summo modo," from those who have it "modo non summo." I know not where to find an example of this sovereign power, enjoyed without restriction, under a better title than "occupation;" which relates not to our purpose, who seek only that which is legal and just. Therefore, laying aside that point for the present, we may follow Grotius in examining the right of those who are certainly limited: "Ubi partem imperii habet rex, partem senatus five populus;" in which case he says, "Regi in partem non suam involanti, vis" "justa

“justa opponi potest,” inasmuch as they who have a part, cannot but have a SECT. 24.
 right of defending that part; “quia, data facultate, datur jus facultatem tuen- “di,” without which it could be of no effect.

The particular limits of the rights belonging to each, can only be judged by the precise letter, or general intention of the law. The dukes of Venice have certainly a part in the government, and could not be called magistrates, if they had not. They are said to be supreme; all laws and public acts bear their names. The ambassador of the state speaking to pope Paul the 5th, Thuan. l.
 denied that he acknowledged any other superior than God. But they are so cxxxvii.
 well known to be under the power of the law, that divers of them have been put to death for transgressing it; and a marble gallows is seen at the foot of the stairs in St. Mark's palace, upon which some of them, and no others, have been executed. But if they may be duly opposed, when they commit undue acts, no man of judgement will deny, that if one of them by an outrageous violence should endeavour to overthrow the law, he might by violence be suppressed and chastised.

Again, some magistrates are entrusted with a power of providing ships, arms, ammunition, and victuals for war; raising and disciplining soldiers, appointing officers to command in forts and garisons, and making leagues with foreign princes and states. But if one of these should imbezel, sell or give to an enemy those ships, arms, ammunition, or provisions; betray the forts; employ only, or principally, such men as will serve him in those wicked actions; and, contrary to the trust reposed in him, make such leagues with foreigners, as tend to the advancement of his personal interests, and to the detriment of the public; he abrogates his own magistracy; and the right he had, perishes (as the lawyers say) “frustratione finis.” He cannot be protected by the law which he has overthrown, nor obtain impunity for the crimes from his authority that was conferred upon him, only that he might do good with it. He was “singulis major,” on account of the excellence of his office; but “universis minor,” from the nature and end of the institution. The surest way of extinguishing his prerogative, was by turning it to the hurt of those who gave it. When matters are brought to this posture, the author of the mischief, or the nation, must perish. A flock cannot subsist under a shepherd that seeks its ruin, nor a people under an unfaithful magistrate. Honour and riches are justly heaped upon the heads of those who rightly perform their duty, because the difficulty as well as the excellency of the work is great. It requires courage, experience, industry, fidelity, and wisdom. The good shepherd, says our Saviour, lays down his life for his sheep: the hireling who flies in time of danger, is represented under an ill character; but he that sets himself to destroy his flock, is a wolf. His authority is incompatible with their subsistence; and whoever disapproves tumults, seditions, or war, by which he may be removed from it, if gentler means are ineffectual, subverts the foundation of all law; exalts the fury of one man to the destruction, of a nation; and giving an irresistible power to the most abominable iniquity, exposes all that are good to be destroyed, and virtue to be utterly extinguished.

Few

CHAP. II. Few will allow such a pre-eminence to the dukes of Venice or Genoa, the advoyers of Switzerland, or the burgomasters of Amsterdam. Many will say these are rascals if they prove false, and ought rather to be hanged, than suffered to accomplish the villainies they design. But if this be confessed in relation to the highest magistrates that are among those nations, why should not the same be in all others, by what name soever they are called? When did God confer upon those nations the extraordinary privilege of providing better for their own safety than others? Or was the gift universal, tho' the benefit accrue only to those who have banished great titles from among them? If this be so, it is not their felicity, but their wisdom, that we ought to admire and imitate. But why should any think their ancestors had not the same care? Have not they, who retained in themselves a power over a magistrate of one name, the like over another? Is there a charm in words, or any name of such efficacy, that he who receives it should immediately become master of those that created him, whereas all others do remain for ever subject to them? Would the Venetian government change its nature, if they should give the name of king to their prince? Are the Polanders less free since the title of king is conferred upon their dukes; or are the Moscovites less slaves, because their chief magistrate has no other than that of duke? If we examine things but a little, it will appear, that magistrates have enjoyed large powers, who never had the name of kings; and none were ever more restrained by laws than those of Sparta, Arragon, the Goths in Spain, Hungary, Bohemia, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, and others, who had that title. There is therefore no such thing as a right universally belonging to a name; but every one enjoys that which the laws, by which he is, confer upon him. The law that gives the power, regulates it; and they who give no more than what they please, cannot be obliged to suffer him to whom they give it, to take more than they thought fit to give, or to go unpunished if he do. The agreements made are always confirmed by oath, and the treachery of violating them is consequently aggravated by perjury. They are good philosophers, and able divines, who think this can create a right to those who had none; or that the laws can be a protection to such as overthrow them, and give opportunity of doing the mischiefs they design. If it do not, then he that was a magistrate, by such actions returns into the condition of a private man; and whatever is lawful against a thief, who submits to no law, is lawful against him.

Men who delight in cavils, may ask, Who shall be the judge of these occasions? and whether I intend to give to the people the decision of their own cause? To which I answer, that when the contest is between the magistrate and the people, the party to which the determination is referred, must be the judge of his own case; and the question is only, Whether the magistrate should depend upon the judgment of the people, or the people on that of the magistrate; and which is most to be suspected of injustice: that is, whether the people of Rome should judge Tarquin, or Tarquin judge the people. He that knew all good men abhorred him for the murder of his wife, brother, father-in-law, and the best of the senate, would certainly strike strike off the heads of the most eminent remaining poppies; and having incurred the general hatred of the people by the wickedness of his government, he feared revenge; and endeavouring to destroy those he feared (that is the city) he might easily have accomplished his work, if the judgment had been referred to him. If the people judge Tarquin, it is hard to imagine how they should be brought to give an unjust sentence: they loved their former kings, and hated him only for his villainies: they did not fancy, but know his cruelty. When the best were slain, no man that any-way resembled them could think himself secure. Brutus did not pretend to be a fool, till, by the murder of his brother, he found how dangerous a thing it was to be thought wise. If the people, as our author says, be always lewd, foolish, mad, wicked, and desirous to put the power into the hands of such as are most like to themselves, he and his sons were such men as they sought, and he was sure to find favourable judges: if virtuous and good, no injustice was to be feared from them, and he could have no other reason to decline their judgment, than what was suggested by his own wickedness. Caligula, Nero, Domitian, and the like, had probably the same considerations: but no man of common sense ever thought that the senate and people of Rome did not better deserve to judge, whether such monsters should reign over the best part of mankind to their destruction, than they to determine whether their crimes should be punished or not.

If I mention some of these known cases, every man's experience will suggest others of the like nature; and whosoever condemns all seditions, tumults, and wars, raised against such princes, must say, that none are wicked, or seek the ruin of their people, which is absurd; for Caligula wished the people had but one neck, that he might cut it off at a blow: Nero set the city on fire; and we have known such as have been worse than either of them: they must either be suffered to continue in the free exercise of their rage, that is, to do all the mischief they design; or must be restrained by a legal, judicial, or extrajudicial way; and they who disallow the extrajudicial, do as little like the judicial. They will not hear of bringing a supreme magistrate before a tribunal, when it may be done. "They will," says our author, "depose their kings." Why should they not be deposed, if they become enemies to their people, and set up an interest in their own persons inconsistent with the public good, for the promoting of which they were erected? If they were created by the public consent, for the public good, shall they not be removed when they prove to be of public damage? If they set up themselves, may they not be thrown down? Shall it be lawful for them to usurp a power over the liberty of others, and shall it not be lawful for an injured people to resume their own? If injustice exalt itself, must it be forever established? Shall great persons be rendered sacred by rapine, perjury, and murder? Shall the crimes for which private men do justly suffer the most grievous punishments, exempt them from all, who commit them in the highest excess, with most power, and most to the prejudice of mankind? Shall the laws that solely aim at the prevention of crimes be made to patronize them, and become snares to the innocent, whom they ought to protect? Has every

CHAP. II. man given up into the common store his right of avenging the injuries he may receive, that the public power, which ought to protect or avenge him, should be turned to the destruction of himself, his posterity, and the society into which they enter, without any possibility of redress? Shall the ordinance of God be rendered of no effect; or the powers he hath appointed to be set up for the distribution of justice, be made subservient to the lusts of one or a few men, and by impunity encourage them to commit all manner of crimes? Is the corruption of man's nature so little known, that such as have common sense should expect justice from those, who fear no punishment if they do injustice; or that the modesty, integrity, and innocence, which is seldom found in one man, tho' never so cautiously chosen, should be constantly found in all those who by any means attain to greatness, and continue for ever in their successors; or that there can be any security under their government, if they have them not? Surely if this were the condition of men living under government, forests would be more safe than cities; and it were better for every man to stand in his own defence, than to enter into societies. He that lives alone might encounter such as should assault him upon equal terms, and stand or fall according to the measure of his courage and strength; but no valour can defend him, if the malice of his enemy be upheld by a public power. There must therefore be a right of proceeding judicially or extrajudicially against all persons who transgress the laws; or else those laws, and the societies that should subsist by them, cannot stand; and the ends for which governments are constituted, together with the governments themselves, must be overthrown. Extrajudicial proceedings, by sedition, tumult, or war, must take place, when the persons concerned are of such power, that they cannot be brought under the judicial. They who deny this, deny all help against an usurping tyrant, or the perfidiousness of a lawfully created magistrate, who adds the crimes of ingratitude and treachery to usurpation. These of all men are the most dangerous enemies to supreme magistrates: for as no man desires indemnity for such crimes as are never committed, he that would exempt all from punishment, supposes they will be guilty of the worst; and by concluding, that the people will depose them if they have the power, acknowledge, that they pursue an interest annexed to their persons, contrary to that of their people, which they would not bear if they could deliver themselves from it. This shewing all those governments to be tyrannical, lays such a burden upon those who administer them, as must necessarily weigh them down to destruction.

If it be said, that the word sedition implies that which is evil; I answer, that it ought not then to be applied to those who seek nothing but that which is just; and tho' the ways of delivering an oppressed people from the violence of a wicked magistrate, who has armed a crew of lewd villains, and fattened them with the blood and confiscations of such as were most ready to oppose him, be extraordinary, the inward righteousness of the act doth fully justify the authors. "He that has virtue and power to save a people, can never want a right of doing it." Valerius Asiaticus had no hand in the death of Caligula; but when the furious guards began tumultuously to inquire inquire who had killed him, he appeased them with wishing he had been the man. No wise man ever asked by what authority Thraſybulus, Harmodius, Aristogiton, Pelopidas, Epaminondas, Dion, Timoleon, Lucius Brutus, Publicola, Horatius, Valerius, Marcus Brutus, C. Caſſius, and the like, delivered their countries from tyrants. Their actions carried in themselves their own justification, and their virtues will never be forgotten whilst the names of Greece and Rome are remembered in the world. SECT. 24.

Utinam fecis-
sem (a). Tac.

If this be not enough to declare the justice inherent in, and the glory that ought to accompany these works, the examples of Moses, Aaron, Othniel, Ehud, Barak, Gideon, Samuel, Jephthah, David, Jehu, Jehoiada, the Maccabees, and other holy men raised up by God for the deliverance of his people from their oppressors, decide the question. They are perpetually renowned for having led the people by extraordinary ways (which such as our author expresses under the names of sedition, tumult, and war) to recover their liberties, and avenge the injuries received from foreign or domestic tyrants. The work of the apostles was not in their time to set up or pull down any civil state; but they so behaved themselves in relation to all the powers of the earth, that they gained the name of pestilent, seditious fellows, disturbers of the peace; and left it as an inheritance to those, who, in succeeding ages, by following their steps, should deserve to be called their successors; whereby they were exposed to the hatred of corrupt magistrates, and brought under the necessity of perishing by them, or defending themselves against them; and he that denies them that right, does at once condemn the most glorious actions of the wisest, best, and holiest men that have been in the world, together with the laws of God and man, upon which they were founded.

Nevertheless, there is a sort of sedition, tumult, and war, proceeding from malice, which is always detestable, aiming only at the satisfaction of private lust, without regard to the public good. This cannot happen in a popular government, unless it be amongst the rabble; or when the body of the people is so corrupted, that it cannot stand; but is most frequent in, and natural to, absolute monarchies. When Abimilech desired to make himself king, he raised a tumult among the basest of the people: he hired light and vain persons, some translations call them lewd vagabonds, killed his brethren, but perished in his design; the corrupt party that favoured him not having strength enough to subdue the other, who were more sincere. * Sp. Melius, † Sp. Caſſius, and ‡ Manlius, attempted the like in Rome: they acted maliciously, their pretences to procure the public good were false. It is probable, that some in the city were as bad as they, and knew that mischief was intended; but the body of the people not being corrupted, they were suppressed. It appeared, says Livy, “nihil esse minus

A a 2

“populare

(a) This is not told any-where, I believe, in Tacitus. The whole life of Caligula, and the beginning of Claudius's reign, are lost. The sixth book of his Annals finishes with the death of Tiberius, and the eleventh opens with an account of this Valerius Asiaticus in the time of Claudius. The fact is told by Dion Caſſius, at the end of his 59th book.

CHAP. II. "populare quam regnum:" they who had favoured Manlius, condemned him to death, when it was proved, that "egregias alioqui virtutes fœda regni cupidine maculâſſet." But when the people is generally corrupted, such designs seldom miscarry, and the success is always the erection of a tyranny. Nothing else can please vain and profligate persons, and no tyranny was ever set up by such as were better qualified. The ways of attaining it have always been by corrupting the manners of the people, bribing soldiers, entertaining mercenary strangers, opening prisons, giving liberty to slaves, alluring indigent persons with hopes of abolishing debts, coming to a new division of lands, and the like. Seditions raised by such men always tend to the ruin of popular governments; but when they happen under absolute monarchies, the hurt intended is only to the person, who being removed, the promoters of them set up another; and he that is set up, subsisting only by the strength of those who made him, is obliged to foment the vices that drew them to serve him; tho' another may perhaps make use of the same against him.

The consequence of this is, that those who uphold popular governments, look upon vice and indigence as mischiefs that naturally increase each other, and equally tend to the ruin of the state. When men are by vice brought into want, they are ready for mischief: there is no villainy that men of profligate lives, lost reputation, and desperate fortunes, will not undertake. Popular equality is an enemy to these; and they who would preserve it must preserve integrity of manners, sobriety, and an honest contentedness with what the law allows. On the other side, the absolute monarch, who will have no other law than his own will, desires to increase the number of those who through lewdness and beggary may incline to depend upon him; tho' the same temper of mind, and condition of fortune, prepare them also for such seditions as may bring him into danger; and the same corruption which led them to set him up, may invite them to sell him to another that will give them better wages.

I do not by this conclude, that all monarchs are vicious men; but that whoever will set up an absolute power, must do it by these means; and that if such a power be already established, and should fall into the hands of a person, who by his virtue, and the gentleness of his nature, should endeavour to render the yoke so easy, that a better disciplined people might be contented to bear it; yet this method could last no longer than his life, and probably would be a means to shorten it; that which was at first established by evil arts always returning to the same: that which was vicious in the principle, can never be long upheld by virtue; and we see, that the worst of the Roman emperors were not in greater danger from such good men as remained undestroyed, than the best from the corrupt party that would not be corrected, and sought such a master as would lay no restriction upon their vices. Those few who escaped the rage of these villains, only gave a little breathing-time to the afflicted world, which by their children or successors was again plunged into that extremity of misery, from which they intended to deliver it.

An extraordinary virtue was required to keep a prince in a way contrary to SECT. 24.
the principles of his own government; which being rarely found, and never continued long in a family or succession of men, the endeavours of the best became ineffectual, and either they themselves perished in them, or after their death all things returned into the old polluted channel.

Tho' the power of the Hebrew kings was not unlimited, yet it exceeded the rule set by God, and was sufficient to increase the number of the worst of men, and to give them opportunities of raising perpetual disturbances. On the king's side there were flatterers and instruments of mischief: on the other side there were indebted and discontented persons. Notwithstanding the justice of David's cause, the wisdom, valour, and piety of his person, none would follow him, except a few of his own kindred (who knew what God had promised to him), and such as were uneasy in their worldly circumstances. After the death of Saul there was a long and bloody war between Ishbosheth and David. The former being killed, the slightest matters were sufficient to put the whole nation into blood. Absalom with a few fair words was able to raise all Israel against his father: Sheba the son of Bichri with as much ease raised a more dangerous tumult: David by wisdom, valour, and the blessing of God, surmounted these difficulties, and prepared a peaceable reign for Solomon; but after his death they broke out into a flame that was never quenched till the nation was so dispersed, that no man knew where to find his enemies. Solomon by his magnificence had reduced Israel to such poverty, as inclined them to revolt upon the first offer of an opportunity by Jeroboam. From that time forward Israel was perpetually vexed with civil seditions and conspiracies, or wars with their brethren of Judah. Nine kings with their families were destroyed by the first, and the latter brought such slaughters upon the miserable people as were never suffered by any who were not agitated with the like fury; and the course of these mischiefs was never interrupted, till they had brought the nation into captivity, and the country to desolation. Tho' God, according to his promise, did preserve a light in the house of David; yet the tribe of Judah was not the more happy. Joash was slain by a private conspiracy, and Amaziah (as is most probable) by public authority, for having foolishly brought a terrible slaughter upon Judah. Athaliah destroyed the king's race, and was killed herself by Jehoiada, who, not having learnt from our author to regard the power only, and not the ways by which it was obtained, caused her to be dragged out of the temple, and put to a well deserved death. The whole story is a tragedy: and if it be pretended this proceeded rather from the wrath of God against his people for their idolatry, than from such causes as are applicable to other nations; I answer, that this idolatry was the production of the government they had set up, and most suitable to it; and chusing rather to subject themselves to the will of a man, than to the law of God, they deservedly suffered the evils that naturally follow the worst counsels. We know of none who, taking the like course, have not suffered the like miseries. Notwithstanding the admirable virtue and success of Alexander, his reign was full of conspiracies, and his knowledge
of

CHAP. II. of them prompted him to destroy Parmenio, Philotas, Clytus, Callisthenes, Hermolaus, and many more of his best friends. If he escaped the sword, he fell by poison. The murder of his wives, mother, and children, by the rage of his own soldiers; the fury of his captains employed in mutual slaughters, till they were consumed; his paternal kingdom after many revolutions transferred to Cassander his most mortal enemy; the utter extinction of his conquering army, and particularly the famous Argyraspides, who, being grown faithless and seditious, after the death of Eumenes were sent to perish in unknown parts of the east; abundantly testify the admirable stability, good order, peace, and quiet, that is enjoyed under absolute monarchy. The next government of the like nature that appeared upon the stage of the world was that of Rome, introduced by wars that consumed two thirds of the people; confirmed by proscriptions, in which all that were eminent for nobility, riches, or virtue, perished. The peace they had under Augustus was like that which

Mar. ix. 26. the devil allowed to the child in the Gospel, whom he rent sorely, and left as dead. The miserable city was only cast into a swoon; after long and violent vexations by seditions, tumults, and wars, it lay as dead; and finding no helper like to him who cured the child, it was delivered to new devils to be tormented, till it was utterly destroyed. Tiberius was appointed as a fit instrument for such a purpose. It was thought, that those who should feel the effects of his pride, cruelty, and lust, would look upon the death of Augustus as a loss. He performed the work for which he was chosen; his reign was an uninterrupted series of murders, subornation, perjuries, and poisonings, intermixed with the most detestable impurities, the revolts of provinces, and mutinies of armies. The matter was not mended by his successors: Caligula was killed by his own guards: Claudius poisoned by his wife: Spain, Gaul, Germany, Pannonia, Mæsia, Syria, and Egypt, revolted at once from Nero; the people and senate followed the example of the provinces. This I think was, in our author's sense, sedition with a witness. Nero being dead by the hand of a slave, or his own to prevent that of the hangman, Galba entered the city with blood and slaughter; but when his own soldiers found he would not give the money for which they intended to sell the empire, they killed him: and, to shew the stability of absolute monarchy, it may be observed, that this was not done by the advice of the senate, or by a conspiracy of great men;

C. Tacit. hist. "Suscepere duo manipulares populi Romani imperium transferendum, & l. i. c. 25. "transstulerunt." Two rascals gave the empire to Otho, and the whole senate was like to be butchered for not being so ready to follow their venerable authority as they ought to have been, and hardly escaped the fury of their mad and drunken companions. As a farther testimony that these monarchies are not subject to sedition and tumults, he had at once only two competitors against whom he was to defend the well acquired empire: his army was defeated at Brescia; he killed himself; and his successor Vitellius was soon after thrown into the common sewer. The same method still continued: Rome was filled with blood and ashes; and to recite all the public mischiefs would be to transcribe the history: for as Pyrrhus, being asked who should succeed him, answered, answered, He who has the sharpest sword; that was the only law that governed in the following ages. Whoever could corrupt two or three legions, SECT. 24. thought he had a good title to the empire; and unless he happened to be killed by treachery, or another tumult of his own soldiers, he seldom receded from it without a battle, wherein he that was most successful, had no other security than what the present temper of the soldiers afforded him; and the miserable provinces, having neither virtue nor force, were obliged slavishly to follow the fury or fortune of those villains. In this state did Rome dedicate to Constantine the triumphal arch, that had been prepared for Maxentius; and those provinces which had set up Albinus and Niger submitted to Septimius Severus. In the vast variety of accidents that in those ages disturbed the world, no emperor had a better title than what he purchased by money or violence; and enjoyed it no longer than those helps continued, which of all things were the most uncertain. By this means most of the princes perished by the sword, Italy was made desolate, and Rome was several times sackt and burnt. The mistress of the world being made a slave, the provinces which had been acquired by the blood of her antient virtuous citizens, became part of an usurper's patrimony, who without any regard to the public good, distributed them to his children according to their number, or his passion. These either destroyed one another, or fell under the sword of a third, who had the fortune of their father, the greatest part most commonly falling to the share of the worst. If at any time the contrary happened, the government of the best was but a lucid interval. Well-wishing men grew more extremely to abhor the darkness that followed when they were gone. The best of them could do no more than suspend mischief for a while, but could not correct the corrupt principle of their government; some of them were destroyed as soon as they were thought to intend it: and others, who finished their days in peace, left the empire to such persons of their relations as were most unlike to them. Domitian came in as brother to Titus. Commodus and Heliogabalus were recommended by the memory of those virtues that had been found in Antoninus and Aurelius. Honorius and Arcadius, who by their baseness brought utter ruin upon the western and eastern empires, were the sons of the brave Theodosius. They who could keep their hands free from blood, and their hearts from malice, covetousness, and pride, could not transmit their virtues to their successors, nor correct the perverseness that lay at the root and foundation of their government. The whole mass of blood was vitiated; the body was but one vast sore, which no hand but that of the Almighty could heal; and he, who from an abhorrence of iniquity had declared he would not hear the cries of his own people, when they had chosen the thing that was not good, would not shew mercy to strangers, who had done the same thing.

I have insisted upon the Hebrew, Macedonian, and Roman histories, because they are the most eminent, and best known to us: we are in the dark concerning the Babylonian, Assyrian, Chaldean, Bactrian, and Egyptian monarchies: we know little more of them than the scripture occasionally relates concern-

CHAP. II. concerning their barbarous cruelty, and bestial pride, and extravagant folly. Others have been like to them, and I know not where to find a peaceable monarchy unless it be in Peru, where the ynca Garcilasso de la Vega says, that a man and a woman, children of the sun and the moon, appearing amongst a barbarous people, living without any religion or law, established a government amongst them, which continued in much peace and justice for twelve generations: but this seeming to be as fabulous as their birth, we may pass it over, and fix upon those that are better known; of which there is not one that has not suffered more dangerous and mischievous seditions, than all the popular governments that have been in the world: and the condition of those kingdoms which are not absolute, and yet give a preference to birth, without consideration of merit or virtue, is not much better.

This is proved by the reasons of those seditions and tumults, as well as from the fact itself.

The reasons do arise from the violence of the passions that incite men to them, and the intricacy of the questions concerning succession.

Every man has passions; few know how to moderate, and no one can wholly extinguish them. As they are various in their nature, so they are governed by various objects; and men usually follow that which is predominant in them, whether it terminate in ambition, covetousness, lust, or any other more or less blameable appetite. Every manner of life furnishes something, that, in some measure, may foment these: but a crown comprehends all that can be grateful to the most violent and vitious. He who is covetous, has vast revenues, besides what he may get by fraud and rapine, to satisfy his appetite. If he be given to sensuality, the variety of pleasures, and the facility of accomplishing whatever he desires, tends farther to inflame that passion. Such as are ambitious, are incited by the greatness of their power to attempt great matters; and the most sottish or lazy may discharge themselves of cares, and hope that others will be easily hired to take the burden of business upon them, whilst they lie at ease. They who naturally incline to pride and cruelty, are more violently tempted to usurp dominion; and the wicked advices of flatterers, always concurring with their passions, incite them to exercise the power they have gotten with the utmost rigour, to satiate their own rage, and to secure themselves against the effects of the public hatred, which they know they have deserved. If there be, as our author says, no other rule than force and success, and that he must be taken for the father of a people who is in possession of a power over them; whoever has the one, may put the other to a trial. Nay, even those who have regard to justice, will seldom want reasons to persuade them that it is on their side. Something may be amiss in the state; injuries may be done to themselves and their friends. Such honours may be denied as they think they deserve; or others of less merit, as they suppose, may be preferred before them. Men do so rarely make a right estimate of their own merits, that those who mean well may be often deceived:

ceived: and if nothing but success be required to make a monarch, they SECT. 24.
 may think it just to attempt whatever they can hope to accomplish. This was the case of Julius Cæsar; he thought all things lawful, when the con-sulate, which he supposed he had deserved, was denied.

“ Viribus utendum est quas fecimus: arma tenenti

“ Omnia dat, qui iusta negat.” Lucan.

These enterprizes seem to belong to men of great spirits; but there are none so base not to be capable of undertaking, and (as things may stand) of bringing them to perfection. History represents no man under a more contemptible character of sottish laziness, cowardice, and drunkenness, than Vitellius; no one more impure and sordid than Galba: Otho was advanced for being in his manners like to Nero: Vespasian was scorned for his avarice, till the power fell into such hands as made the world believe none could be unworthy of the empire; and in the following ages the worst men by the worst means most frequently obtained it.

These wounds are not cured, by saying that the law of God and nature prevents this mischief, by annexing the succession of crowns to proximity of blood; for mankind had not been continually afflicted with them, if there had been such a law, or that they could have been prevented by it: and tho' there were such a law, yet more questions would arise about that proximity, than any wise man would dare to determine. The law can be of no effect, unless there be a power to decide the contests arising upon it: but the fundamental maxim of the great monarchies is, that there can be no “interregnum:” the heir of the crown is in possession, as soon as he who did enjoy it is dead. “Le mort,” as the French say, “saisit le vif:” there can be therefore no such law, or it serves for nothing. If there be judges to interpret the law, no man is a king till judgment be given in his favour; and he is not king by his own title, but by the sentence given by them. If there be none, the law is merely imaginary, and every man may, in his own case, make it what he pleases. He who has a crown in his view, and arms in his hand, wants nothing but success to make him a king; and if he prosper, all men are obliged to obey him.

It is a folly, to say the matter is clear, and needs no decision; for every man knows, that no law concerning private inheritances can be so exactly drawn, but many controversies will arise upon it, that must be decided by a power to which both parties are subject: and the disputes concerning kingdoms are so much the more difficult, because this law is no-where to be found; and the more dangerous, because the competitors are for the most part more powerful.

Again, this law must either be general to all mankind, or particular to each nation. If particular, a matter of such importance requires good proof, when, where, how, and by whom it was given to every one. But the scriptures testifying to the contrary, that God gave laws to the Jews only, and that no such thing as hereditary monarchy, according to proximity of blood, was prescribed by them, we may safely say, that God did never give any

CHAP. II. such law to every particular, nor to any nation. If he did not give it to any one, he did not give it to all, for every one is comprehended in all; and if no one has it, it is impossible that all can have it; or that it should be obligatory to all, when no man knows, or can tell, when, where, and by what hand it was given, nor what is the sense of it: all which is evident by the various laws and customs of nations in the disposal of hereditary successions: and no one of them, that we know, has to this day been able to shew, that the method followed by them, is more according to nature than that of others.

If our author pretend to be God's interpreter, and to give the solution of these doubts, I may ask which of the five following ways are appointed by God, and then we may examine cases resulting from them.

1. In France, Turkey, and other places, the succession comes to the next male, in the strait eldest line, according to which the son is preferred before the brother of him who last enjoy'd the crown (as the present king of France before his uncle the duke of Orleans) and the son of the eldest before the brothers of the eldest; as in the case of Richard the Second of England, who was advanced preferably to all the brothers of the Black prince his father.

2. Others keep to the males of the reigning family; yet have more regard to the eldest man than to the eldest line: and representation taking no place among them, the eldest man is thought to be nearest to the first king; and a second son of the person that last reigned, to be nearer to him than his grandchild by the eldest son; according to which rule, any one of the sons of Edward the Third remaining after his death, should have been preferred before Richard the Second, who was his grandchild.

3. In the two cases before-mentioned, no manner of regard is had to females, who being thought naturally incapable of commanding men, or performing the functions of a magistrate, are, together with their descendants, utterly excluded from the supreme as well as from the inferior magistracies; and in Turkey, France, and other great kingdoms, have no pretence to any title: but in some places, and particularly in England, the advantages of proximity belong to them as well as to males; by which means our crown has been transported to several families and nations.

4. As in some places they are utterly rejected, and in others received simply without any condition; so those are not wanting, where that of not marrying out of the country, or without the consent of the estates, is imposed, of which Sweden is an example.

5. In some places proximity of blood is only regarded, whether the issue be legitimate or illegitimate; in others bastards are wholly excluded.

By this variety of judgments, made by several nations upon this point, it may appear, that tho' it were agreed by all, that the next in blood ought to succeed, yet such contests would arise upon the interpretation and application of the general rule, as must necessarily be a perpetual spring of irreconcilable and mortal quarrels.

If

If any man say, the rule observed in England is that which God gave to SECT. 24.
 mankind; I leave him first to dispute that point with the kings of France, and many others, who can have no right to the crowns they wear, if it be admitted; and, in the next place, to prove, that our ancestors had a more immediate communication with God, and a more certain knowledge of his will, than others, who, for any thing we know, may be of authority equal to them: but in the mean time we may rationally conclude, that if there be such a rule, we have had no king in England for the space of almost a thousand years, having not had one who did not come to the crown by a most manifest violation of it; as appears by the forecited examples of William the First and Second; Henry the First, Henry the Second and his children; John, Edward the Third, Henry the Fourth, Edward the Fourth and his children; Henry the Seventh, and all that claim under any of them. And if possession or success can give a right, it will I think follow, that Jack Straw, Wat Tyler, Perkin Warbeck, or any other rascal, might have had it, if he had been as happy as bold in his enterprize. This is no less than to expose crowns to the first that can seize them, to destroy all law and rule, and to render right a slave to fortune. If this be so, a late earl of Pembroke, whose understanding was not thought great, judged rightly when he said his grandfather was a wise man, tho' he could neither write nor read, inasmuch as he resolved to follow the crown, tho' it were upon a coal-staff. But if this be sufficient to make a wise man, it is pity the secret was no sooner discovered, since many, who for want of it lived and died in all the infamy, that justly accompanies knavery, cowardice, and folly, might have gained the reputation of the most excellent men in their several ages. The bloody factions, with which all nations subject to this sort of monarchy have been perpetually vexed, might have been prevented by throwing up cross or pile, or by battle between the competitors body to body, as was done by Corbis and Orsua, Cleorestes, and Polynices, Ironside and Canutus; it being most unreasonable, or rather impiously absurd, for any to venture their lives and fortunes, when their con-sciences are not concerned in the contest, and that they are to gain nothing by the victory.

If reason teaches, that till this expeditious way of ending controversies be received, the ambition of men will be apt to embroil nations in their quarrels, and others judging variously of those matters, which can be reduced to no certain rule, will think themselves in conscience obliged to follow the party that seems to them to be most just; experience manifests the same, and that ambition has produced more violent mischiefs than all the other desires and passions that have ever possessed the hearts of men. That this may appear, it will not be amiss to divide them into such as proceed from him who is in possession of the power, through jealousy of state, as they call it, to prevent the enterprizes of those who would dispossess him, and such as arise between competitors contending for it.

Tarquin's counsel concerning the poppies, and Periander's heads of corn, are of the first sort. The most eminent are always most feared as the readiest to undertake, and most able to accomplish, great designs.

CHAP. II. This eminence proceeds from birth, riches, virtue, or reputation; and is sometimes wrought up to the greatest height by a conjunction of all these. But I know not where to find an example of such a man, who could long subsist under absolute monarchy. If he be of high birth, he must, like Brutus, conceal his virtue, and gain no reputation, or resolve to perish, if he do not prevent his own death by that of the tyrant: all other ways are ineffectual: the suspicions, fears, and hatred, thereupon arising, are not to be removed: personal respects are forgotten, and such services as cannot be sufficiently valued, must be blotted out by the death of those who did them. Various ways may be taken, and pretences used, according to the temper of times and nations; but the thing must be done; and whether it be coloured by a trick of law, or performed by a mute with a bowstring, imports little. Henry the Fourth was made king by the earl of Northumberland, and his brave son Hotspur; Edward the Fourth by the valiant earl of Warwick; Henry the Seventh by Stanly; but neither of them could think himself safe, till his benefactor was dead. No continued fidelity, no testimonies of modesty and humility, can prevent this. The modesty of Germanicus in rejecting the honours that were offered to him, and his industry in quieting the mutinied legions, accelerated his ruin: when it was evident he might be emperor if he pleased, he must be so, or die: there was no middle station between the throne and the grave. It is probable, that Caligula, Nero, and other beasts like to them, might hate virtue for the good which is in it: but I cannot think, that either they, their predecessors, or successors, would have put themselves upon the desperate design of extirpating it, if they had not found it to be inconsistent with their government; and that being once concluded, they spared none of their nearest relations. Artaxerxes killed his son Darius: Herod murdered the best of his wives, and all his sons except the worst. Tiberius destroyed Agrippa Posthumus, and Germanicus, with his wife and two sons. How highly soever Constantine the Great be commended, he was polluted with the blood of his father-in-law, wife, and son. Philip the Second of Spain did in the like manner deliver himself from his fears of Don Carlos; and it is not doubted, that Philip the Fourth, for the same reasons, dispatched his brother Don Carlos, and his son Balthazar. The like cases were so common in England, that all the Plantagenets, and the noble families allied to them, being extinguished, our ancestors were sent to seek a king in one of the meanest in Wales.

This method being known, those who are unwilling to die so tamely, endeavour to find out ways of defending themselves; and there being no other than the death of the person who is in the throne, they usually seek to compass it by secret conspiracy, or open violence; and the number of princes that have been destroyed, and countries disturbed, by those who through fear have been driven to extremities, is not much less than of those who have suffered the like from men following the impulse of their own ambition.

The disorders arising from contests between several competitors, before any one could be settled in the possession of kingdoms, have been no less lets frequent and bloody than those above-mentioned, and the miseries suffered by them, together with the ruin brought upon the empires of Macedon and Rome, may be sufficient to prove it; however, to make the matter more clear, I shall alledge others. But because it may be presumption in me to think I know all the histories of the world, or tedious to relate all those I know, I shall content myself with some of the most eminent and remarkable: and if it appear, that they have all suffered the same mischiefs, we may believe they proceed not from accidents, but from the power of a permanent cause, that always produces the same, or the like effects. SECT. 24.

To begin with France. The succession not being well settled in the time of Meroveus, who dispossess'd the grandchildren of Pharamond, he was no sooner dead than Gillon set up himself, and with much slaughter drove Chilperic his son out of the kingdom; and he after a little time returning with like fury, is said to have seen a vision, first of lions and leopards, then of bears and wolves, and lastly of dogs and cats, all tearing one another to pieces. This has been always accounted by the French to be a representation of the nature and fortune of the three races, that were to command them, and has been too much verified by experience. Clovis their first Christian and most renowned king, having by good means or evil exceedingly enlarged his territories, but chiefly by the murders of Alaric and Ragnacaire, with his children, and suborning Sigismond of Metz to kill his father Sigebert, left his kingdom to be torn in pieces by the rage of his four sons, each of them endeavouring to make himself master of the whole; and when, according to the usual fate of such contests, success had crowned Clothaire, who was the worst of them all, by the slaughter of his brothers and nephews, with all the flower of the French and Gaulish nobility, the advantages of his fortune only resulted to his own person. For after his death the miserable nations suffered as much from the madness of his sons, as they had done by himself and his brothers. They had learnt from their predecessors not to be slow in doing mischief; but were farther incited by the rage of two infamous strumpets, Fredegonde and Brunehaud, which is a sort of vermin, that I am inclined to think, has not usually governed senates, or popular assemblies. Chilperic the Second, who by the slaughter of many persons of the royal blood, with infinite numbers of the nobility and people, came to be master of so much of the country, as procured him the name of king of France, killed his eldest son on suspicion, that he was excited against him by Brunehaud; and his second, lest he should revenge the death of his brother: he married Fredegonde, and was soon after killed by her adulterer Landry. The kingdom continued in the same misery through the rage of the surviving princes, and found no relief, tho' most of them fell by the sword; and that Brunehaud, who had been a principal cause of those tragedies, was tied to the tails of four wild horses, and suffered a death as foul as her life. These were lions, and leopards. They involved the kingdom in desperate troubles; but, being men of valour and industry, they kept up in some measure the reputation and power of the nation; and he

Hist. de France en la vie de Chilperic I.

Mezeray, &
de Serres.

CHAP. II. he who attained to the crown defended it. But they being fallen by the hands of each other, the poisonous root put forth another plague more mortal than their fury. The vigour was spent, and the succession becoming more settled, ten base and slothful kings, by the French called "les roys faineans," succeed. Some may say, they who do nothing do no hurt; but the rule is false in relation to kings. He that takes upon him the government of a people, can do no greater evil than by doing nothing; nor be guilty of a more unpardonable crime, than by negligence, cowardice, voluptuousness, and sloth, to desert his charge. Virtue and manhood perish under him; good discipline is forgotten; justice slighted; the laws perverted, or rendered useless; the people corrupted; the public treasures exhausted; and the power of the government always falling into the hands of flatterers, whores, favourites, bawds, and such base wretches as render it contemptible, a way is laid open for all manner of disorders. The greatest cruelty that has been known in the world, if accompanied with wit and courage, never did so much hurt as this slothful bestiality; or rather these slothful beasts have ever been most cruel. The reigns of Septimius Severus, Mahomet the Second, or Selim the Second, were cruel and bloody; but their fury was turned against foreigners, and some of their near relations, or against such as fell under the suspicion of making attempts against them: the condition of the people was tolerable; those who would be quiet might be safe; the laws kept their right course; the reputation of the empire was maintained, the limits defended, and the public peace preserved. But when the sword passed into the hands of lewd, slothful, foolish, and cowardly princes, it was of no power against foreign enemies, or disturbers of the domestic peace; tho' always sharp against the best of their own subjects. No man knew how to secure himself against them, unless by raising civil wars; which will always be frequent, when a crown defended by a weak hand is proposed as a prize to any that dare invade it. This is a perpetual spring of disorders; and no nation was ever quiet, when the most eminent men found less danger in the most violent attempts, than in submitting patiently to the will of a prince, that suffers his power to be managed by vile persons, who get credit by flattering him in his vices. But this is not all: such princes naturally hate and fear those who excel them in virtue and reputation, as much as they are inferior to them in fortune; and think their persons cannot be secured, nor their authority enlarged, except by their destruction. It is ordinary for them, "inter scorta & ganeas principibus viris perniciem machinari," and to make cruelty a cover to ignorance and cowardice. Besides the mischiefs brought upon the public by the loss of eminent men, who are the pillars of every state, such reigns are always accompanied with tumults, and civil wars, the great men striving with no less violence who shall get the weak prince into his power, when such regard is had to succession, that they think it not fit to divest him of the title, than when with less respect they contend for the sovereignty itself. And, whilst this sort of princes reigned, France was not less afflicted with the contests between Grimbault, Ebroin, Grimoald, and others, for the mayoralty

C. Tacit.

alty of the palace, than they had been before by the rage of those princes who SECT. 24.
had contested for the crown. The issue also was the same: after many revolutions, Charles Martel gained the power of the kingdom, which he had so bravely defended against the Saracens; and, having transmitted it to his son Pepin, the general assembly of estates, with the approbation of mankind, conferred the title also upon him. This gave the nation ease for the present; but the deep-rooted evil could not be so cured; and the kingdom, that by the wisdom, valour, and reputation of Pepin, had been preserved from civil troubles during his life, fell as deeply as ever into them so soon as he was dead. His sons Carloman, and Charles, divided the dominions; but in a little time each of them would have all. Carloman filled the kingdom with tumult; raised the Lombards, and marched with a great army against his brother, till his course was interrupted by death, caused, as is supposed, by such helps as princes liberally afford to their aspiring relations. Charles deprived his two sons of their inheritance, put them in prison, and we hear no more of them. His third brother Griffon was not more quiet, nor more successful; and there could be no peace in Gascony, Italy, or Germany, till he was killed. But all the advantages which Charles, by an extraordinary virtue and fortune, had purchased for his country, ended with his life. He left his son Lewis the Gentle in possession of the empire, and kingdom of France, and his grandson Bernard king of Italy: but those two could not agree, and Bernard, falling into the hands of Lewis, was deprived of his eyes, and some time after killed. This was not enough to preserve the peace: Lothair, Lewis, and Pepin, all three sons to Lewis, rebelled against him; called a counsel at Lions, deposed him, and divided the empire amongst themselves. After five years he escaped from the monastery where he had been kept, renewed the war, and was again taken prisoner by Lothair. When he was dead, the war broke out more fiercely than ever between his children: Lothair the emperor assaulted Lewis king of Bavaria, and Charles king of Rhetia; was defeated by them, and confined to a monastery, where he died. New quarrels arose between the two brothers, upon the divisions of the countries taken from him, and Lorrain only was left to his son. Lewis died soon after, and Charles, getting possession of the empire and kingdom, ended an inglorious reign in an unprosperous attempt to deprive Hermingrade, daughter to his brother Lewis, of the kingdom of Arles, and other places left to her by her father. Lewis his son, called the Stutterer, reigned two years in much trouble; and his only legitimate son, Charles the Simple, came not to the crown till after the death of his two bastards Lewis, and Carloman, Charles le Gros, and Eudes duke of Anjou. Charles le Gros was deposed from the empire and kingdom, stripped of his goods, and left to perish thro' poverty in an obscure village. Charles the Simple, and the nations under him, thrived no better: Robert duke of Anjou raised war against him, and was crowned at Rheims; but was himself slain soon after in a bloody battle near Soissons. His son-in-law Hebert, earl of Vermandois, gathered up the remains of his scattered party, got Charles into his power, and called a general assembly of estates, who deposed him,
and

CHAP. II. and gave the crown to Raoul duke of Burgundy; tho' he was no otherwise related to the royal blood than by his mother, which in France is nothing at all. He being dead, Lewis son to the deposed Charles was made king; but his reign was as inglorious to him, as miserable to his subjects. This is the peace which the French enjoyed for the space of five or six ages under their monarchy; and it is hard to determine whether they suffered most by the violence of those who possessed, or the ambition of others who aspired to the crown; and whether the fury of active, or the baseness of slothful princes was most pernicious to them: but upon the whole matter, through the defects of those of the latter sort, they lost all that they had gained by sweat and blood under the conduct of the former. Henry and Otho of Saxony, by a virtue like that of Charlemagne, deprived them of the empire, and settled it in Germany, leaving France only to Lewis surnamed Outremer, and his son Lothiar. These seemed to be equally composed of treachery, cruelty, ambition, and baseness; they were always mutinous, and always beaten; their frantic passions put them always upon unjust designs, and were such plagues to their subjects and neighbours, that they became equally detested and despised. These things extinguished the veneration due to the memory of Pepin and Charles; and obliged the whole nation rather to seek relief from a stranger, than to be ruined by their worthless descendents. They had tried all ways that were in their power; deposed four crowned kings within the space of an hundred and fifty years; crowned five who had no other title than the people conferred upon them; and restored the descendents of those they had rejected: but all was in vain: their vices were incorrigible, the mischiefs produced by them intolerable; they never ceased from murdering one another in battle, or by treachery, and bringing the nation into civil wars upon their wicked or foolish quarrels, till the whole race was rejected, and the crown placed upon the head of Hugh Capet. These mischiefs raged not in the same extremity under him, and his descendents; but the abatement proceeded from a cause no-way advantageous to absolute monarchy. The French were by their calamities taught more strictly to limit the regal power; and by turning the dukedoms and earldoms into patrimonies, which had been offices, gave an authority to the chief of the nobility, by which that of kings was curbed; and tho' by this means the commonalty was exposed to some pressures, yet they were small in comparison of what they had suffered in former times. When many great men had estates of their own, that did not depend upon the will of kings, they grew to love their country; and tho' they chearfully served the crown in all cases of public concernment, they were not easily engaged in the personal quarrels of those who possessed it, or had a mind to gain it. To preserve themselves in this condition, they were obliged to use their vassals gently; and this continuing in some measure, till within the last fifty years, the monarchy was less tumultuous, than when the king's will had been less restrained. Nevertheless, they had not much reason to boast; there was a root still remaining, that from time to time produced poisonous fruit: civil wars were frequent among them, tho' not carried on with such desperate madness madness as formerly; and many of them upon the account of disputes between competitors for the crown. All the wars with England, since Edward the Second married Isabella, daughter, and, as he pretended, heir of Philip le Bel, were of this nature. The defeats of Crecy, Poitiers, and Agincourt, with the slaughters and devastations suffered from Edward the Third, the Black prince, and Henry the Fifth, were merely upon contests for the crown, and for want of an interpreter of the law of succession, who might determine the question between the heir male, and the heir general. The factions of Orleans and Burgundy, Orleans and Armignac, proceeded from the same spring; and the murders that seem to have been the immediate causes of those quarrels, were only the effects of the hatred growing from their competition. The more odious, tho' less bloody contests between Lewis the Eleventh, and his father Charles the Seventh, with the jealousy of the former against his son Charles the Eighth, arose from the same principle. Charles of Bourbon prepared to fill France with fire and blood upon the like quarrel, when his designs were overthrown by his death in the assault of Rome. If the dukes of Guise had been more fortunate, they had soon turned the cause of religion into a claim to the crown, and repaired the injury done, as they pretended, to Pepin's race, by destroying that of Capet: and Henry the Third, thinking to prevent this by the slaughter of Henry le Balafre, and his brother the cardinal de Guise, brought ruin upon himself, and cast the kingdom into a most horrid confusion. Our own age furnishes us with more than one attempt of the same kind attended with the like success. The duke of Orleans was several times in arms against Lewis the Thirteenth his brother; the queen-mother drew the Spaniards to favour him; Montmorency perished in his quarrel; Fontrailles revived it by a treaty with Spain, which struck at the king's head as well as the cardinal's, and was suppressed by the death of Cinq Mars and de Thou. Those who understand the affairs of that kingdom, make no doubt that the count de Soissons would have set up for himself, and been followed by the best part of France, if he had not been killed in the pursuit of his victory at the battle of Sedan. Since that time the kingdom has suffered such disturbances as shew, that more was intended than the removal of Mazarin: and the Marechal de Turenne was often told, that the check he gave to the prince of Conde at Gien, after he had defeated Hocquincourt, had preserved the crown upon the king's head. And to testify the stability, good order, and domestic peace, that accompanies absolute monarchy, we have in our own days seen the house of Bourbon often divided within itself; the duke of Orleans, the count de Soissons, the princes of Conde and Conti, in war against the king; the dukes of Angoulême, Vendôme, Longueville, the count de Moret, and other bastards of the royal family, following their example; the houses of Guise, d'Elbeuf, Bouillon, Nemours, Rochefocault, and almost all the most eminent in France, with the parliaments of Paris, Bourdeaux, and some others, joining with them. I might alledge many more examples, to shew, that this monarchy, as well as all others, has from the first establishment been full of blood and slaughter, through the violence of those who possessed

CHAP. II. the crown, and the ambition of such as aspired to it; and that the end of one civil war has been the beginning of another: but I presume, upon the whole, these will be thought sufficient to prove, that it never enjoyed any permanent domestic quiet.

The kingdoms of Spain have been no less disturbed by the same means; but especially that of Castile, where the kings had more power than in other places. To cite all the examples, were to transcribe their histories; but whoever has leisure to examine them will find, that after many troubles, Alphonso the Second, notwithstanding his glorious surname of Wise, was deposed by means of his ambitious son: don Alonso, surnamed el Desheredado, supplanted by his uncle don Sancho el Bravo: Peter the Cruel cast from the throne, and killed by his bastard brother the conde de Trastamara. From the time of the above-named Alphonso to that of Ferdinand and Isabella, containing about two hundred years, so few of them passed without civil wars, that I hardly remember two together that were free from them: and whosoever pretends, that of late years that monarchy has been more quiet, must, if he be ingenuous, confess their peace is rather to be imputed to the dexterity of removing such persons as have been most likely to raise disturbances (of which number were don John of Austria, don Carlos son to Philip the Second, another of the same name son to Philip the Third, and don Balthazar, son to Philip the Fourth) than to the rectitude of their constitutions.

He that is not convinced of these truths by what has been said may come nearer home, and see what mischiefs were brought upon Scotland by the contests between Baliol and Bruce, with their consequences, till the crown came to the Stuart family; the quiet reigns, and happy deaths, of the five James's, together with the admirable stability and peace of the government under queen Mary, and the perfect union in which she lived with her husband, son and people, as well as the happiness of the nation whilst it lasted.

But the miseries of England, upon the like occasions, surpass all. William the Norman was no sooner dead, but the nation was rent in pieces by his son Robert, contesting with his younger sons William and Henry for the crown. They being all dead, and their sons, the like happened between Stephen and Maud: Henry the Second was made king to terminate all disputes, but it proved a fruitless expedient. Such as were more scandalous, and not less dangerous, did soon arise between him and his sons; who, besides the evils brought upon the nation, vexed him to death by their rebellion. The reigns of John and Henry the Third were yet more tempestuous. Edward the Second's lewd, foolish, infamous, and detestable government, ended in his deposition and death, to which he was brought by his wife and son. Edward the Third employed his own and his subjects valour against the French and Scots; but whilst the foundations were out of order, the nation could never receive any advantage by their victories: all was calculated for the glory, and turned to the advantage of one man. He being dead, all that the English held in Scotland, and in France, was lost through the baseness of his successor, with more blood than it had been gained; and the civil wars raised by his wickedness and madness ended as those of Edward SECT. 24.

the Second had done. The peace of Henry the Fourth's reign was interrupted by dangerous civil wars; and the victory obtained at Shrewsbury had not perhaps secured him in the throne, if his death had not prevented new troubles. Henry the Fifth acquired such reputation by his virtue and victories, that none dared to invade the crown during his life: but immediately after his death the storms prepared against his family broke out with the utmost violence. His son's weakness encouraged Richard duke of York to set up a new title, which produced such mischiefs as hardly any people has suffered, unless upon the like occasion: for besides the slaughter of many thousands of the people, and especially of those who had been accustomed to arms, the devastation of the best parts of the kingdom, and the loss of all that our kings had inherited in France, or gained by the blood of their subjects, fourscore princes of the blood, as Philip de Commines calls them, died in battle, or under the hand of the hangman. Many of the most noble families were extinguished; others lost their most eminent men. Three kings and two presumptive heirs of the crown were murdered, and the nation brought to that shameful exigence, to set up a young man to reign over them, who had no better cover for his sordid extraction than a Welsh pedigree, that might shew how a tailor was descended from prince Arthur, Cadwallader, and Brutus. But the wounds of the nation were not to be healed with such a plaister. He could not rely upon a title made up of such stuff, and patched with a marriage to a princess of a very questionable birth. His own meanness inclined him to hate the nobility; and thinking it to be as easy for them to take the crown from him, as to give it to him, he industriously applied himself to glean up the remainders of the house of York, from whence a competitor might arise, and by all means to crush those who were most able to oppose him. This exceedingly weakened the nobility, who held the balance between him and the commons, and was the first step towards the dissolution of our antient government: but he was so far from settling the kingdom in peace, that such rascals as Perkin Warbeck and Simnel were able to disturb it. The reign of Henry the Eighth was turbulent and bloody; that of Mary furious, and such as had brought us into subjection to the most powerful, proud, and cruel nation at that time in the world, if God had not wonderfully protected us. Nay, Edward the Sixth, and queen Elizabeth, notwithstanding the natural excellency of their dispositions, and their knowledge of the truth in matters of religion, were forced by that which men call "jealousy of state," to foul their hands so often with illustrious blood, that if their reigns deserve to be accounted amongst the most gentle of monarchies, they were more heavy than the government of any commonwealth in time of peace; and yet their lives were never secure against such as conspired against them upon the account of title.

Having in some measure shewed what miseries have been usually, if not perpetually brought upon nations subject to monarchies, by the violence of some princes, and the baseness, folly, and cowardice, of others, together with

CHAP. II. what they have suffered in contests for the several crowns, whilst men divided into divers factions strive with as much vehemency to advance the person they favour, as if they or their country were interested in the quarrel, and fight as fiercely for a master as they might reasonably do to have none, I am not able to determine which of the two evils is the most mortal. It is evident the vices of princes result to the damage of the people; but whether pride and cruelty, or stupidity and sloth, be the worst, I cannot tell. All monarchies are subject to be afflicted with civil wars; but whether the most frequent and bloody do arise from the quarrels of divers competitors for crowns, before any one gain the possession of them, or afterwards, through the fears of him that would keep what he has gained, or the rage of those who would wrest it from him, is not so easily decided. But commonwealths are less troubled with those distempers. Women, children, or such as are notoriously foolish or mad, are never advanced to the supreme power. Whilst the laws, and that discipline which nourishes virtue, is in force, men of wisdom and valour are never wanting; and every man desires to give testimony of his virtue, when he knows it will be rewarded with honour and power. If unworthy persons creep into magistracies, or are by mistake any way preferred, their vices, for the most part, turn to their own hurt; and the state cannot easily receive any great damage by the incapacity of one who is not to continue in office above a year; and is usually encompassed with those who having borne, or are aspiring to the same, are by their virtue able to supply his defects; cannot hope for a reward from one unable to corrupt them, and are sure of the favour of the senate and people to support them in the defence of the public interest. As long as this good order continues, private quarrels are suppressed by the authority of the magistrate, or prove to be of little effect. Such as arise between the nobles and commons frequently produce good laws for the maintenance of liberty, as they did in Rome for above three hundred years after the expulsion of Tarquin; and almost ever terminate with little or no blood. Sometimes the errors of one or both parties are discovered by the discourse of a wise and good man; and those who have most violently opposed one another become the best friends, every one joining to remove the evil that causes the division. When the senate and people of Rome seemed to be most furiously incensed against each other, the creation of tribunes, communication of honours and marriages between the patrician and plebeian families, or the mitigation of usury, composed all; and these were not only harmless things, but such as gave opportunities of correcting the defects that had been in the first constitution of the government, without which they could never have attained to the greatness, glory, and happiness, they afterwards enjoyed. Such as had seen that people meeting in tumult, running through the city, crying out against the kings, consuls, senate, or decemviri, might have thought they would have filled all with blood and slaughter; but no such thing happened. They desired no more than to take away the kingdom which Tarquin had wickedly usurped; and never went about so much as to punish one minister of the mischiefs he had done, or to take away his goods, till upon pretence of treating, his embas-fadors by a new treachery had cast the city into greater danger than ever. SECT. 24.

 Tho' the decemviri had by the like villainies equally provoked the people, T. Liv. l. iii.
 they were used with the like gentleness: Appius Claudius and Oppius having by voluntary death substracted themselves from public punishment, their colleagues were only banished, and the magistracies of the city reduced to the former order without the effusion of more blood. They who contended for their just rights, were satisfied with the recovery of them; whereas such as follow the impulse of an unruly ambition never think themselves safe, till they have destroyed all that seem able to disturb them, and satiated their rage with the blood of their adversaries. This makes as well as shews the difference between the tumults of Rome, or the secession of the common people to mount Aventine, and the battles of Towton, Teuxbury, Eveshal, Lewes, Hexham, Barnet, St. Albans, and Bosworth. It is in vain to say these ought rather to be compared to those of Pharsalia, Actium, or Philippi; for when the laws of a commonwealth are abolished, the name also ceases. Whatever is done by force or fraud to set up the interests and lust of one man in opposition to the laws of his country, is purely and absolutely monarchical. Whatsoever passed between Marius, Sylla, Cinna, Catiline, Cæsar, Pompey, Crassus, Augustus, Antonius, and Lepidus, is to be imputed to the contests that arise between competitors for monarchy, as well as those that in the next age happened between Galba, Otho, Vitellius, and Vespasian: or, which is worse, whereas those in commonwealths fight for themselves when there is occasion, and, if they succeed, enjoy the fruits of their victory, so as even those who remain of the vanquished party, partake of the liberty thereby established, or the good laws thereupon made; such as followed the ensigns of these men, who sought to set up themselves, did, rather like beasts than men, hazard and suffer many unspeakable evils to purchase misery to themselves and their posterity, and to make him their master, who, increasing in pride, avarice, and cruelty, was to be thrown down again with as much blood as he had been set up.

These things, if I mistake not, being in the last degree evident, I may leave to our author all the advantages he can gain by his rhetorical description of the tumults of Rome, "when blood was in the market-place" "suckt up with sponges, and the jakes stuffed with carcases;" to which he may add the crimes of Sylla's life, and the miseries of his death: but withal I desire to know, what number of sponges were sufficient to suck up the blood of five hundred thousand men slain in one day, when the house of David and Jeroboam contended for the crown of Israel, or of four hundred thousand who fell in one battle, between Joash and Amaziah, on the same occasion; what jakes were capacious enough to contain the carcases of those that perished in the quarrels between the successors of Alexander; the several competitors for the Roman empire; or those which have happened in France, Spain, England, and other places upon the like occasions? If Sylla for some time acted as an absolute monarch, it is no wonder that he died like one, or that God punished him as Herod, Philip the Second of Spain, and some others, because the hand of his fellow-citizens had unjustly spared him. If, when he was become detestable to God and man, he became also miserable,
 his

CHAP. II. his example ought to deter others from the crimes, that are avenged by a power which none can escape, and to encourage those who defend, or endeavour to recover, their violated liberties, to act vigorously in a cause, that God does evidently patronize.

S E C T. XXV.

Courts are more subject to venality and corruption than popular governments.

THOUGH court-flatterers impute many evils to popular governments they no-way deserve, I could not think any so impudent as to lay corruption and venality to their charge, till I found it in our author. They might in my opinion have taken those faults upon themselves, since they certainly abound most where bawds, whores, buffoons, players, slaves, and other base people, who are naturally mercenary, are most prevalent. And whosoever would know whether this does more frequently befall commonwealths than monarchies, especially if they are absolute, need only to inquire, whether the Cornelii, Junii, Fabii, Valerii, Quintii, Curii, Fabritii, and others, who most prevailed in Rome after the expulsion of the kings, or Sejanus, Macro, Narcissus, Pallas, Icetus, Tigellinus, Vinnius, Laco, Agrippina, Messalina, Lollia, Poppæa, and the like, were most subject to those base vices: whether it were more easy to corrupt one or two of those villains and strumpets, or the senates and people of Rome, Carthage, Athens, and Sparta; and whether that sort of rabble had more power over the princes they served, than such as most resembled them had whilst the popular government continued. It is in vain to say those princes were wicked and vile; for many others are so likewise; and when the power is in the hands of one man, there can be no assurance he will not be like them. Nay, when the power is so placed, ill men will always find opportunities of compassing their desires: "Bonus, cautus, optimus imperator venditur," said Dioclesian; and tho' he was no unwise man, yet that which principally induced him to renounce the empire, was the impossibility he found of defending himself against those that were in credit with him, who daily betrayed and sold him. They see with the eyes of other men, and cannot resist the frauds that are perpetually put upon them. Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius seem to have been the best and wisest of all the Roman emperors; but the two Faustina's had such an ascendent over them, as was most shameful to their persons, and mischievous to the empire, and the best men in it. Such as these may gain too much upon the affections of one man in the best regulated government; but that could be of no great danger to the public, when many others, equal or not much inferior to him in authority, are ready to oppose whatever he should endeavour to promote by their impulse: but there is no remedy, when all depends upon the will of a single

a single person who is governed by them. There was more of acuteness and SECT. 25.
 jest, than of truth, in that saying of Themistocles, "That his little boy had "more power than any man in Greece; for he governed his mother, she "him, he Athens, and Athens Greece." For he himself was found to have little power, when for private passions and concerns he departed from the interest of the public; and the like has been found in all places that have been governed in the like manner.

Again, corruption will always reign most, where those who have the power do most favour it, where the rewards of such crimes are greatest, easiest, and most valued, and where the punishment of them is least feared.

1. For the first, we have already proved, that liberty cannot be preserved, if the manners of the people are corrupted, nor absolute monarchy introduced where they are sincere; which is sufficient to shew, that those who manage free governments ought always, to the utmost of their power, to oppose corruption, because otherwise both they and their government must inevitably perish; and that on the other hand, the absolute monarch must endeavour to introduce it, because he cannot subsist without it. It is also so natural for all such monarchs to place men in power, who pretend to love their persons, and will depend upon their pleasure, that possibly it would be hard to find one in the world who has not made it the rule of his government: and this is not only the way to corruption, but the most dangerous of all. For tho' a good man may love a good monarch, he will obey him only when he commands that which is just; and no one can engage himself blindly to do whatever he is commanded, without renouncing all virtue and religion; because he knows not whether that which shall be commanded is consistent with either, or directly contrary to the laws of God and man. But if such a monarch be evil, and his actions such as they are too often found to be, whoever bears an affection to him, and second his designs, declares himself an enemy to all that is good; and the advancement of such men to power does not only introduce, foment, and increase, corruption, but fortifies it in such a manner, that without an intire renovation of that state it cannot be removed. Ill men may possibly creep into any government; but when the worst are placed nearest to the throne, and raised to honours for being so, they will with that force endeavour to draw all men to a conformity of spirit with themselves, that it can no otherwise be prevented, than by destroying them, and the principle in which they live.

2. To the second; man naturally follows that which is good, or seems to him to be so. Hence it is, that in well-governed states, where a value is put upon virtue, and no one honoured, unless for such qualities as are beneficial to the public, men are from the tenderest years brought up in a belief, that nothing in this world deserves to be sought after, but such honours as are acquired by virtuous actions: by this means virtue itself becomes popular, as in Sparta, Rome, and other places, where riches (which, with the vanity that follows them, and the honours men give to them, are the root of all evil) were either totally banished, or little regarded. When no other advantage attended

CHAP. II. attended the greatest riches than the opportunity of living more sumptuously or deliciously, men of great spirits slighted them. When Aristippus told Cleanthes, that if he would go to court, and flatter the tyrant, he need not seek his supper under a hedge; the philosopher answered, that he who could content himself with such a supper, need not go to court, or flatter the tyrant. Epaminondas, Aristides, Phocion, and even the Lacedemonian kings, found no inconvenience in poverty, whilst their virtue was honoured, and the richest princes in the world feared their valour and power. It was not difficult for Curius, Fabricius, Quintius Cincinnatus, or Paulus Emilius, to content themselves with the narrowest fortune, when it was no obstacle to them in the pursuit of those honours which their virtues deserved. It was in vain to think of bribing a man who supped upon the coleworts of his own garden. He could not be gained by gold, who did not think it necessary. He that could rise from the plough to the triumphal chariot, and contentedly return thither again, could not be corrupted; and he that left the sense of his poverty to his executors, who found not wherewith to bury him, might leave Macedon and Greece to the pillage of his soldiers, without taking to himself any part of the booty. But when luxury was brought into fashion, and they came to be honoured who lived magnificently, tho' they had in themselves no qualities to distinguish them from the basest of slaves, the most virtuous men were exposed to scorn if they were poor: and that poverty which had been the mother and nurse of their virtue, grew insupportable. The poet well understood what effect this change had upon the world, who said,

“ Nullum crimen abest, facinusque libidinis, ex quo

“ Paupertas Romana perit.” Juven. Sat. vi. 293.

When riches grew to be necessary, the desire of them, which is the spring of all mischief, followed. They who could not obtain honours by the noblest actions, were obliged to get wealth to purchase them from whores and villains, who exposed them to sale: and when they were once entered into this track, they soon learnt the vices of those from whom they had received their preferment, and to delight in the ways that had brought them to it. When they were come to this, nothing could stop them: all thought and remembrance of good was extinguished. They who had bought the commands of armies or provinces from Icetius or Narcissus, fought only how to draw money from them, to enable them to purchase higher dignities, or gain a more assured protection from those patrons. This brought the government of the world under a most infamous traffic, and the treasures arising from it were, for the most part, dissipated by worse vices than the rapine, violence, and fraud, with which they had been gotten. The authors of those crimes had nothing left but their crimes, and the necessity of committing more through the indigence into which they were plunged by the extravagance of their expences. These things are inseparable from the life of a courtier; for as servile natures are guided rather by sense than reason, such as addict themselves selves to the service of courts, find no other consolation in their misery, than SECT. 25.

 what they receive from sensual pleasures, or such vanities as they put a value upon; and have no other care, than to get money for their supply by begging, stealing, bribing, and other infamous practices. Their offices are more or less esteemed according to the opportunities they afford for the exercise of these virtues; and no man seeks them for any other end than for gain, nor takes any other way than that which conduces to it. The usual means of attaining them are, by observing the Prince's humour, flattering his vices, serving him in his pleasures, fomenting his passions, and by advancing his worst designs, to create an opinion in him, that they love his person, and are intirely addicted to his will. When valour, industry, and wisdom, advanced men to offices, it was no easy matter for a man to persuade the senate he had such qualities as were required, if he had them not: but when princes seek only such as love them, and will do what they command, it is easy to impose upon them; and because none that are good will obey them when they command that which is not so, they are always encompassed by the worst. Those who follow them only for reward, are most liberal in professing affection to them, and by that means rise to places of authority and power. The fountain being thus corrupted, nothing that is pure can come from it. These mercenary wretches having the management of affairs, justice and honours are set at a price, and the most lucrative traffick in the world is thereby established.
 * Eutropius, when he was a slave, used to pick pockets and locks; but, being made a minister, he sold cities, armies, and provinces: and some have undertaken to give probable reasons to believe, that Pallas, one of Claudius's manumised slaves, by these means brought together more wealth in six years, than all the Roman dictators and consuls had done from the expulsion of the kings to their passage into Asia. The rest walked in the same way, used the same arts, and many of them succeeded in the same manner. Their riches consisted not of spoils taken from enemies, but were the base product of their own corruption. They valued nothing but money, and those who would bribe them, were sure to be advanced to the highest offices; and whatever they did, feared no punishment. Like effects will ever proceed from the like causes. When vanity, luxury, and prodigality are in fashion, the desire of riches must necessarily increase in proportion to them: and when the power is in the hands of base mercenary persons, they will always (to use the courtiers phrase) make as much profit of their places as they can. Not only matters of favour, but of justice too, will be exposed to sale; and no way will be open to honours or magistracies, but by paying largely for them. He that gets an office by these means, will not execute it gratis: he thinks he may sell what he has bought; and would not have entered by corrupt ways, if he had not intended to deal corruptly. Nay, if a well-meaning man should suffer himself to be so far carried away by the stream of a prevailing custom, as D d to * ———Nunc uberiore rapina Peccat in orbe manus.

Claud.

CHAP. II. to purchase honours of such villains, he would be obliged to continue in the same course, that he might gain riches to procure the continuance of his benefactors protection, or to obtain the favour of such as happen to succeed them: and the corruption thus beginning in the head, must necessarily diffuse itself into all the members of the common wealth: or, if any one (which is not to be expected) after having been guilty of one villainy, should resolve to commit no more, it could have no other effect than to bring him to ruin; and he being taken away, all things would return to their former channel.

Besides this, whosoever desires to advance himself, must use such means as are suitable to the time in which he lives, and the humour of the persons with whom he is to deal. It had been as absurd for any man void of merit to set himself up against Junius Brutus, Cincinnatus, Papirius Cursor, Camillus, Fabius Maximus, or Scipio; and, by bribing the senate and people of Rome, think to be chosen captain against the Tarquins, Tuscans, Latins, Samnites, Gauls, or Carthaginians; as for the most virtuous men by the most certain proofs of their wisdom, experience, integrity, and valour, to expect advancement from Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, or the lewd wretches that governed them. They hated and feared all those that excelled in virtue; and, setting themselves to destroy the best for being the best, they placed the strength of the government in the hands of the worst, which produced the effects before-mentioned. This seems to have been so well known, that no man pretended to be great at court, but those who had cast off all thoughts of honour and common honesty. "Revertar, cum leno, meretrix, scurra, cinædus ero," said one who saw what manners prevailed there; and wheresoever they do prevail, such as will rise, must render themselves conformable in all corruption and venality. And it may be observed, that a noble person now living amongst us, who is a great enemy to bribery, was turned out from a considerable office, as a scandal to the court; for, said the principal minister, he will make no profit of his place, and by that means casts a scandal upon those that do.

If any man say, this is not generally the fate of all courts, I confess it; and that, if the prince be just, virtuous, wise, of great spirit, and not pretending to be absolute, he may chuse such men as are not mercenary, or take such a course as may render it hard for them to deserve bribes, or to preserve themselves from punishment, if they should defect from his intention. And a prince of this age, speaking familiarly with some great men about him, said, he had heard much of vast gains made by those who were near to princes; and asked if they made the like? One of them answered, that they were as willing as others to get something, but that no man would give them a farthing; for, every one finding a free admittance to his majesty, no man needed a solicitor. And it was no less known, that he did of himself grant those things that were just, than that none of them had so much credit as to promote such as were not so. I will not say such a king is a phoenix: perhaps more than one may be found in an age; but they are certainly rare; and, all that is good in their government proceeding from the excellency of their personal virtues, it must fail, when that virtue fails, which was the root of it.

Expe-

Experience shews how little we can rely upon such a help; for, where crowns SECT. 25.
 are hereditary, children seldom prove like to their fathers; and such as are elective have also their defects. Many seem to be modest and innocent in private fortunes, who prove corrupt and vitious, when they are raised to power.
 The violence, spite, and malice of Saul was never discovered, till the people had placed him in the throne. But where the government is absolute, or the prince endeavours to make it so, this integrity can never be found: he will always seek such as are content to depend upon his will; which being always unruly, good men will never comply; ill men will be paid for it, and that opens a gap to all manner of corruption. Something like to this may befall regular monarchies, or popular governments. They who are placed in the principal offices of trust may be treacherous; and when they are so, they will always by these means seek to gain partizans and dependents upon themselves.
 Their designs being corrupt, they must be carried on by corruption; but such as would support monarchy in its regularity, or popular governments, must oppose it, or be destroyed by it. And nothing can better manifest how far absolute monarchies are more subject to this venality and corruption than the regular and popular governments, than that they are rooted in the principle of the one, which cannot subsist without them; and are so contrary to the others, that they must certainly perish, unless they defend themselves from them.

If any man be so far of another opinion, as to believe, that Brutus, Camillus, Scipio, Fabius, Hannibal, Pericles, Aristides, Agesilaus, Epaminondas, or Pelopidas, were as easily corrupted as Sejanus, Tigellinus, Vinnius, or Laco; that the senate and people of Rome, Carthage, Athens, Sparta, or Thebes, were to be bought at as easy rates as one profligate villain, a slave, an eunuch, or a whore; or tho' it was not in former ages, yet it is so now;
 he may be pleased to consider by what means men now rise to places of ju-dicature, church preferment, or any offices of trust, honour, or profit, under those monarchies which we know, that either are or would be absolute. Let him examine how all the offices of justice are now disposed of in France;
 how Mazarin came to be advanced; what traffick he made of abbies and bishopricks, and what treasures he gained by that means; whether the like has not continued since his death, and as a laudable example been transmitted to us since his majesty's happy restauration; whether bawds, whores, thieves, buffoons, parasites, and such vile wretches as are naturally mercenary, have not more power at Whitehall, Versailles, the Vatican, and the Escorial, than in Venice, Amsterdam, and Switzerland: whether Hide, Arlington, Danby, their graces of Cleveland and Portsmouth, Sunderland, Jenkins, or Chiffinch, could probably have attained such power as they have had amongst us, if it had been disposed of by the suffrages of the parliament and people; or lastly, whether such as know only how to work upon the personal vices of a man, have more influence upon one who happens to be born in a reigning family, or upon a senate consisting of men chosen for their virtues and quality, or the whole body of a nation.

CHAP. II. But if he who possesses or affects an absolute power, be by his interest led to introduce that corruption, which the people, senate, and magistrates, who uphold popular governments, abhor, as that which threatens them with destruction; if the example, arts, and means used by him and his dependents, be of wonderful efficacy towards the introduction of it; if nothing but an admirable virtue, which can hardly be in one that enjoys or desires such a power, can divert him from that design; and if such virtue never did, nor probably ever will, continue long in any one family; we cannot rationally believe there ever was a race of men invested with, or possessing such a power, or that there will ever be any who have not, and will not endeavour to introduce that corruption, which is so necessary to the defence of their persons, and most important concerns, and certainly accomplish their great design, unless they are opposed or removed.

S E C T. XXVI.

Civil tumults and wars are not the greatest evils that befall nations.

BUT skin for skin," says our author, "and all that a man hath, will he give for his life." And since it was necessary to grace his book with some scripture phrases, none could be fitter for that purpose than those that were spoken by the devil: but they will be of little use to him; for tho' I should so far recede from truth, as to avow those words to be true, I might safely deny the conclusions he draws from them, "That those are the worst governments, under which most men are slain; or that more are slain in popular governments, than in absolute monarchies." For, having proved that all the wars and tumults that have happened in commonwealths, have never produced such slaughters as were brought upon the empires of Macedon and Rome, or the kingdoms of Israel, Judah, France, Spain, Scotland, or England, by contests between several competitors for those crowns; if tumult, war, and slaughter, be the point in question, those are the worst of all governments, where they have been most frequent and cruel. But tho' these are terrible scourges, I deny that government to be simply the worst, that has most of them. It is ill, that men should kill one another in seditions, tumults, and wars; but it is worse, to bring nations to such misery, weakness, and baseness, as to have neither strength, nor courage to contend for any thing; to have left nothing worth defending, and to give the name of peace to desolation. I take Greece to have been happy and glorious, when it was full of populous cities, flourishing in all the arts that deserve praise among men; when they were courted and feared by the greatest kings, and never assaulted by any but to his own loss and confusion; when Babylon and Susa trembled at the motion of their arms; and their valour, exercised in those wars and tumults, which our author looks upon as the greatest evils, was raised to such a power, that nothing upon earth was found able to resist them: and I think it now miserable, when peace reigns within their empty walls, and the poor remains of those exhausted nations, sheltering themselves under the ruins of the desolated cities, have neither any thing that deserves to be disputed amongst them, nor spirit or force to repel the injuries they daily suffer from a proud and insupportable master. SECT. 26.

was

The like may be said of Italy: whilst it was inhabited by nations governing themselves by their own will, they fell sometimes into domestic seditions, and had frequent wars with their neighbours. When they were free, they loved their country, and were always ready to fight in its defence. Such as succeeded well, increased in vigour and power; and even those that were the most unfortunate in one age, found means to repair their greatest losses, if their government continued. Whilst they had a propriety in their goods, they would not suffer the country to be invaded, since they knew they could have none, if it were lost. This gave occasion to wars and tumults; but it sharpened their courage, kept up a good discipline, and the nations that were most exercised by them, always increased in power and number; so that no country seems ever to have been of greater strength than Italy was when Hannibal invaded it: and after his defeat, the rest of the world was not able to resist their valour and power. They sometimes killed one another; but their enemies never got any thing but burying-places within their territories. All things are now brought into a very different method by the blessed governments they are under. The fatherly care of the king of Spain, the pope, and other princes, has established peace amongst them. We have not in many ages heard of any sedition among the Latins, Sabines, Volsci, Equi, Samnites, or others. The thin, half-starv'd inhabitants of walls supported by ivy, fear neither popular tumults, nor foreign alarms; and their sleep is only interrupted by hunger, the cries of their children, or the howling of wolves. Instead of many turbulent contentious cities, they have a few scatter'd silent cottages; and the fierceness of those nations is so tempered, that every rascally collector of taxes extorts without fear from every man, that which should be the nourishment of his family. And if any of those countries are free from that pernicious vermin, it is through the extremity of their poverty. Even in Rome a man may be circumvented by the fraud of a priest, or poisoned by one who would have his estate, wife, whore, or child; but nothing is done that looks like tumult or violence. The governors do as little fear Gracchus as Hannibal; and instead of wearying their subjects in wars, they only seek, by perverted laws, corrupt judges, false witnesses, and vexatious suits, to cheat them of their money and inheritance.

This is the best part of their condition. Where these arts are used, there are men, and they have something to lose; but for the most part the lands lie waste, and they who were formerly troubled with the disorders incident to populous cities, now enjoy the quiet and peaceable estate of a wilderness.

Again,

CHAP. II. Again, there is a way of killing worse than that of the sword: for, as { Tertullian says upon a different occasion, "Prohibere nasci est occidere;" those governments are in the highest degree guilty of blood, which, by taking from men the means of living, bring some to perish through want, drive others out of the country, and generally dissuade men from marriage, by taking from them all ways of subsisting their families. Notwithstanding all the seditions of Florence, and other cities of Tuscany, the horrid factions of Guelphs and Ghibelins, Neri and Bianchi, nobles and commons, they continued populous, strong, and exceeding rich; but in the space of less than a hundred and fifty years, the peaceable reign of the Medices is thought to have destroyed nine parts in ten of the people of that province. Amongst other things it is remarkable, that when Philip the Second of Spain gave Sienna to the duke of Florence, his ambassador then at Rome sent him word, that he had given away more than six hundred and fifty thousand subjects; and it is not believed there are now twenty thousand souls inhabiting that city and territory. Pisa, Pistoia, Arezzo, Cortona, and other towns, that were then good and populous, are in the like proportion diminished, and Florence more than any. When that city had been long troubled with seditions, tumults, and wars, for the most part unprosperous, they still retained such strength, that when Charles the Eighth of France, being admitted as a friend with his whole army, which soon after conquered the kingdom of Naples, thought to master them, the people, taking arms, struck such a terror into him, that he was glad to depart upon such conditions as they thought fit to impose. Machiavel reports, that in that time Florence alone, with the Val d'Arno, a small territory belonging to that city, could, in a few hours, by the sound of a bell, bring together a hundred and thirty-five thousand well armed men; whereas now that city, with all the others in that province, are brought to such despicable weakness, emptiness, poverty, and baseness, that they can neither resist the oppressions of their own prince, nor defend him or themselves, if they were assaulted by a foreign enemy. The people are dispersed or destroyed, and the best families sent to seek habitations in Venice, Genoa, Rome, Naples, and Lucca. This is not the effect of war or pestilence; they enjoy a perfect peace, and suffer no other plague than the government they are under. But he who has thus cured them of disorders and tumults, does, in my opinion, deserve no greater praise than a physician, who should boast there was not a sick person in a house committed to his care, when he had poisoned all that were in it. The Spaniards have established the like peace in the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the West-Indies, and other places. The Turks by the same means prevent tumults in their dominions. And they are of such efficacy in all places, that Mario Chigi brother to pope Alexander the Seventh, by one sordid cheat upon the sale of corn, is said within eight years to have destroyed above a third part of the people in the ecclesiastical state; and that country which was the strength of the Romans in the time of the Carthaginian wars, suffered more by the covetousness and fraud of that villain, than by all the defeats received from Hannibal.

Guicciard.

It

It were an endless work to mention all the places where this peaceable SECT. 26.
solitude has been introduced by absolute monarchy; but popular and regular governments have always applied themselves to increase the number, strength, power, riches, and courage of their people, by providing comfortable ways of subsistence for their own citizens, inviting strangers, and filling them all with such a love to their country, that every man might look upon the public cause as his own, and be always ready to defend it. This may sometimes give occasion to tumults and wars, as the most vigorous bodies may fall into distempers: when every one is solicitous for the public, there may be difference of opinion, and some, by mistaking the way, may bring prejudice when they intend profit: but unless a tyrant do arise, and destroy the government which is the root of their felicity; or they be overwhelmed by the irresistible power of a virtue or fortune greater than their own, they soon recover, and, for the most part, rise up in greater glory and prosperity than before. This was seen in the commonwealths of Greece and Italy, which for this reason were justly called nurseries of virtue, and their magistrates preservers of men; whereas our author's peace-making monarchs can deserve no better title than that of enemies and destroyers of mankind.

I cannot think him in earnest, when he exaggerates Sylla's cruelties as a proof, that the mischiefs suffered under free states are more universal, than under kings and tyrants: for there never was a tyrant in the world, if he was not one, tho' through weariness, infirmity of body, fear, or perhaps the horror of his own wickedness, he at length resigned his power; but the evil had taken root so deep, that it could not be removed: there was nothing of liberty remaining in Rome: the laws were overthrown by the violence of the sword: the remaining contest was, who should be lord; and there is no reason to believe, that if Pompey had gained the battle of Pharsalia, he would have made a more modest use of his victory than Cæsar did; or that Rome would have been more happy under him than under the other. His cause was more plausible because the senate followed him, and Cæsar was the in-vader; but he was no better in his person, and his designs seem to have been the same. He had been long before "suarum legum auctor & everfor." He gave the beginning to the first triumvirate; and it were folly to think, that he who had been insolent when he was not come to the highest pitch of fortune, would have proved moderate if success had put all into his hands.
The proceedings of Marius, Cinna, Catiline, Octavius, and Antonius, were all of the same nature. No laws were observed; no public good intended;
the ambition of private persons reigned; and whatsoever was done by them, or for their interests, can no more be applied to popular, aristocratical, or mixed governments, than the furies of Caligula and Nero.

S E C T. XXVII.

The mischiefs and cruelties proceeding from tyranny, are greater than any that come from popular or mixed governments.

IT is now time to examine the reasons of our author's general maxims. "The cruelties," says he, "of a tyrant extend ordinarily no farther than some particular men that offend him, and not to the whole kingdom. It is truly said of his late majesty king James, a king can never be so notoriously vicious, but he will generally favour justice, and maintain some order. Even cruel Domitian, Dionysius the tyrant, and many others, are commended in histories as great observers of justice, except in particular cases, wherein his inordinate lusts may carry him away." This may be said of popular governments; for tho' a people through error do sometimes hurt a private person, and that may possibly result to the public damage, because the man that is offended or destroyed, might have been useful to the society, they never do it otherwise than by error; for, having the government in themselves, whatever is prejudicial to it, is so to them; and if they ruin it, they ruin themselves, which no man ever did willingly and knowingly. In absolute monarchies the matter is quite otherwise. A prince that sets up an interest in himself, becomes an enemy to the public: in following his own lusts he offends all, except a few of his corrupt creatures, by whose help he oppresses others with a yoke they are unwilling to bear, and thereby incurs the universal hatred. This hatred is always proportionable to the injuries received, which being extreme, that must be so too; and every people being powerful in comparison to the prince that governs, he will always fear those that hate him, and always hate those he fears. When Luigi Farnese first duke of Parma had by his tyranny incensed the people of that small city, their hatred was not less mortal to him than that of the whole empire had been to Nero; and as the one burned Rome, the other would have destroyed Parma, if he had not been prevented. The like has been, and will be every where, inasmuch as every man endeavours to destroy those he hates and fears; and the greatness of the danger often drives this * fear to rage and madness. For this reason Caligula wished but one neck to all the people; and Nero triumphed over the burning city, thinking by that ruin he had prevented his own danger. I know not who the good authors are that commend Domitian for his justice; but Tacitus calls him "principem virtutibus infestum;" and it is hard to find out how such a man can be an observer of justice, unless it be just, that whoever dares to be virtuous under a vicious and base prince should be destroyed. Another † author of the same time, speaking of

Tac. in vit.
Agric,

* Cuncta ferit, dum cuncta timet. Lucan.

† Cum jam semianimem laceraret Flavius orbem Tertius, & calvo serviret Roma tyranno. Juvenal.

of him, does not say he was unjust, but gives us reason to think he was so, SECT. 27.
 unless it were just for him, who had a power over the best part of the world, } to destroy it; and that he, who by his cruelty had brought it to the last gasp, would have finished the work, if his rage had not been extinguished.

Many princes not having in themselves power to destroy their people, have stirred up foreign nations against them, and placed the only hopes of their safety in the public calamity; and lawful kings, when they have fallen into the first degree of madness, so as to assume a power above that which was allowed by the law, have in fury proved equal to the worst usurpers. Cleonymus of Sparta was of this sort: he became, says Plutarch, an enemy to the Plut. vit.
 city, because they would not allow him the absolute power he affected; and Pyrr.
 brought Pyrrhus, the fiercest of their enemies, with a mighty and excellently well disciplined army, to destroy them. Vortigern the Briton called in the Math. West.
 Saxons with the ruin of his own people, who were incensed against him for his lewdness, cruelty, and baseness. King John for the like reasons offered the kingdom of England to the Moors, and to the pope. Peter the Cruel, and other kings of Castille, brought vast armies of Moors into Spain, to the ruin of their own people, who detested their vices, and would not part with their privileges. Many other examples of the like nature might be alledged; and I wish our own experience did not too well prove that such designs are common. Let him that doubts this, examine the causes of the wars with Scotland in the years 1639, 1640; the slaughters of the protestants in Ireland 1641; the whole course of alliances and treaties for the space of fourscore years; the friendship contracted with the French; frequent quarrels with the Dutch, together with other circumstances that are already made too public: if he be not convinced by this, he may soon see a man in the throne, who had rather be a tributary to France than a lawful king of England, whilst either parliament or people shall dare to dispute his commands, insist upon their own rights, or defend a religion inconsistent with that which he has espoused; and then the truth will be so evident as to require no proof.

Grotius was never accused of dealing hardly with kings, or laying too much weight upon imaginary cases; nevertheless, amongst other reasons, that, in his opinion, justify subjects in taking arms against their princes, he alledges this, "propter immanem sævitiam," and "quando rex in populi exitium fer- De jure belli.
tur;" inasmuch as it is "contrary to, and inconsistent with, the ends for "which governments are instituted;" which were most impertinent, if no such thing could be; for that which is not, can have no effect. There are therefore princes who seek the destruction of their people, or none could be justly opposed on that account.

If king James was of another opinion, I could wish the course of his government had been suited to it. When he said, that whilst he had the power of making judges and bishops, he would make that to be law and gospel, which best pleased him, and filled those places with such as turned both according to his will and interests, I must think, that by overthrowing justice, which is the rule of civil and moral actions, and

CHAP. II. { perverting the gospel, which is the light of the spiritual man, he left nothing unattempted that he durst attempt, by which he might bring the most extensive and universal evils upon our nation that any can suffer. This would stand good, tho' princes never erred, unless they were "transported with some inordinate lusts;" for it is hard to find one that does not live in the perpetual power of them. They are naturally subject to the impulse of such appetites as well as others, and whatever evil reigns in their nature is fomented by education. It is the handle by which their flatterers lead them; and he that discovers to what vice a prince is most inclined, is sure to govern him by rendering himself subservient. In this consists the chief art of a courtier, and by this means it comes to pass, that such lusts as in private men are curbed by fear, do not only rage as in a wild beast, but are perpetually inflamed by the malice of their own servants: their hatred to the laws of God or men, that might restrain them, increases in proportion with their vices, or their fears of being punished for them. And when they are come to this, they can set no limits to their fury, and there is no extravagance into which they do not frequently fall. But many of them do not expect these violent motives: the perversity of their own nature carries them to the extremities of evil. They hate virtue for its own sake, and virtuous men for being most unlike to themselves. Virtue is the dictate of reason, or the remains of divine light, by which men are made beneficent and beneficial to each other. Religion proceeds from the same spring; and tends to the same end; and the good of mankind so intirely depends upon these two, that no people ever enjoyed any thing worth desiring that was not the product of them; and whatsoever any have suffered that deserves to be abhorred and feared, has proceeded either from the defect of these, or the wrath of God against them. If any prince therefore has been an enemy to virtue and religion, he must also have been an enemy to mankind, and most especially to the people under him. Whatsoever he does against those that excel in virtue and religion, tends to the destruction of the people who subsist by them. I will not take upon me to define who they are, or to tell the number of those that do this: but it is certain there have been such; and I wish I could say they were few in number, or that they had lived in past ages. Tacitus does not fix this upon one prince, but upon all that he writes of; and to give his readers a taste of what he was to write, he says, "that nobility and honours were dangerous, but that virtue brought most certain destruction;" and in another place, that "after the slaughter of many excellent men, Nero resolved to cut down virtue itself, and therefore killed Thraseas Pætus, and Barea Soranus." And whosoever examines the christian or ecclesiastical histories, will find those princes to have been no less enemies to virtue and religion than their predecessors, and consequently enemies to the nations under them, unless religion and virtue be things prejudicial or indifferent to mankind.

C. Tacit.
hist. l. i.
Ann. l. xvi.
21.

But our author may say, these were particular cases; and so was the slaughter of the prophets and apostles, the crucifixion of Christ, and all the villainies that have ever been committed; yet they proceeded from a universal principle of hatred hatred to all that is good, exerting itself as far as it could, to the ruin of SECT. 27. mankind: and nothing but the over-ruling power of God, who resolved to preserve to himself a people, could set bounds to their rage, which in other respects had as full success as our author, or the devil, could have wished.

Dionysius (his other example of justice) deserves observation: more falsehood, lewdness, treachery, ingratitude, cruelty, baseness, avarice, impudence, and hatred to all manner of good, was hardly ever known in a mortal creature. For this reason, Diogenes seeing him at Corinth, tho' in a poor and contemptible condition, said, he rather deserved to have continued in the misery, fears, and villainies, of his tyranny, than to be suffered peaceably to converse with honest men. And if such as these are to be called observers of justice, it must be concluded, that the laws of God, and of men, are either of no value, or contrary to it; and that the destruction of nations is a better work than their preservation. No faith is to be observed: temples may be justly sacked; the best men slain for daring to be better than their masters; and the whole world, if it were in the power of one man, rightly torn in pieces and destroyed.

His reasons for this are as good as his doctrine: "It is," saith he, "the multitude of people, and abundance of riches, that are the glory and strength of every prince: the bodies of his subjects do him service in war, and their goods supply his wants. Therefore if not out of affection to his people, yet out of natural love unto himself, every tyrant desires to preserve the lives and goods of his subjects." I should have thought that princes, tho' tyrants, being God's vicegerents, and fathers of their people, would have fought their good, tho' no advantage had thereby redounded to themselves, but it seems no such thing is to be expected from them. They consider nations, as graziers do their herds and flocks, according to the profit that can be made of them: and if this be so, a people has no more security under a prince, than a herd or flock under their master. Tho' he desire to be a good husband, yet they must be delivered up to the slaughter when he finds a good market, or a better way of improving his land; but they are often foolish, riotous, prodigal, and wantonly destroy their stock, tho' to their own prejudice. We thought that all princes and magistrates had been set up, that under them we might live quietly and peaceably, in all godliness and honesty: but our author teaches us, that they only seek what they can make of our bodies and goods, and that they do not live and reign for us, but for themselves. If this be true, they look upon us not as children, but as beasts, nor do us any good for our own sakes, or because it is their duty, but only that we may be useful to them, as oxen are put into plentiful pastures that they may be strong for labour, or fit for slaughter. This is the divine model of government that he offers to the world. The just magistrate is the minister of God for our good: but this absolute monarch has no other care of us, than as our riches and multitude may increase his own glory and strength. We might easily judge what would be the issue of such a principle, when the being of nations depending upon his will, must also depend upon his opinion, whether the strength, multitude, and riches, of a people, do conduce to the increase of glory and power,

CHAP. II. or not, tho' histories were silent in the case; for these things speak of themselves. The judgment of a single man is not to be relied upon; the best and wisest do often err, the foolish and perverse always; and our discourse is not of what Moses or Samuel would do, but what may come into the fancy of a furious or wicked man, who may usurp the supreme power, or a child, a woman, or a fool, that may inherit it. Besides, the proposition upon which he builds his conclusion, proves often false: for as the riches, power, number, and courage, of our friends, is for our advantage, and that of our enemies threatens us with ruin; those princes only can reasonably believe the strength of their subjects beneficial to them, who govern so as to be assured of their affection, and that their strength will be employed for them: but those who know they are, or deserve to be hated, cannot but think it will be employed against them, and always seek to diminish that which creates their danger. This must certainly befall as many as are lewd, foolish, negligent, imprudent, cowardly, wicked, vitious, or any way unworthy the places they obtain; for their reign is a perpetual exercise of the most extreme and ruinous injustice: every man that follows an honest interest, is prejudiced: every one who finds the power that was ordained for his good, to be turned to his hurt, will be angry, and hate him that does it: if the people be of uncorrupted manners, this hatred will be universal, because every one of them desires that which is just; if composed of good and evil, the first will always be averse to the evil government, and the others endeavouring to uphold it, the safety of the prince must depend upon the prevalence of either party. If the best prove to be the strongest, he must perish: and knowing himself to be supported only by the worst, he will always destroy as many of his enemies as he can; weaken those that remain; enrich his creatures with their spoils and confiscations; by fraud and rapine accumulate treasures to increase the number of his party, and advance them into all places of power and trust, that by their assistance he may crush his adversaries; and every man is accounted his adversary who has either estate, honour, virtue, or reputation. This naturally casts all the power into the hands of those who have no such dangerous qualities, nor any thing to recommend them, but an absolute resignation of themselves to do whatever they are commanded. These men having neither will nor knowledge to do good, as soon as they come to be in power, justice is perverted, military discipline neglected, the public treasures exhausted, new projects invented to raise more; and the prince's wants daily increasing, through their ignorance, negligence, or deceit, there is no end of their devices and tricks to gain supplies. To this end, swarms of spies, informers, and false witnesses, are sent out to circumvent the richest and most eminent men: the tribunals are filled with court-parasites of profligate consciences, fortunes, and reputation, that no man may escape who is brought before them. If crimes are wanting, the diligence of well-chosen officers and prosecutors, with the favour of the judges, supply all defects; the law is made a snare; virtue suppressed, vice fomented, and, in a short time, honesty and knavery, sobriety and lewdness, virtue and vice, become badges of the several factions; factions; and every man's conversation and manners shewing to what party he is addicted, the prince who makes himself head of the worst, must favour them to the overthrow of the best, which is so streight a way to an universal ruin, that no state can prevent it, unless that course be interrupted. SECT. 28.

These things considered, no general judgment can be made of a magistrate's counsels, from his name or duty. He that is just, and become grateful to the people by doing good, will find his own honour and security in increasing their number, riches, virtue, and power: if on the other side, by doing evil, he has drawn upon himself the public hatred, he will always endeavour to take from them the power of doing him any hurt, by bringing them into the utmost weakness, poverty, and baseness. And whoever would know whether any particular prince desires to encrease or destroy the bodies and goods of his subjects, must examine whether his government be such as renders him grateful or odious to them; and whether he do pursue the public interest, or for the advancement of his own authority set up one in himself contrary to that of his people; which can never befall a popular government, and consequently, no mischief equal to it can be produced by any such, unless something can be imagined worse than corruption and destruction.

S E C T. XXVIII.

Men living under popular or mixed governments are more careful of the public good, than in absolute monarchies.

OUR author delighting in strange things, does in the next place, with an admirable sagacity, discover two faults in popular governments, that were never found by any man before him; and these are no less than ignorance and negligence. Speaking of the care of princes to preserve their subjects, he adds, "On the contrary, in a popular state, every man knows the public good doth not wholly depend upon his care, but the commonwealth may be well enough governed by others, tho' he only tend his private business." And a little below, "Nor are they much to be blamed for their negligence, since it is an even wager their ignorance may be as great. The magistrates amongst the people being for the most part annual, do always lay down their office before they understand it; so as a prince of a duller understanding must needs excel them." This is bravely determined, and the world is beholden to Filmer for the discovery of the errors that have hitherto been epidemical. Most men had believed, that such as live in free states, are usually pleased with their condition, desire to maintain it; and every man finding his own good comprehended in the public, as those that sail in the same ship, employs the talent he has in endeavouring to preserve it, knowing that he must perish if that miscarry. This was an encouragement to industry; and the continual labours and dangers to which the Romans, and

CHAP. II. and other free nations, exposed themselves, have been taken for testimonies that they thought themselves concerned in the businesses that passed among them, and that every one did not neglect them through an opinion that they would be done well enough by others. It was also thought, that free cities, by frequent elections of magistrates, became nurseries of great and able men, every man endeavouring to excel others, that he might be advanced to the honour he had no other title to than what might arise from his merit or reputation; in which they succeeded so well, that one of them may be justly said to have produced more eminent men, than all the absolute monarchies that have been in the world. But these were mistakes. Perhaps Brutus, Valerius, and other Roman senators or magistrates, for the space of three hundred years, might have taken some care of the commonwealth, if they had thought it wholly depended upon one of them. But believing it would be well enough governed by others, they neglected it. Camillus, Cincinnatus, Papirius, Fabius, Rullus and Maximus, Scipio Africanus, Amilcar, Hannibal, Pericles, Themistocles, Alcibiades, Epaminondas, Philopœmen, and others, might have proved able men in affairs of war or government; but they were removed from their offices before they understood them, and must needs be excelled in both by princes, tho' of duller understanding. This may be enough to excuse them for performing their duty so slackly and meanly: but it is strange, that Tacitus, and others, should so far overlook the reason, and so grossly mistake the matter of fact, as not only to say, that great and excellent spirits failed when liberty was lost, and all preferments given to those who were most propense to slavery; but that there wanted men even to write the history, "inscitia reipublicæ ut alienæ." They never applied themselves to understand affairs depending upon the will of one man, in whom they were no otherwise concerned, than to avoid the effects of his rage; and that was chiefly to be done, by not falling under the suspicion of being virtuous. This was the study then in request; and the most cunning in this art were called "scientes temporum:" no other wisdom was esteemed in that and the ensuing ages, and no more was required, since the paternal care, deep wisdom, and profound judgment of the princes provided for all; and tho' they were of duller understandings, they must needs excel other magistrates, who having been created only for a year, left their offices before they could understand the duties of them. This was evidenced by that tenderness, and sincerity of heart, as well as the great purity of manners, observed in Tiberius; the clemency, justice, solid judgment, and frugality, of Caligula; the industry, courage, and sobriety, of Claudius; the good-nature, and prudent government, of Nero; the temperance, vivacity, and diligence of Vitellius; the liberality of Galba and Vespasian; together with the encouragement given by Domitian, Commodus, Heliogabalus, and many others, to all manner of virtues, and favours conferred upon those that excelled in them. Our author, giving such infallible proof of his integrity and understanding, by teaching us these things that would never have come into our heads, ought to be credited, tho' that which he proposes seem to be most absurd. But if we believe such as lived in those times, or those who in later ages have perused

Tacit. Ann.
i.

perused their writings, we cannot but think the princes before-mention-SECT. 28.
ed, and the greatest part of those, who possessed the same place, not only to have been void of all virtue, and to have suffered none to grow up under them, but in baseness, sottishness, and malice, to have been equal to the worst of all beasts. Whilst one prince, polluted with lust and blood, sat in his grotto at Capreæ, surrounded with an infamous troop of astrologers; and others were governed by whores, bardaches, manumised slaves, and other villains; the empire was ruined through their negligence, incapacity, and wickedness; and the city that had flourished in all manner of virtue, as much or more than any that has been yet known in the world, produced no more; the discipline was dissolved that nourished it; no man could hope to advance a public good, or obviate an evil, by his diligence and valour; and he who acquired reputation by either, could expect no other reward than a cruel death.
If Germanicus and Corbulo, who were born when liberty was expiring, be brought for examples against the first part of my assertion, their ends will justify the latter; and no eminent Roman family is known to have brought forth a man that deserved to be named in history since their time. This is as probable in reason, as true in fact. Men are valiant and industrious, when they fight for themselves, and their country; they prove excellent in all the arts of war and peace, when they are bred up in virtuous exercises, and taught by their fathers and masters to rejoice in the honours gained by them: they love their country, when the good of every particular man is comprehended in the public prosperity, and the success of their achievements is improved to the general advantage: they undertake hazards and labours for the government, when it is justly administered; when innocence is safe, and virtue honoured;
when no man is distinguished from the vulgar, but such as have distinguished themselves by the bravery of their actions; when no honour is thought too great for those who do it eminently, unless it be such as cannot be communicated to others of equal merit: they do not spare their persons, purses, or friends, when the public powers are employed for the public benefit, and imprint the like affections in their children from their infancy. The discipline of obedience, in which the Romans were bred, taught them to command:
and few were admitted to the magistracies of inferior rank, till they had given such proof of their virtue as might deserve the supreme. Cincinnatus, Camillus, Papirius, Mamercus, Fabius Maximus, were not made dictators, that they might learn the duties of the office; but because they were judged to be of such wisdom, valour, integrity, and experience, that they might be safely trusted with the highest powers; and, whilst the law reigned, not one was advanced to that honour, who did not fully answer what was expected from him. By this means the city was so replenished with men fit for the greatest employments, that even in its infancy, when three hundred and six of the Fabii, "quorum neminem," says Livy, "ducem sperneret quibuscumque tem-
"poribus senatus," were killed in one day, the city did lament the loss; but was not so weakened to give any advantage to their enemies: and when everyone of those who had been eminent before the second Punic war, Fabius Maximus

CHAP. II. Maximus only excepted, had perished in it, others arose in their places, who surpassed them in number, and were equal to them in virtue. The city was a perpetual spring of such men as long as liberty lasted; but that was no sooner overthrown, than virtue was torn up by the roots; the people became base and fordid, the small remains of the nobility slothful and effeminate, and their Italian associates becoming like to them, the empire, whilst it stood, was only sustained by the strength of foreigners.

The Grecian virtue had the same fate, and expired with liberty: instead of such soldiers as in their time had no equals, and such generals of armies and fleets, legislators and governors, as all succeeding ages have justly admired, they sent out swarms of fiddlers, jesters, chariot-drivers, players, bawds, flatterers, ministers of the most impure lusts; or idle, babbling, hypocritical philosophers, not much better than they. The emperors courts were always crowded with this vermin; and notwithstanding the necessity our author imagines, that princes must needs understand matters of government better than magistrates annually chosen, they did for the most part prove so brutish as to give themselves, and the world, to be governed by such as these, and that without any great prejudice, since none could be found more ignorant, lewd, and base, than themselves.

It is absurd to impute this to the change of times; for time changes nothing; and nothing was changed in those times, but the government, and that changed all things. This is not accidental, but according to the rules given to nature by God, imposing upon all things a necessity of perpetually following their causes. Fruits are always of the same nature with the seeds and roots from which they come, and trees are known by the fruits they bear: as a man begets a man, and a beast a beast, that society of men which constitutes a government upon the foundation of justice, virtue, and the common good, will always have men to promote those ends; and that which intends the advancement of one man's desires and vanity, will abound in those that will foment them. All men follow that which seems advantageous to themselves. Such as are bred under a good discipline, and see that all benefits, procured to their country by virtuous actions, redound to the honour and advantage of themselves, their children, friends, and relations, contract, from their infancy, a love to the public, and look upon the common concerns as their own. When they have learnt to be virtuous, and see that virtue is in esteem, they seek no other preferments than such as may be obtained that way; and no country ever wanted great numbers of excellent men, where this method was established. On the other side, when it is evident, that the best are despised, hated, or marked out for destruction; all things calculated to the humour or advantage of one man, who is often the worst, or governed by the worst; honours, riches, commands, and dignities, disposed by his will, and his favour gained only by a most obsequious respect, or a pretended affection to his person, together with a servile obedience to his commands, all application to virtuous actions will cease; and no man caring to render himself or his children worthy of great employments, such as desire to have them will,
by

by little intrigues, corruption, scurrility, and flattery, endeavour to make way SECT. 28.
to them; by which means true merit in a short time comes to be abolished, {
as fell out in Rome as soon as the Cæsars began to reign.

He who does not believe this, may see whether the like did not happen in all the other commonwealths of Italy and Greece; or if modern examples are thought to be of more value, let him examine whether the noblemen of Venice, who are born and bred in families that never knew a master, who act for themselves, and have a part in all the good or evil that befalls the commonwealth, and know, that if it be destroyed, they must perish, or at least, that all changes are to their prejudice, do neglect the public interests, as thinking, that the whole not depending upon any one of them, things will be well enough governed, tho' they attend only their private benefit. Let it be observed whether they do better understand the common concerns, than the great men of France or Spain, who never come to the knowledge of any thing, unless they happen to be favoured by the king, or his ministers, and know themselves never to be more miserable than when their master is most prosperous. For my own part, I cannot think it necessary to alledge any other proof of this point, than that when Maximilian the emperor, Lewis Paol. Paruta the Twelfth of France, the fierce pope Julius the Second, and Ferdinand the hist. Venet.
subtle, powerful, and bold king of Spain, had, by the league of Cambray, Guicciard.
combined against the Venetians, gained the battle of la Ghirad'adda, taken Alviano their general prisoner, deprived them of all their dominion on the Terra firma, and prepared to assault the city, it was, under God, solely preserved by the vigour and wisdom of their nobility, who, tho' no-way educated to war, unless by sea, sparing neither persons nor purses, did with admirable industry and courage first recover Padoua, and then many other cities, so as at the end of that terrible war they came off without any diminution of their territories: whereas Portugal having in our age revolted from the house of Austria, no one doubts, that it had been immediately reduced, if the great men of Spain had not been pleased with such a lessening of their master's power, and resolved not to repair it by the recovery of that kingdom, or to deprive themselves of an easy retreat when they should be oppressed by him, or his favourites. The like thought was more plainly expressed by the Mareschal de Bassompierre, who seeing how hardly Rochel was pressed by Lewis the Thirteenth, said, * "he thought they should be such fools to take it:" but it is believed they would never have been such fools; and the treachery only of our countrymen did enable the cardinal Richelieu to do it (as for his own glory, and the advancement of the popish cause, he really intended): and nothing is, to this day, more common in the mouth of their wisest and best men, tho' papists, than the acknowledgment of their own folly in suffering that place to fall, the king having by that means gotten power to proceed against them at his pleasure. The brave monsieur de Turenne is said to have carried this to a greater height in his last discourse to the present king of

F f France:

* Je croy qu'enfin nous serons assez fous pour prendre la Rochelle. Mem. de Bassompierre.

CHAP. II. France: "You think, said he, you have armies, but you have none; the " one half of the officers are the bawdy-house companions of monsieur de
 " xxx, or the creatures of his whore madam de xxx: the other half may " be men of experience, and fit for their employments; but they are such " as would be pleased with nothing more than to see you lose two or three " battles, that coming to stand in need of them, you might cause them to " be better used by your ministers than of late they have been." It may easily be imagined how men in such sentiments do serve their master; and nothing is more evident, than that the French in this age have had so great advantages, that they might have brought Europe, and perhaps Asia, under their power, if the interest of the nation had been united to that of the government, and the strength, vigour, and bravery, of the nobility employed that way. But since it has pleased God to suffer us to fall into a condition of being little able to help ourselves, and that they are in so good terms with the Turk as not to attack him, it is our happiness that they do not know their own strength, or cannot, without ruin to themselves, turn it to our prejudice.

* The parliament of 1641.

I could give yet more pregnant testimonies of the difference between men fighting for their own interests in the offices to which they had been advanced by the votes of numerous assemblies, and such as serve for pay, and get pre-ferments by corruption or favour, if I were not unwilling to stir the spleen of some men by obliging them to reflect upon what has passed in our own age and country; to compare the justice of our tribunals within the time of our memory, and the integrity of those who * for a while managed the public treasure; the discipline, valour, and strength, of our armies and fleets; the increase of our riches and trade; the success of our wars in Scotland, Ireland, and at sea, the glory and reputation not long since gained, with that condition into which we are of late fallen. But I think I shall offend no wise or good man, if I say, that as neither the Romans, nor Grecians, in the time of their liberty, ever performed any actions more glorious, than freeing the country from a civil war that had raged in every part, the conquest of two such kingdoms as Scotland and Ireland, and crushing the formidable power of the Hollanders by sea; nor ever produced more examples of valour, industry, integrity, and in all respects complete, disinterested, unmoveable, and incorruptible virtue, than were at that time seen in our nation: so neither of them, upon the change of their affairs, did exceed us in weakness, cowardice, base-ness, venality, lewdness, and all manner of corruption. We have reason therefore not only to believe, that all princes do not necessarily understand the affairs of their people, or provide better for them than those who are otherwise chosen; but that, as there is nothing of greatness, power, riches, strength, and happiness, which we might not reasonably have hoped for, if we had rightly improved the advantages we had, so there is nothing of shame and misery which we may not justly fear, since we have neglected them.

If any man think that this evil of advancing officers for personal respects, favour or corruption, is not of great extent, I desire him to consider, that
 the

the officers of state, courts of justice, church, armies, fleets, and corpora-
SECT. 28.
 tions, are of such number and power, as wholly to corrupt a nation, when they themselves are corrupted; and will ever be corrupt, when they attain to their offices by corruption. The good management of all affairs, civil, military, and ecclesiastical, necessarily depends upon good order and discipline; and it is not in the power of common men to reform abuses patronized by those in authority, nor to prevent the mischiefs thereupon ensuing; and, not having power to direct public actions to the public good, they must consequently want the industry and affection that is required to bring them to a good issue. The Romans were easily beaten under the decemviri, tho' immediately before the erection, and after the extinction, of that power, none of their neighbours were able to resist them. The Goths, who with much glory had reigned in Spain for about three hundred years, had neither strength nor courage under their lewd and odious king Rodrigo, and were in one day subdued with little loss of blood by the Saracens, and could not in less than eight hundred years free their country from them. That brave nation, having of late fallen under as base a conduct, has now as little heart or power to defend itself: court parasites have rendered valour ridiculous; and they who have ever shewed themselves as much inclined to arms as any people of the world, do now abhor them, and are sent to the wars by force, laid in carts, and bound like calves brought to the shambles, and left to starve in Flanders, as soon as they arrive. It may easily be judged what service can be expected from such men, tho' they should happen to be well commanded: but the great officers, by the corruption of the court, think only of enriching themselves; and, increasing the misery of the soldiers by their frauds, both become equally useless to the state.

Notwithstanding the seeming prosperity of France, matters there are not much better managed. The warlike temper of that people is so worn out by the frauds and cruelties of corrupt officers, that few men list themselves willingly to be soldiers; and, when they are engaged or forced, they are so little able to endure the miseries to which they are exposed, that they daily run away from their colours, tho' they know not whither to go, and expect no mercy, if they are taken. The king has in vain attempted to correct this humour by the severity of martial law: but mens minds will not be forced;
 and tho' his troops are perfectly well armed, clothed, and exercised, they have given many testimonies of little worth. When the prince of Condé had by his own valour, and the strength of the king's guards, broken the first line of the prince of Orange's army at the battle of Seneff, and put the rest into disorder, he could not make the second and third line of his own army to advance, and reinforce the first, by which means, he lost all the fair hopes he had conceived of an intire victory. Not long after, the mareschal de Crequi was abandoned by his whole army near Trier, who ran away, hardly striking a stroke, and left him with sixteen horse to shift for himself. When monsieur de Turenne, by the excellency of his conduct and valour, had gained such a reputation amongst the soldiers, that they thought themselves secure under him, he did not suffer such disgraces; but

CHAP. II. he being killed, they returned to the usual temper of forced and ill-used soldiers; half the army was lost in a retreat, little differing from a flight; and the rest, as they themselves confess, saved by the bravery of two English regiments. The prince of Condé was soon after sent to command; but he could not, with all his courage, skill, and reputation, raise their fallen spirits, nor preserve his army any other way, than by lodging them in a camp near Schlestadt, so fortified by art and nature, that it could not be forced.

To these we may add some examples of our own. In our late war, the Scots foot, whether friends or enemies, were much inferior to those of the parliament, and their horse esteemed as nothing. Yet in the year 1639. and 1640. the king's army, tho' very numerous, excellently armed and mounted, and, in appearance, able to conquer many such kingdoms as Scotland, being under the conduct of courtiers, and affected as men usually are towards those that use them ill, and seek to destroy them, they could never resist a wretched army commanded by Leven; but were shamefully beaten at Newborn, and left the northern counties to be ravaged by them.

When Van Tromp set upon Blake in Foleston-Bay, the Parliament had not above thirteen ships against threescore, and not a man that had ever seen any other fight at sea, than between a merchant-ship and a pirate, to oppose the best captain in the world, attended with many others in valour and experience not much inferior to him. Many other difficulties were observed in the unsettled state: few ships, want of money, several factions, and some, who to advance particular interests betrayed the public. But such was the power of wisdom and integrity in those that sat at the helm, and their diligence in chusing men only for their merit was blessed with such success, that in two years our fleets grew to be as famous as our land-armies; the reputation and power of our nation rose to a greater height, than when we possessed the better half of France, and the kings of France and Scotland were our prisoners. All the states, kings, and potentates of Europe, most respectfully, not to say submissively, sought our friendship; and Rome was more afraid of Blake and his fleet, than they had been of the great king of Sweden, when he was ready to invade Italy with a hundred thousand men. This was the work of those, who, if our author says true, "thought basely of the public concerns;" and, believing things must be well enough managed by others, minded only their private affairs. These were the effects of the negligence and ignorance of those, who, being suddenly advanced to offices, were removed before they understood the duties of them. These diseases, which proceed from popular corruption and irregularity, were certainly cured by the restitution of that integrity, good order and stability, that accompany divine monarchy. The justice of the war made against Holland in the year 1665. the probity of the gentleman, who, without partiality or bribery, chose the most part of the officers that carried it on; the wisdom, diligence, and valour, manifested in the conduct, and the glory with which it was ended, justifies all that our author can say in its commendation. If any doubt remains, the subtilty of making the king of France desire that the Netherlands might be an accession to his crown; the ingenious ways taken taken by us to facilitate the conquest of them; the industry of our embassa-dors, in diverting the Spaniards from entering into the war till it was too late to recover the losses sustained; the honourable design upon the Smyrna fleet, and our frankness in taking the quarrel upon ourselves; together with the important figure we now make in Europe, may wholly remove it; and in confirmation of our author's doctrine, shew, that princes do better perform the offices that require wisdom, industry, and valour, than annual magistrates; and do more seldom err in the choice of officers, than senates and popular assemblies.

SECT. 29.

S E C T. XXIX.

There is no assurance that the distempers of a state shall be cured by the wisdom of a prince.

"BUT," says our author, "the virtue and wisdom of a prince supplies all. Tho' he were of a duller understanding, by use and experience he must needs excel all:" Nature, age, or sex, are, as it seems, nothing to the case. A child as soon as he comes to be a king, has experience; the head of a fool is filled with wisdom, as soon as a crown is set upon it, and the most vitious do in a moment become virtuous. This is more strange than that an ass being trained to a course, should outrun the best Arabian horse; or a hare bred up in an army, become more strong and fierce than a lion;
 for fortune does not only supply all natural defects in princes, and correct their vices, but gives them the benefit of use and experience, when they have none. Some reasons and examples might have been expected to prove this extraordinary proposition: but according to his laudable custom, he is pleased to trouble himself with neither; and thinks, that the impudence of an assertion is sufficient to make that to pass, which is repugnant to experience and common sense, as may appear by the following discourse.

I will not insist upon terms; for tho' "duller understanding" signifies nothing, inasmuch as no understanding is dull, and a man is said to be dull only because he wants it; but presuming he means little understanding, I shall so take it. This defect may possibly be repaired in time; but to conclude it must be so, is absurd, for no one has this use and experience when he begins to reign. At that time many errors may be committed to the ruin of himself or people, and many have perished even in their beginning. Edward the Fifth and Sixth of England, Francis the Second of France, and divers other kings, have died in the beginning of their youth: Charles the Ninth lived only to add the furies of youth to the follies of his childhood; and our Henry the Second, Edward the Second, Richard the Second, and Henry the Sixth, seem to have been little wiser in the last, than in the first year of their reign or life. The present kings of Spain, France, and Sweden,

CHAP. II. Sweden, came to the crowns they wear before the Sixth year of their age; and if they did then surpass all annual magistrates in wisdom and valour, it was by a peculiar gift of God, which, for any thing we know, is not given to every king, and it was not use and experience that made them to excel. If it be pretended, that this experience, with the wisdom that it gives, comes in time, and by degrees; I may modestly ask, what time is required to render a prince excellent in wisdom who is a child or a fool? And who will give security that he shall live to that time, or that the kingdom shall not be ruined in the time of his folly? I may also doubt how our author, who concludes, that every king, in time, must needs become excellent in wisdom, can be reconciled to Solomon, who in preferring a wise child before an old and foolish king that will not be advised, shews that an old king may be a fool, and he that will not be advised is one. Some are so naturally brutish and stupid, that neither education nor time will mend them. It is probable that Solomon took what care he could to instruct his only son Rehoboam; but he was certainly a fool at forty years of age, and we have no reason to believe that he deserved a better name. He seems to have been the very fool his father intended, who, tho' brayed in a mortar, would never leave his folly: he would not be advised, tho' the hand of God was against him; ten tribes revolted from him, and the city and temple was pillaged by the Egyptians. Neither experience nor afflictions could mend him, and he is called to this day by his own countrymen "stultitia gentium." I might offend tender ears, if I should alledge all the examples of princes mentioned in history, or known in our own age, who have lived and died as foolish and incorrigible as he: but no man, I presume, will be scandalized, that the ten last kings of Meroveus's race, whom the French historians call "les roys faineants," were so far from excelling other men in understanding, that they lived and died more like to beasts than men. Nay the wisdom and valour of Charles Martel expired in his grandchild Charles the Great; and his posterity grew to be so sottish, that the French nation must have perished under their conduct, if the nobility and people had not rejected them, and placed the crown upon a more deserving head.

This is as much as is necessary to be said to the general proposition; for it is false, if it be not always true; and no conclusion can be made upon it. But I need not be so strict with our author, there being no one sound part in his assertion. Many children come to be kings when they have no experience, and die, or are deposed before they can gain any. Many are by nature so sottish that they can learn nothing: others falling under the power of women, or corrupt favourites and ministers, are persuaded and seduced from the good ways to which their own natural understanding or experience might lead them; the evils drawn upon themselves, or their subjects, by the errors committed in the time of their ignorance, are often grievous, and sometimes irreparable, tho' they should be made wise by time and experience. A person of royal birth, and excellent wit, was so sensible of this as to tell me, "that the condition of kings was most miserable, inasmuch as they never " heard

“heard truth till they were ruined by lyes; and then every one was ready to “tell it to them, not by way of advice, but reproach, and rather to vent “their own spite, than to seek a remedy to the evils brought upon them, “and the people.” Others attain to crowns when they are of full age, and have experience as men, tho’ none as kings; and therefore are apt to commit as great mistakes as children: and, upon the whole matter, all the histories of the world shew, that, instead of this profound judgment, and incomparable wisdom, which our author generally attributes to all kings, there is no sort of men that do more frequently and intirely want it.

But tho’ kings were always wise by nature, or made to be so by experience, it would be of little advantage to nations under them, unless their wisdom were pure, perfect, and accompanied with clemency, magnanimity, justice, valour, and piety. Our author durst hardly have said, that these virtues or graces are gained by experience, or annexed by God to any rank of men or families. He gives them where he pleases without distinction. We sometimes see those upon thrones, who by God and nature seem to have been designed for the most sordid offices; and those have been known to pass their lives in meanness and poverty, who had all the qualities that could be desired in princes. There is likewise a kind of ability to dispatch some sort of affairs, that princes who continue long in a throne may to a degree acquire or increase. Some men take this for wisdom; but K. James more rightly called it by the name of “king-craft;” and as it principally consists in dissimulation, and the arts of working upon mens passions, vanities, private interests, or vices, to make them for the most part instruments of mischief, it has the advancement or security of their own persons for its object; is frequently exercised with all the excesses of pride, avarice, treachery, and cruelty; and no men have been ever found more notoriously to deflect from all that deserves praise in a prince, or a gentleman, than those that have most excelled in it. Pharasmenes king of Iberia is recorded by Tacitus to have been well versed in this science. His brother Mithridates king of Armenia had married his daughter, and given his own daughter to Rhadamis-tus son of Pharasmenes. He had some contests with Mithridates; but, by the help of these mutual alliances, nearness of blood, the diligence of Rha-damistus, and an oath, strengthened with all the ceremonies that amongst those nations were esteemed most sacred, not to use arms or poison against him, all was composed; and, by this means getting him into his power, he stifled him with a great weight of cloaths thrown upon him, killed his children, and not long after his own son Rhadamistus also. Louis the Eleventh of France, James the Third of Scotland, Henry the Seventh of England, were great masters of these arts; and those who are acquainted with history, will easily judge, how happy nations would be, if all kings did in time certainly learn them.

Our author, as a farther testimony of his judgment, having said that kings must needs excel others in understanding, and grounded his doctrine upon their profound wisdom, imputes to them those “base and panic fears,” which are inconsistent with it, or any royal virtue; and to carry his point higher, tells

CHAP. II. tells us, "There is no tyrant so barbarously wicked, but his own reason and sense will tell him, that tho' he be a God, yet he must die like a man; and that there is not the meanest of his subjects, but may find a means to revenge himself of the injuries offered him;" and from thence concludes, that "there is no such tyranny as that of a multitude, which is subject to no such fears." But if there be such a thing in the world, as a barbarous and wicked tyrant, he is something different from a king, or the same; and his wisdom is consistent or inconsistent with barbarity, wickedness, and tyranny. If there be no difference, the praises he gives, and the rights he ascribes to the one, belong also to the other: and the excellency of wisdom may consist with barbarity, wickedness, tyranny, and the panic fears that accompany them; which hitherto have been thought to comprehend the utmost excesses of folly and madness: and I know no better testimony of the truth of that opinion, than that wisdom always distinguishing good from evil, and being seen only in the rectitude of that distinction, in following and adhering to the good, rejecting that which is evil, preferring safety before danger, happiness before misery, and in knowing rightly how to use the means of attaining or preserving the one, and preventing or avoiding the other, there cannot be a more extravagant deviation from reason, than for a man who in a private condition might live safely and happily, to invade a principality; or if he be a prince, who by governing with justice and clemency might obtain the inward satisfaction of his own mind, hope for the blessing of God upon his just and virtuous actions, acquire the love and praises of men, and live in safety and happiness amongst his safe and happy subjects, to fall into that barbarity, wickedness, and tyranny, which brings upon him the displeasure of God, and detestation of men, and which is always attended with those base and panic fears, that comprehend all that is shameful and miserable. This being perceived by Machiavel, he could not think, that any man in his senses would not rather be a Scipio than a Cæsar; or, if he came to be a prince, would not rather chuse to imitate Agefilaus, Timoleon, or Dion, than Nabis, Phalaris, or Dionysius; and imputes the contrary choice to madness. Nevertheless, it is too well known, that many of our author's profound wise men in the depth of their judgment, made perfect by use and experience, have fallen into it.

Discors. sopra
T. Liv. l. i.
c. 10.

If there be a difference between this barbarous wicked tyrant, and a king, we are to examine who is the tyrant, and who the king; for the name conferred or assumed cannot make a king, unless he be one. He who is not a king, can have no title to the rights belonging to him who is truly a king: so that a people who find themselves wickedly and barbarously oppressed by a tyrant, may destroy him, and his tyranny, without giving offence to any king.

But it is strange that Filmer should speak of the barbarity and wickedness of a tyrant, who looks upon the world to be the patrimony of one man; and, for the foundation of his doctrine, asserts such a power in every one that makes himself master of any part, as cannot be limited by any law. His title is not to be questioned; usurpation and violence confer an incontestable right: the exercise of his power is no more to be disputed than the acquisition: his will is a law to his subjects: and no law can be imposed by them upon his conduct.

conduct. For if these things be true, I know not how any man could ever SECT. 29.
 be called a tyrant, that name having never been given to any, unless for usurping a power that did not belong to him, or an unjust exercise of that which had been conferred upon him, and violating the laws which ought to be a rule to him. It is also hard to imagine how any man can be called barbarous and wicked, if he be obliged by no law but that of his own pleasure; for we have no other notion of wrong, than that it is a breach of the law which determines what is right. If the lives and goods of subjects depend upon the will of the prince, and he in his profound wisdom preserve them only to be beneficial to himself, they can have no other right than what he gives, and without injustice may retain when he thinks fit: if there be no wrong, there can be no just revenge; and he that pretends to seek it, is not a free man vindicating his right, but a perverse slave rising up against his master. But if there be such a thing as a barbarous and wicked tyrant, there must be a rule relating to the acquisition and exercise of the power, by which he may be distinguished from a just king; and a law superior to his will, by the violation of which he becomes barbarous and wicked.

Tho' our author so far forgets himself, to confess this to be true, he seeks to destroy the fruits of it by such flattery as comprehends all that is most detestable in profaneness and blasphemy, and gives the name of gods to the most execrable of men. He may by such language deserve the name of Hey-lin's disciple; but will find few among the heathens so basely servile, or so boldly impious. Tho' Claudius Cæsar was a drunken sot, and transported with the extravagance of his fortune, he detested the impudence of his predecessor Caligula (who affected that title), and in his rescript to the procurator of Judea, gives it no better name than "turpem Cæii insaniam." For this reason it was rejected by all his pagan successors, who were not as furiously wicked as he: yet Filmer has thought fit to renew it, for the benefit of mankind, and the glory of the christian religion.

I know not whether these extreme and barbarous errors of our author are to be imputed to wickedness or madness; or whether, to save the pains of a distinction, they may not rightly be said to be the same thing; but nothing less than the excess of both could induce him to attribute any thing of good to the fears of a tyrant, since they are the chief causes of all the mischiefs he does. Tertullian says they are "metu quam furore sæviores;" and Tacitus, speaking of a most wicked * king, says, that he did "sævitiā ignaviæ ob-
 "tendere †;" and we do not more certainly find, that cowards are the cru-ellest of men, than that wickedness makes them cowards; that every man's fears bear a proportion with his guilt, and with the number, virtue, and strength, of those he has offended. He who usurps a power over all, or abuses a trust reposed in him by all, in the highest measure offends all; he fears and hates those he has offended, and to secure himself, aggravates the former injuries: when these are public, they beget a universal hatred, and every man

† The words in Tacitus are somewhat different, "dum focors domi, bellis infauftus," "IGNAVIAM SÆVITIA TEGAT;" which give quite another sense, and very foreign to the point.

CHAP. II. desires to extinguish a mischief that threatens ruin to all. This will always be terrible to one that knows he has deserved it; and when those he dreads are the body of the people, nothing but a public destruction can satisfy his rage, and appease his fears.

I wish I could agree with Filmer, in exempting multitudes from fears; for they having seldom committed any injustice, unless through fear, would, as far as human fragility permits, be free from it. Tho' the Attic ostracism was not an extreme punishment, I know nothing usually practised in any commonwealth, that did so much favour of injustice: but it proceeded solely from a fear that one man, tho' in appearance virtuous, when he came to be raised too much above his fellow-citizens, might be tempted to invade the public liberty. We do not find, that the Athenians, or any other free cities, ever injured any man, unless through such a jealousy, or the perjury of witnesses, by which the best tribunals that ever were, or can be established in the world, may be misled; and no injustice could be apprehended from any, if they did not fall into such fears.

But tho' multitudes may have fears as well as tyrants, the causes and effects of them are very different. A people, in relation to domestic affairs, can desire nothing but liberty, and neither hate or fear any but such as do, or would, as they suspect, deprive them of that happiness: their endeavours to secure that seldom hurt any except such as invade their rights; and if they err, the mistake is for the most part discovered before it produce any mischief; and the greatest that ever came that way, was the death of one or a few men. Their hatred and desire of revenge can go no farther than the sense of the injury received or feared, and is extinguished by the death or banishment of the persons; as may be gathered from the examples of the Tarquins, decemviri, Cassius, Melius, and Manlius Capitolinus. He therefore that would know whether the hatred and fear of a tyrant, or of a people, produces the greater mischiefs, needs only to consider, whether it be better, that the tyrant destroy the people, or that the people destroy the tyrant; or at the worst, whether one that is suspected of affecting the tyranny should perish, or a whole people, amongst whom very many are certainly innocent; and experience shews, that such are always first sought out to be destroyed for being so: popular furies or fears, how irregular or unjust soever they may be, can extend no farther; general calamities can only be brought upon a people by those who are enemies to the whole body, which can never be the multitude, for they are that body. In all other respects, the fears that render a tyrant cruel, render a people gentle and cautious; for every single man knowing himself to be of little power, not only fears to do injustice because it may be revenged upon his person, by him, or his friends, kindred, and relations, that suffers it; but because it tends to the overthrow of the government, which comprehends all public and private concerns, and which every man knows cannot subsist unless it be so easy and gentle, as to be pleasing to those who are the best, and have the greatest power: and as the public considerations divert them from doing those injuries that may bring immediate prejudice to the public, so there are strict laws to restrain all such as would would do private injuries. If neither the people nor the magistrates of SECT. 30.

 Venice, Switzerland, and Holland, commit such extravagancies as are usual in other places, it does not perhaps proceed from the temper of those nations different from others, but from a knowledge, that whosoever offers an injury to a private person, or attempts a public mischief, is exposed to the impartial and inexorable power of the law; whereas the chief work of an absolute monarch is to place himself above the law, and thereby rendering himself the author of all the evils that the people suffer, it is absurd to expect that he should remove them.

S E C T. XXX.

A monarchy cannot be well regulated, unless the powers of the monarch are limited by law.

OUR author's next step is not only to reject popular governments, but all such monarchies as are not absolute: "for if the king," says he, "admits the people to be his companions, he leaves to be a king." This is the language of French lackeys, valet-de-chambres, taylor, and others like them in wisdom, learning, and policy, who when they fly to England for fear of a well-deserved gally, gibbet, or wheel, are ready to say, "Il faut que le roit soit absolu, autrement il n'est point roy." And finding no better men to agree with Filmer in this sublime philosophy, I may be pardoned if I do not follow them, till I am convinced in these ensuing points.

1. It seems absurd to speak of kings admitting the nobility or people to part of the government: for tho' there may be, and are, nations without kings, yet no man can conceive a king without a people. These must necessarily have all the power originally in themselves; and tho' kings may and often have a power of granting honours, immunities, and privileges, to private men or corporations, he does it only out of the public stock, which he is entrusted to distribute; but can give nothing to the people, who give to him all that he can rightly have.

2. It is strange, that he who frequently cites Aristotle and Plato, should unluckily acknowledge such only to be kings as they call tyrants, and deny the name of king to those, who, in their opinion, are the only kings.

3. I cannot understand why the Scripture should call those kings whose powers were limited, if they only are kings who are absolute; or why Moses did appoint, that the power of kings in Israel should be limited (if they resolved to have them), if that limitation destroyed the being of a king. Deut. xvii.

4. And lastly, how he knows, that in the kingdoms which have a shew of popularity, the power is wholly in the king.

The first point was proved when we examined the beginning of monar-chies, and found it impossible that there could be any thing of justice in them, unless they were established by the common consent of those who were to live under them; or that they could make any such establishment, unless the right and power were in them.

CHAP. II. Secondly, Neither Plato nor Aristotle acknowledge either reason or justice in the power of a monarch, unless he has more of the virtues conducing to the good of the civil society than all those who compose it; and employ them for the public advantage, and not to his own pleasure and profit, as being set up by those who seek their own good, for no other reason than that he should procure it. To this end a law is set as a rule to him, and the best men, that is such as are most like to himself, made to be his assistants, because, say they, "lex est mens sine affectu, & quasi deus;" whereas the best of men have their affections and passions, and are subject to be misled by them: which shews, that as the monarch is not for himself, nor by himself, he does not give, but receive power, nor admit others to the participation of it, but is by them admitted to what he has. Whereupon they conclude, that to prefer the absolute power of a man, as in those governments which they call "barbarorum regna," before the regular government of kings justly exercising a power instituted by law, and directed to the public good, is to chuse rather to be subject to the lust of a beast, than to be governed by a God. And because such a choice can only be made by a beast, I leave our author to find a description of himself in their books, which he so often cites.

Plat. De leg.
Arist. Polit.

But if Aristotle deserve credit, the princes who reign for themselves and not for the people, preferring their own pleasure or profit before the public, become tyrants; which, in his language, is, enemies to God and man. On this account Boccalini introduces the princes of Europe raising a mutiny against him in Parnassus, for giving such definitions of tyrants as they said comprehended them all; and forcing the poor philosopher to declare by a new definition, that * "tyrants were certain men of antient times, whose race is now extinguished." But with all his wit and learning he could not give a reason why those who do the same things that rendered the antient tyrants detestable, should not be so also in our days.

In the third place, the Scriptures declare the necessity of setting bounds to those who are placed in the highest dignities. Moses seems to have had as great abilities as any man that ever lived in the world; but he alone was not able to bear the weight of the government, and therefore God appointed seventy chosen men to be his assistants. This was a perpetual law to Israel; and as no king was to have more power than Moses, or more abilities to perform the duties of his office, none could be exempted from the necessity of wanting the like helps. Our author therefore must confess, that they are kings who have them, or that kingly government is contrary to the Scriptures. When God by Moses gave liberty to his people to make a king, he did it under these conditions. "He must be one of their brethren: they must chuse him: he must not multiply gold, silver, wives, or horses: he must not lift up his heart above his brethren." And Josephus paraphrasing upon the place, says, "He shall do nothing without the advice of the sanhedrin; or if he do, they shall oppose him." This agrees with the confession of Zedekiah to Deut. xvii.

Jos. Ant. Jud.

* Che i tiranni furono certi huomini del tempo antico de i quali hoggidi si e perduta la razza.
Boccal. Rag. de Parn.

the princes (which was the sanhedrin), "The king can do nothing with"out you;" and seems to have been in pursuance of the law of the kingdom, which was written in a book, and laid up before the Lord; and could not but agree with that of Moses, unless they spake by different spirits, or that the spirit by which they did speak was subject to error or change: and the whole series of God's law shews, that the pride, magnificence, pomp, and glory, usurped by their kings, was utterly contrary to the will of God. They did lift up their hearts above their brethren, which was forbidden by the law.
 All the kings of Israel, and most of the kings of Judah, utterly rejected it, and every one of them did very much depart from the observation of it. I will not deny, that the people in their institution of a king intended they should do so: they had done it themselves, and would have a king that might uphold them in their disobedience; they were addicted to the idolatry of their accursed neighbours, and desired that government by which it was maintained amongst them. In doing this they did not reject Samuel; but they rejected God, that he should not reign over them. They might perhaps believe, that, unless their king were such as the law did not permit, he would not perform what they intended; or that the name of king did not belong to him, unless he had a power that the law denied. But since God and his prophets give the name of king to the chief magistrate, endowed with a power that was restrained within very narrow limits, whom they might without offence set up, we also may safely give the same to those of the same nature, whether it please Filmer or not.

4. The practice of most nations, and (I may truly say) of all that deserve imitation, has been as directly contrary to the absolute power of one man, as their constitutions: or if the original of many governments lie hid in the impenetrable darkness of antiquity, their progress may serve to shew the intention of the founders. Aristotle seems to think, that the first monarchs, having been chosen for their virtue, were little restrained in the exercise of their power; but that they, or their children, falling into corruption and pride, grew odious; and that nations did on that account either abolish their authority, or create senates, and other magistrates, who, having part of the power, might keep them in order. The Spartan kings were certainly of this nature; and the Persian, till they conquered Babylon. Nay, I may safely say, that neither the kings which the frantic people set up in opposition to the law of God, nor those of the bordering nations, whose example they chose to follow, had that absolute power which our author attributes to all kings as inseparable from the name. Achish the Philistine loved and admired David; he looked upon him as an angel of God; and promised that he should be the keeper of his head for ever; but when the princes suspected him, and said "He "shall not go down with us to battle," he was obliged to dismiss him. This was not the language of slaves, but of those who had a great part in the government; and the king's submission to their will shews, that he was more like to the kings of Sparta, than to an absolute monarch, who does whatever pleases him. I know not whether the Spartans were descended from the Hebrews,

SECT. 30.
 Jer. xxxviii.

Hei Sam. xxix.

CHAP. II. Hebrews, as some think ; but their kings were under a regulation much like that of the xvii of Deut. tho' they had two : their senate of twenty-eight, and the ephori, had a power like to that of the fandedrin ; and by them kings were condemned to fines, imprisonment, banishment, and death, as appears by the examples of Pausanias, Clonymus, Leonidas, Agis, and others. The Hebrew discipline was the same ; " Reges Davidicæ stirpis," says Maimonides, " judicabant & judicabantur." They gave testimony in judgment when they were called, and testimony was given against them : whereas the kings of Israel, as the same author says, were " superbi, corde elati, & spretores legis, " nec judicabant, nec judicabantur ;" proud, insolent, and contemners of the law, who would neither judge, nor submit to judgment as the law commanded. The fruits they gathered were suitable to the seed they had sown : their crimes were not left unpunished : they who despised the law, were destroyed without law ; and when no ordinary course could be taken against them for their excesses, they were overthrown by force, and the crown within the space of a few years transported into nine several families, with the utter extirpation of those that had possessed it. On the other hand, there never was any sedition against the Spartan kings ; and after the moderate discipline, according to which they lived, was established, none of them died by the hands of their subjects, except only two, who were put to death in a way of justice : the kingdom continued in the same races, till Cleomenes was defeated by Antigonus, and the government overthrown by the insolence of the Macedonians. This gave occasion to those bestial tyrants Nabis and Machanidas to set up such a government as our author recommends to the world, which immediately brought destruction upon themselves, and the whole city. The Germans, who pretended to be descended from the Spartans, had the like government. Their princes, according to their merit had the credit of persuading, not the power of commanding ; and the question was not, what part of the government their kings would allow to the nobility and people, but what they would give to their kings ; and it is not much material to our present dispute, whether they learnt this from some obscure knowledge of the law which God gave to his people, or whether, led by the light of reason, which is also from God, they discovered what was altogether conformable to that law. Whoever understands the affairs of Germany, knows that the present emperors, notwithstanding their haughty title, have a power limited as in the days of Tacitus. If they are good and wise, they may persuade ; but they can command no farther than the law allows. They do not admit the princes, noblemen, and cities, to the power which they all exercise in their general diets, and each of them within their own precincts ; but they exercise that which has been by public consent bestowed upon them. All the kingdoms peopled from the north observed the same rules. In all of them the powers were divided between the kings, the nobility, clergy, and commons ; and by the decrees of councils, diets, parliaments, cortez, and assemblies of estates, authority and liberty were so balanced, that such princes as assumed to themselves more than the law did permit, were severely punished ;

More Nevo-
chim.

Ibid.

Tacit. demo-
rib. Germ.

nished; and those who did by force or fraud invade thrones, were by force SECT. 30.
thrown down from them.

This was equally beneficial to kings and people. The powers, as Theopompus king of Sparta said, were most safe, when they were least envied and hated. Lewis the Eleventh of France was one of the first that broke this golden chain; and, by more subtil arts than had been formerly known, subverted the laws, by which the fury of those kings had been restrained, and taught others to do the like; tho' all of them have not so well saved themselves from punishment. James the Third of Scotland was one of his most apt scholars; and * Buchanan, in his life, says, "that he was precipitated into all manner of infamy by men of the most abject condition; that the corruption of those times, and the ill example of neighbouring princes, were considerable motives to pervert him: for Edward the Fourth of England, Charles of Burgundy, Lewis the Eleventh of France, and John the Second of Portugal, had already laid the foundations of tyranny in those countries; and Richard the Third was then most cruelly exercising the same in the kingdom of England."

This could not have been, if all the power had always been in kings, and neither the people, nor the nobility, had ever had any: for no man can be said to gain that which he, and his predecessors, always possessed, or to take from others that which they never had; nor to set up any sort of government, if it had been always the same. But the foresaid Lewis the Eleventh did assume to himself a power above that of his predecessors; and Philip de Commines shews the ways by which he acquired it, with the miserable effects of his acquisition, both to himself and to his people: modern authors observe, that the change was made by him; and, for that reason, he is said by Mezeray, and others, "to have brought those kings out of † guardianship:" they were not therefore so, till he did emancipate them. Nevertheless, this emancipation had no resemblance to the unlimited power, of which our author dreams. The general assemblies of estates were often held long after his death, and continued in the exercise of the sovereign power of the nation. Davila, speaking of the general assembly held at Orleans in the time of Francis the Second, asserts the whole power of the nation to have been in Hist. delle them. Monsieur de Thou says the same thing, and adds, that the king dying suddenly, the assembly continued, even at the desire of the council, in Thuan. hist. i.
the exercise of that power, till they had settled the regency, and other affairs of the highest importance, according to their own judgment. Hottoman a lawyer of that time and nation, famous for his learning, judgment, and integrity, having diligently examined the antient laws and histories of that kingdom, distinctly proves, that the French nation never had any kings, but of Hottom. Franco-Gallia.
their own chusing; that their kings had no power except what was conferred upon * Ab hominibus infimæ fortis in omnia simul vitia est præceps datus: tempora etiam corrupta, & vicinorum regum exempla, non parum ad eum evertendum juverunt: nam & Edvardus in Anglia, Carolus in Burgundia, Ludovicus undecimus in Gallia, Joannes Secundus in Lusitania, tyrannidis fundamenta jecerunt: Richardus Tertius in Anglia eam immanissime exercuit. Hist. Scot. l. 12.

† Davoir mis les roys hors de page.

CHAP. II. upon them; and that they had been removed, when they excessively abused, or rendered themselves unworthy of that trust. This is sufficiently clear by the forecited examples of Pharamond's grandchildren, and the degenerated races of Meroveus and Pepin; of which many were deposed, some of the nearest in blood excluded; and, when their vices seemed to be incorrigible, they were wholly rejected. All this was done by virtue of that rule, which they call the salic law: and tho' some of our princes, pretending to the inheritance of that crown by marrying the heirs general, denied that there was any such thing, no man can say, that for the space of above twelve hundred years females, or their descendents, who are by that law excluded, have ever been thought to have any right to the crown: and no law, unless it be explicitly given by God, can be of greater authority than one, which has been in force for so many ages. What the beginning of it was, is not known: but Charles the Sixth, receding from this law, and thinking to dispose of the succession otherwise than was ordained by it, was esteemed mad, and all his acts rescinded. And tho' the reputation, strength, and valour of the English, commanded by Henry the Fifth, one of the bravest princes that have ever been in the world, was terrible to the French nation; yet they opposed him to the utmost of their power, rather than suffer that law to be broken. And tho' our success under his conduct was great and admirable; yet soon after his death, with the expence of much blood and treasure, we lost all that we had on that side, and suffered the penalty of having unadvisedly entered into that quarrel. By virtue of the same law, the agreement made by king John, when he was prisoner at London, by which he had alienated part of that dominion, as well as that of Francis the First, concluded when he was under the same circumstances at Madrid, were reputed null; and upon all occasions that nation has given sufficient testimony, that the laws by which they live are their own, made by themselves, and not imposed upon them. And it is as impossible for them, who made and deposed kings, exalted or depressed reigning families, and prescribed rules to the succession, to have received from their own creatures the power, or part of the government they had, as for a man to be begotten by his own son. Nay, tho' their constitutions were much changed by Lewis the Eleventh, yet they retained so much of their antient liberty, that in the last age, when the house of Valois was as much depraved as those of Meroveus and Pepin had been, and Henry the Third by his own lewdness, hypocrisy, cruelty, and impurity, together with the baseness of his minions and favourites, had rendered himself odious and contemptible to the nobility and people; the great cities, parliaments, the greater and (in political matters) the sounder part of the nation, declared him to be fallen from the crown, and pursued him to the death, tho' the blow was given by the hand of a base and half-distracted monk.

Henry of Bourbon was without controversy the next heir; but neither the nobility nor the people, who thought themselves in the government, would admit him to the crown, till he had given them satisfaction, that he would govern according to their laws, by abjuring his religion, which they judged inconsistent with them.

The

The later commotions in Paris, Bourdeaux, and other places, together SECT. 30. with the wars for religion, shew, that tho' the French do not complain of every grievance, and cannot always agree in the defence and vindication of their violated liberties, yet they very well understand their rights; and that, as they do not live by or for the king, but he reigns by and for them; so their privileges are not from him, but that his crown is from them; and that, according to the true rule of their government, he can do nothing against their laws, or if he do, they may oppose him.

The institution of a kingdom is the act of a free nation; and whoever denies them to free, denies that there can be any thing of right in what they set up. That which was true in the beginning is so now, and must be so for ever. This is so far acknowledged by the highest monarchs, that in a treatise published in the year 1667, by authority of the present king of France, to justify his pretensions to some part of the Low Countries, notwithstanding all the acts of himself, and the king of Spain to extinguish them, it is said * "That kings are under the happy inability to do any thing against the laws of their country." And tho' perhaps he may do things contrary to law, yet he grounds his power upon the law; and the most able and most trusted of his ministers declare the same. About the year 1660, the count d'Aubijoux, a man of eminent quality in Languedoc, but averse to the court, and hated by Cardinal Mazarin, had been tried by the parliament of Tholouse for a duel, in which a gentleman was killed; and it appearing to the court (then in that city) that he had been acquitted upon forged letters of grace, false witnesses, powerful friends, and other undue means, Mazarin desired to bring him to a new trial: but the chancellor Seguier told the queen-mother it could not be; for the law did not permit a man once acquitted to be again questioned for the same fact; and that if the course of the law were interrupted, neither the Salique law, nor the succession of her children, or any thing else, could be secure in France.

This is farther proved by the histories of that nation. The kings of Meroveus and Pepin's races were suffered to divide the kingdom amongst their sons; or, as Hotoman says, the estates made the division, and allotted to Hotom. each such a part as they thought fit. But when this way was found to be Fran. Gall. prejudicial to the public, an act of state was made in the time of Hugh Capet, by which it was ordained, that for the future the kingdom should not be dismembred; which constitution continuing in force to this day, the sons or brothers of their kings receive such an apannage (they call it) as is bestowed on them, remaining subject to the crown as well as other men. And there has been no king of France since that time (except only Charles the Sixth), who has not acknowledged, that he cannot alienate any part of their dominion.

Whoever imputes the acknowledgment of this to kingcraft, and says that they who avow this, when it is for their advantage, will deny it on a different occasion, is of all men their most dangerous enemy. In laying such fraud to * Que les roys ont cette bienheureuse impuissance de ne pouvoir rien faire contre les loix de leur pays. Traité des droits de la reyne.

CHAP. II. their charge he destroys the veneration by which they subsist, and teaches subjects not to keep faith with those, who by the most malicious deceits shew, that they are tied by none. Human societies are maintained by mutual contracts which are of no value if they are not observed. Laws are made, and magistrates created, to cause them to be performed in public and private matters, and to punish those who violate them. But none will ever be observed, if he who receives the greatest benefit by them, and is set up to oversee others, give the example to those who of themselves are too much inclined to break them. The first step that Pompey made to his own ruin was, by violating the laws he himself had proposed. But it would be much worse for kings to break those that are established by the authority of a whole people, and confirmed by the succession of many ages.

Suarum legum lator &
 everfor.
 Tacit.

De jur. bel.
 & pac. l. ii.
 Ibid.

I am far from laying any such blemishes on them, or thinking that they deserve them. I must believe the French king speaks sincerely, when he says he can do nothing against the laws of his country: and that our king James did the like, when he acknowledged himself to be the servant of the commonwealth; and the rather, because it is true, and that he is placed in the throne to that end. Nothing is more essential and fundamental in the constitutions of kingdoms, than that diets, parliaments, and assemblies of estates, should see this performed. It is not the king that gives them a right to judge of matters of war or peace, to grant supplies of men and money, or to deny them; and to make or abrogate laws at their pleasure: all the powers rightly belonging to kings, or to them, proceed from the same root.
 The northern nations seeing what mischiefs were generally brought upon the eastern, by referring too much to the irregular will of a man; and what those who were more generous had suffered, when one man by the force of a corrupt mercenary soldiery had overthrown the laws by which they lived, feared they might fall into the same misery; and therefore retained the greater part of the power to be exercised by their general assemblies, or by delegates, when they grew so numerous that they could not meet. These are the kingdoms of which Grotius speaks, "where the king has his part, and "the senate or people their part of the supreme authority;" and where the law prescribes such limits, "that if the king attempt to seize that part which is not his, he may justly be opposed:" which is as much as to say, that the law upholds the power it gives, and turns against those who abuse
 it.

This doctrine may be displeasing to court-parasites; but no less profitable to such kings as follow better counsels, than to the nations that live under them: the wisdom and virtue of the best is always fortified by the concurrence of those who are placed in part of the power; they always do what they will, when they will nothing but that which is good; and it is a happy impotence in those, who through ignorance or malice desire to do evil, not to be able to effect it. The weakness of such as by defects of nature, sex, age, or education, are not able of themselves to bear the weight of a kingdom, is thereby supported, and they, together with the people under them, preserved from ruin; the furious rashness of the insolent is restrained;

strained; the extravagance of those, who are naturally lewd, is awed; and the bestial madness of the most violently wicked and outrageous, suppressed. SECT. 30.
 When the law provides for these matters, and prescribes ways by which they may be accomplished, every man who receives or fears an injury, seeks a remedy in a legal way, and vents his passions in such a manner, as brings no prejudice to the commonwealth: if his complaints against a king may be heard, and redressed by courts of justice, parliaments, and diets, as well as against private men, he is satisfied, and looks no farther for a remedy. But if kings, like those of Israel, will neither judge nor be judged, and there be no power orderly to redress private or public injuries, every man has recourse to force, as if he lived in a wood, where there is no law; and that force is always mortal to those who provoke it: no guards can preserve a hated prince from the vengeance of one resolute hand; and they as often fall by the swords of their own guards as of others: wrongs will be done, and when they that do them cannot or will not be judged publicly, the injured persons become judges in their own case, and executioners of their own sentence. If this be dangerous in matters of private concernment, it is much more so in those relating to the public. The lewd extravagancies of Edward and Richard the Seconds, whilst they acknowledged the power of the law, were gently reformed and restrained with the removal of some profligate favourites; but, when they would admit of no other law than their own will, no relief could be had but by their deposition. The lawful Spartan kings, who were obedient to the laws of their country, lived in safety, and died with glory: whereas it was a strange thing to see a lawless tyrant die without such infamy and misery, as held a just proportion with the wickedness of his life: they did, as Plutarch says of Dionysius, many mischiefs, and suffered more. This is confirmed by the examples of the kingdom of Israel, and of the empires of Rome and Greece; they who would submit to no law, were destroyed without any. I know not whether they thought themselves to be Gods, as our author says they were; but I am sure the most part of them died like dogs, and had the burial of asses rather than of men. Vit. Timole-

This is the happiness to which our author would promote them all. "It
 " a king admit a people to be his companions, he ceaseth to be a king, and " the state becomes a democracy." And a little farther, "If in such assem" blies, the king, nobility, and people, have equal shares in the sovereignty,
 " then the king hath but one voice, the nobility likewise one, and the people
 " one; and then any two of these voices should have power to over-rule the " third: thus the nobility and commons should have a power to make a law to " bridle the king, which was never seen in any kingdom." We have heard of nations, that admitted a man to reign over them (that is, made him king,) but of no man that made a people. The Hebrews made Saul, David, Jeroboam, and other kings: when they returned from captivity, they conferred the same title upon the Asmonean race, as a reward of their valour and virtue: the Romans chose Romulus, Numa, Hostilius, and others, to be their kings; the Spartans instituted two, one of the Heraclidæ, the other of the Æacidæ.

CHAP. II. Other nations set up one, a few, or more magistrates to govern them: and all the world agrees, that "qui dat esse, dat modum esse;" he that makes him to be, makes him to be what he is: and nothing can be more absurd than to say, that he who has nothing but what is given, can have more than is given to him. If Saul and Romulus had no other title to be kings, than what the people conferred upon them, they could be no otherwise kings, than as pleased the people: they therefore did not admit the people to be partakers of the government; but the people, who had all in themselves, and could not have made a king, if they had not had it, bestowed upon him what they thought fit, and retained the rest in themselves. If this were not so, then, instead of saying to the multitude, "Will ye have this man to reign?" they ought to say to the man, "Wilt thou have this multitude to be a people?" And whereas the nobles of Arragon used to say to their new-made King, "We, who are as good as you, make you our king, on condition you keep and maintain our rights and liberties, and if not, not;" he should have said to them, I, who am better than you, make you to be a people, and will govern you as I please. But I doubt whether he would have succeeded, till that kingdom was joined to others of far greater strength, from whence a power might be drawn to force them out of their usual method.

That which has been said of the governments of England, France, and other countries, shews them to be of the same nature; and if they do not deserve the name of kingdoms, and that their princes will by our author's arguments be persuaded to leave them, those nations perhaps will be so humble to content themselves without that magnificent title, rather than resign their own liberties to purchase it: and, if this will not please him, he may seek his glorious sovereign monarchy among the wild Arabs, or in the island of Ceylon; for it will not be found among civilized nations.

However, more ignorance cannot be expressed, than by giving the name of democracy to those governments that are composed of the three simple species, as we have proved that all the good ones have ever been: for in a strict sense it can only suit with those, where the people retain to themselves the administration of the supreme power; and more largely, when the popular part, as in Athens, greatly over-balances the other two, and that the denomination is taken from the prevailing part. But our author, if I mistake not, is the first that ever took the antient governments of Israel, Sparta, and Rome, or those of England, France, Germany, and Spain, to be democracies, only, because every one of them had senates and assemblies of the people, who in their persons, or by their deputies, did join with their chief magistrates in the exercise of the supreme power. That of Israel, to the time of Saul, is called by Josephus an aristocracy. The same name is given to that of Sparta by all the Greek authors; and the great contest in the Peloponnesian war was between the two kinds of government; the cities that were governed aristocratically, or desired to be so, following the Lacedemonians; and such as delighted in democracy taking part with the Athenians. In like manner Rome, England, and France, were said to be under monarchies; not that their kings might do what they pleased, but because one man had a pre-eminence above any other. Yet if the Romans could could take Romulus, the son of a man that was never known, Numa a Sabine, SECT. 30.

 Hostilius, and Ancus Martius, private men, and Tarquinius Priscus the son of a banished Corinthian, who had no title to a preference before others till it was bestowed upon them; it is ridiculous to think, that they who gave them what they had, could not set what limits they pleased to their own gift.

But, says our author, "The nobility will then have one voice, and the people
 " another; and they joining may over-rule the third; which was never seen in " any kingdom." This may perhaps be one way of regulating the monarchical power; but it is not necessary, nor the only one: there may be a senate, tho' the people be excluded; that senate may be composed of men chosen for their virtue, as well as for the nobility of their birth: the government may consist of king and people without a senate; or the senate may be composed only of the peoples delegates. But, if I should grant his assertion to be true, the reasonableness of such a constitution cannot be destroyed by the consequences he endeavours to draw from it; for he who would instruct the world in matters of state, must shew what is or ought to be, not what he fancies may thereupon ensue.
 Besides, it does not follow, that where there are three equal votes, laws should be always made by the plurality; for the consent of all the three is in many places required; and it is certain, that in England, and other parts, the King and one of the estates cannot make a law without the concurrence of the other.
 But, to please Filmer, I will avow, that where the nobles and commons have an equal vote, they may join and over-rule or limit the power of the king: and I leave any reasonable man to judge, whether it be more safe and fit, that those two estates, comprehending the whole body of the nation in their persons, or by representation, should have a right to over-rule or limit the power of that man, woman, or child, who sits in the throne; or that he or she, young or old, wise or foolish, good or bad, should over-rule them, and by their vices, weakness, folly, impertinence, incapacity, or malice, put a stop to their proceedings; and whether the chief concernments of a nation may more safely and prudently be made to depend upon the votes of so many eminent persons, amongst whom many wise and good men will always be found, if there be any in the nation, and who in all respects have the same interests with them, or upon the will of one, who may be, and often is, as vile, ignorant, and wretched, as the meanest slave; and either has, or is for the most part made to believe he has, an interest so contrary to them, that their suppression is his advancement.
 Common sense so naturally leads us to the decision of this question, that I should not think it possible for mankind to have mistaken, tho' we had no examples of it in history: and it is in vain to say, that all princes are not such as I represent; for if a right were annexed to the being of a prince, and that his single judgment should over-balance that of a whole nation, it must belong to him as a prince, and be enjoyed by the worst and basest, as well as by the wisest and best, which would inevitably draw on the absurdities above-mentioned:
 but that many are, and have been such, no man can deny, or reasonably hope, that they will not often prove to be such, as long as any preference is granted to those who have nothing to recommend them, but the families from whence 8 they

CHAP. II. they derive; a continual succession of those who excel in virtue, wisdom, and experience, being promised to none, nor reasonably to be expected from any. Such a right therefore cannot be claimed by all; and if not by all, then not by any, unless it proceed from a particular grant in consideration of personal virtue, ability, and integrity, which must be proved: and when any one goes about to do it, I will either acknowledge him to be in the right, or give the reasons of my denial.

However this is nothing to the general proposition: nay, if a man were to be found, who had more of the qualities required for making a right judgment in matters of the greatest importance, than a whole nation, or an assembly of the best men chosen out of it (which I have never heard to have been, unless in the persons of Moses, Joshua, or Samuel, who had the Spirit of God for their guide) it would be nothing to our purpose; for even he might be biassed by his personal interests, which governments are not established principally to promote.

I may go a step farther, and truly say, that as such vast powers cannot be generally granted to all who happen to succeed in any families, without evident danger of utter destruction, when they come to be executed by children, women, fools, vitious, incapable or wicked persons, they can be reasonably granted to none, because no man knows what any one will prove till he be tried; and the importance of the affair requires such a trial as can be made of no man till he be dead. He that resists one temptation may fall under the power of another; and nothing is more common in the world, than to see those men fail grossly in the last actions of their lives, who had passed their former days without reproach: wise and good men will with Moses say of themselves, "I cannot bear the burden:" and every man who is concerned for the public good, ought to let fools know they are not fit to undergo it, and by law to restrain the fury of such as will not be guided by reason. This could not be denied, tho' governments were constituted for the good of the governor. It is good for him that the law appoints helps for his infirmities, and restrains his vices: but all nations ought to do it tho' it were not so, inasmuch as kingdoms are not established for the good of one man, but of the people; and that king who seeks his own good before that of the people, departs from the end of his institution.

This is so plain, that all nations who have acted freely, have some way or other endeavoured to supply the defects, or restrain the vices of their supreme magistrates; and those among them deserve most praise, who, by appointing means adequate to so great a work, have taken care that it might be easily and safely accomplished: such nations have always flourished in virtue, power, glory, and happiness, whilst those who wanted their wisdom, have suffered all manner of calamities by the weakness and injustice of their princes, or have had their hands perpetually in blood to preserve themselves from their fury. We need no better example of the first, than that of the Spartans, who, by appointing such limits to the power of their kings as could hardly be transgressed, continued many ages in great union with them, and were never ver troubled with civil tumults. The like may be said of the Romans, from SECT. 30.

 the expulsion of the Tarquins, till they overthrew their own orders, by continuing Marius for five years in the consulate, whereas the laws did not permit a man to hold the same office two years together; and when that rule was broken, their own magistrates grew too strong for them, and subverted the commonwealth. When this was done, and the power came to be in the hands of one man, all manner of evils and calamities broke in like a flood:
 it is hard to judge, whether the mischiefs he did, or those he suffered, were the greater; he who set up himself to be lord of the world, was like to a beast crowned for the slaughter, and his greatness was the forerunner of his ruin. By this means some of those who seem not to have been naturally prone to evil, were by their fears put upon such courses to preserve themselves, as being rightly estimated, were worse than the death they apprehended: and the so much celebrated Constantine the Great died no less polluted with the blood of his nearest relations and friends, than Nero himself. But no place can shew a more lively picture of this, than the kingdoms of Granada, and Hist. de Esothers possessed by the Moors in Spain; where, there being neither senate, pan. de Manor assemblies of the nobility and people, to restrain the violence and fury of their kings, they had no other way than to kill them when their vices became insupportable; which happening for the most part, they were almost all murdered; and things were brought to such extremity, that no man would accept a crown, except he who had neither birth nor virtue to deserve it.

If it be said, that kings have now found out more easy ways of doing what they please, and securing themselves; I answer, that they have not proved so to them all, and it is not yet time for such as tread in the same steps to boast of their success: many have fallen when they thought their designs accomplished; and no man, as long as he lives, can reasonably assure himself the like shall not befall him. But if in this corrupted age, the treachery and perjury of princes be more common than formerly; and the number of those who are brought to delight in the rewards of injustice, be so increased, that their parties are stronger than formerly: this rather shews, that the balance of power is broken, or hard to be kept up, than that there ought to be none; and it is difficult for any man, without the spirit of prophecy, to tell what this will produce. Whilst the antient constitutions of our northern kingdoms remained intire, such as contested with their princes sought only to reform the governments, and by redressing what was amiss, to reduce them to their first principles; but they may not perhaps be so modest, when they see the very nature of their government changed, and the foundations overthrown.
 I am not sure that they who were well pleased with a moderate monarchy, will submit to one that is absolute; and it is not improbable, that when men see there is no medium between tyranny and popularity, they who would have been contented with the reformation of their government, may proceed farther, and have recourse to force, when there is no help in the law. This will be a hard work in those places where virtue is wholly abolished; but the difficulty will lie on the other side, if any sparks of that remain: if vice and corruption prevail, liberty cannot subsist; but if virtue have the advantage, arbi-

CHAP. II. arbitrary power cannot be established. Those who boast of their loyalty, and think they give testimonies of it, when they addict themselves to the will of one man, tho' contrary to the law from whence that quality is derived, may consider, that by putting their masters upon illegal courses they certainly make them the worst of men, and bring them into danger of being also the most miserable. Few or no good princes have fallen into disasters, unless through an extremity of corruption introduced by the most wicked; and cannot properly be called unhappy, if they perished in their innocence; since the bitterness of death is asswaged by the tears of a loving people, the assurance of a glorious memory, and the quiet of a well satisfied mind. But of those who have abandoned themselves to all manner of vice, followed the impulse of their own fury, and set themselves to destroy the best men for opposing their pernicious designs, very few have died in peace. Their lives have been miserable, death infamous, and memory detestable.

They therefore who place kings within the power of the law, and the law to be a guide to kings, equally provide for the good of the king and people. Whereas they who admit of no participants in power, and acknowledge no rule but their own will, set up an interest in themselves against that of their people, lose their affections, which is their most important treasure, and incur their hatred, from whence results their greatest danger.

S E C T. XXXI.

The liberties of nations are from God and nature, not from kings.

Whatsoever is usually said in opposition to this, seems to proceed from a groundless conceit, that the liberties enjoyed by nations arise from the concessions of princes. This point has been already treated: but being the foundation of the doctrine I oppose, it may not be amiss farther to examine how it can be possible for one man born under the same condition with the rest of mankind to have a right in himself that is not common to all others, till it be by them, or a certain number of them, conferred upon him; or how he can, without the utmost absurdity, be said to grant liberties and privileges to them who made him to be what he is.

If I had to do with a man that sought after truth, I should think he had been led into this extravagant opinion by the terms ordinarily used in patents and charters granted to particular men; and not distinguishing between the proprietor and the dispenser, might think kings had given as their own, that which they only distribute out of the public treasury, and could have had nothing to distribute by parcels, if it had not been given to them in gross by the public. But I need not use our author so gently. The perversity of his judgment, and obstinate hatred to truth, is sufficient to draw him into the most

most absurd errors without any other inducement; and it were not charity, SECT. 31.
 but folly, to think he could have attributed in general to all princes, without any regard to the ways by which they attain to their power, such an authority as never justly belonged to any.

This will be evident to all those who consider, that no man can confer upon others that which he has not in himself: if he be originally no more than they, he cannot grant to them, or any of them, more than they to him. In the 7th, 8th, 9th, and subsequent sections of the first chapter, it has been proved, that there is no resemblance between the paternal right, and the absolute power, which he asserts in kings: that the right of a father, whatever it be, is only over his children: that this right is equally inherited by them all when he dies: that every one cannot inherit dominion; for the right of one would be inconsistent with that of all others: that the right which is common to all is that which we call liberty, or exemption from dominion: that the first fathers of mankind after the flood had not the exercise of regal power: and whatsoever they had was equally devolved to every one of their sons, as appears by the examples of Noah, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and their children: that the erection of Nimrod's kingdom was directly contrary to, and inconsistent with, the paternal right, if there was any regality in it: that the other kingdoms of that time were of the same nature: that Nimrod, not exceeding the age of threescore years when he built Babel, could not be the father of those that assisted him in that attempt: that if the seventy-two kings, who, as our author says, went from Babylon upon the confusion of languages, were not the sons of Nimrod, he could not govern them by the right of a father; if they were, they must have been very young, and could not have children of their own to people the kingdoms they set up: that whose children soever they were, who out of a part of mankind did, within a hundred and thirty-two years after the flood, divide into so many kingdoms, they shewed that others in process of time might subdivide into as many as they pleased; and kingdoms multiplying in the space of four thousand years since the 72, in the same proportion they did in one hundred and thirty-two years into seventy-two, there would now be as many kings in the world as there are men; that is, no man could be subject to another: that this equality of right, and exemption from the domination of any other, is called liberty: that he, who enjoys it, cannot be deprived of it, unless by his own consent, or by force: that no one man can force a multitude; or, if he did, it could confer no right upon him: that a multitude, consenting to be governed by one man, doth confer upon him the power of governing them; the powers therefore that he has, are from them; and they who have all in themselves can receive nothing from him, who has no more than every one of them, till they do invest him with it. This is proved by sacred and profane histories, The Hebrews in the creation of judges, kings, or other magistrates, had no regard to paternity, or to any who by extraction could in the least pretend to the right of fathers: God did never direct them to do it, nor reprove them for neglecting it: if they would chuse a king, he commanded them to take one of their brethren, not one

CHAP. II. who called himself their father: when they did resolve to have one, he commanded them to chuse him by lot, and caused the lot to fall upon a young man of the youngest tribe: David, and the other kings of Israel or Judah, had no more to say for themselves in that point than Saul: all the kings of that nation before and after the captivity, ordinarily or extraordinarily set up, justly or unjustly, were raised without any regard to any prerogative they could claim or arrogate to themselves on that account. All that they had therefore was from their elevation, and their elevation from those that elevated them. It was impossible for them to confer any thing upon those from whom they received all they had; or for the people to give power to kings, if they had not had it in themselves; which power, universally residing in every one, is that which we call liberty. The method of other nations was much like to this. They placed those in the throne who seemed best to deserve so great an honour, and most able to bear so great a burden: the kingdoms of the heroes were nothing else, but the government of those who were most beneficent to the nations amongst whom they lived, and whose virtues were thought fit to be raised above the ordinary level of the world. Tho' perhaps there was not any one Athenian or Roman equal to Theseus or Romulus in courage and strength, yet they were not able to subdue many: or if any man should be so vain to think, that each of them did at first subdue one man, then two, and so proceeding by degrees conquered a whole people, he cannot without madness ascribe the same to Numa, who, being sent for from a foreign country, was immediately made king of a fierce people, that had already conquered many of their neighbours, and was grown too boisterous even for Romulus himself. The like may be said of the first Tarquin, and of Servius; they were strangers: and tho' Tullus Hostilius and Ancus Martius were Romans, they had as little title to a dominion over their fellow-citizens, or means of attaining to it, as if they had come from the farthest parts of the earth. This must be in all places, unless one man could prove by a perfect and uninterrupted genealogy, that he is the eldest son of the eldest line of Noah, and that line to have continued perpetually in the government of the world: for if the power has been divided, it may be subdivided into infinity; if interrupted, the chain is broken, and can never be made whole. But if our author can perform this for the service of any man, I willingly surrender my arms, and yield up the cause I defend. If he fail, it is ridiculous to pretend a right that belongs to no man, or to go about to retrieve a right, which for the space of four thousand years has lain dormant; and much more to create that which never had a subsistence. This leads us necessarily to a conclusion, that all kingdoms are at the first erected by the consent of nations, and given to whom they please; or else all are set up by force, or some by force, and some by consent: if any are set up by the consent of nations, those kings do not confer liberties upon those nations, but receive all from them, and the general proposition is false. If our author therefore, or his followers, would confute me, they must prove, that all the kingdoms of the world have their beginning from force, and that force doth always create a right;

a right; or, if they recede from the general proposition, and attribute a SECT. 31.
 peculiar right to one or more princes, who are so absolute lords of their people, that those under them have neither liberty, privilege, property, or part, in the government, but by their concessions, they must prove, that those princes did by force gain the power they have, and that their right is derived from it. This force also must have been perpetually continued; for if that force be the root of the right that is pretended, another force, by the same rule, may overturn, extinguish, or transfer it to another hand. If contracts have intervened, the force ceases; and the right that afterwards doth accrue to the persons, must proceed from, and be regulated according to those contracts.

This may be sufficient to my purpose: for as it has been already proved, that the kingdoms of Israel, Judah, Rome, Sparta, France, Spain, England, and all that we are concerned in, or that deserve to be examples to us, did arise from the consent of the respective nations, and were frequently reduced to their first principles, when the princes have endeavoured to transgress the laws of their institution; it could be nothing to us, tho' Attila or Tamerlan had by force gained the dominions they possessed. But I dare go a step further, and boldly assert, that there never was, or can be, a man in the world, that did or can subdue a nation; and that the right of one grounded upon force is a mere whimsey. It was not Agathocles, Dionysius, Nabis, Marius, Sylla, or Cæsar, but the mercenary soldiers, and other villains that joined with them, who subdued the Syracusans, Spartans, or Romans: and as the work was not performed by those tyrants alone, if a right had been gained by the violence they used, it must have been common to all those that gained it; and he that commanded them could have had no more than they thought fit to confer upon him. When Plut. in vit. Cim.
 Miltiades desired leave to wear an olive garland, in commemoration of the victory obtained at Marathon, an Athenian did in my opinion rightly say, "If you alone did fight against the Persians, it is just that you only should be crowned; but if others did participate in the victory, they ought also to have a part in the honour." And the principal difference that I have observed between the most regular proceedings of the wisest senates or assemblies of the people in their persons or delegates, and the fury of the most dissolute villains, has been, that the first seeking the public good, do usually set up such a man, and invest him with such powers as seem most conducing to that good: whereas the others, following the impulse of a bestial rage, and aiming at nothing but the satisfaction of their own lusts, always advance one from whom they expect the greatest advantages to themselves, and give him such powers as most conduce to the accomplishment of their own ends: but as to the person it is the same thing. Cæsar and Nero did no more make themselves what they were, than Numa; and could no more confer any right, liberty, or privilege, upon the army, that gave them all they had, than the most regular magistrate can upon the senate or people that chose them.

This also is common to the worst as well as the best, that they who set up either, do, as into a public treasury, confer upon the person they
 I i 2 chuse,

CHAP. II. chuse, a power of distributing to particular men, or numbers of men, such honours, privileges, and advantages, as they may seem, according to the principles of the government, to deserve. But there is this difference, that the ends of the one being good, and those of the other evil, the first do, for the most part, limit the powers, that something may remain to reward services done to the public, in a manner proportioned to the merit of every one, placing other magistrates to see it really performed, so as they may not, by the weakness or vices of the governor, be turned to the public detriment: the others think they never give enough, that the prince, having all in his power, may be able to gratify their most exorbitant desires, if by any ways they can get his favour; and his infirmities and vices being most beneficial to them, they seldom allow to any other magistrate a power of opposing his will, or suffer those who for the public good would assume it. The world affords many examples of both sorts, and every one of them have had their progress suitable to their constitution. The regular kingdoms of England, France, Spain, Poland, Bohemia, Denmark, Sweden, and others, whether elective or hereditary, have had high stewards, constables, mayors of the palace, rixhofmeisters, parliaments, diets, assemblies of estates, cortez, and the like, by which those have been admitted to succeed who seemed most fit for the public service; the unworthy have been rejected; the infirmities of the weak supplied; the malice of the unjust restrained; and when necessity required, the crown transferred from one line or family to another. But in the furious tyrannies that have been set up by the violence of a corrupted soldiery, as in the antient Roman empire, the kingdoms of the Moors and Arabians, the tyrannies of Ezzelino of Padoa, those of the Visconti and Sforzeschi of Milan, Castruccio Castracani of Lucca, Cæsar Borgia, and others, there was nothing of all this. The will of the prince was a law; all power was in him, and he kept it, till another stepped up and took it from him, by the same means that he had gained it. This fell out so frequently, that tho' all the Roman emperors endeavoured to make their power hereditary, it hardly continued three generations in one line from Augustus to Augustulus, unless in that of Constantine, and that with extreme confusion and disorder. They who had madly set up a man to be their head, and exposed so much of the world as was under their power, to be destroyed by him, did by the like fury throw him down, and never ceased till they had brought the empire to utter ruin.

But if this paternal sovereignty be a mere fiction, that never had any effect; and no nation was ever commanded by God to make it their rule, nor any reproved for the neglect of it; none ever learnt it from the light of nature, nor were by wise men taught to regard it: the first fathers claimed no privilege from it when every man's genealogy was known; and if there were such a thing in nature, it could be of no use at this day, when the several races of men are so confused, that not one in the world can prove his own original; and that the first kingdoms, whether well or ill constituted, according to the command of God, or the inventions of men, were contrary to, and incompatible with it; and there can have been no justice in any, if such a rule was to have been observed; the continuance of an unjust usurpa-
tion

tion can never have created a right, but aggravated the injustice of overthrowing SECT. 32.
 it: no man could ever by his own strength and courage subdue a multitude, nor gain any other right over them, if he did, than they might have to tear it from him: whoever denies kingdoms, and other magistracies, to have been set up by men, according to their own will, and from an opinion of receiving benefit by them, accuses all the governments that are, or ever have been, in the world, of that outrageous injustice in their foundation, which can never be repaired. If there be therefore, or ever was, any just government amongst men, it was constituted by them; and whether their proceedings were regular or violent, just or unjust, the powers annexed to it were their donation:
 the magistracies erected by them, whether in one or more men, temporary or perpetual, elective or hereditary, were their creatures; and receiving all from them, could confer nothing upon them.

S E C T. XXXII.

The contracts made between magistrates, and the nations that created them, were real, solemn, and obligatory.

OUR author, having with big words, and little sense, inveighed against popular and mixed governments, proceeds as if he had proved they could not, or ought not to be. "If it be," says he, "unnatural for the mul"titude to chuse their governors, or to govern, or to partake in the govern"ment; what can be thought of that damnable conclusion which is made
 "by too many, that the multitude may correct or depose their princes, if "need be? Surely the unnaturalness and injustice of this position cannot suf"ficiently be expressed. For admit that a king make a contract or paction
 "with his people originally in his ancestors, or personally at his coronation "(for both these pactions some dream of, but cannot offer any proof of ei"ther); yet by no law of any nation can a contract be thought broken, ex"cept first a lawful trial be had by the ordinary judge of the breakers there-
 "of; or else, every man may be both party and judge in his own case, which "is absurd once to be thought; for then it will lie in the hands of the head-
 "less multitude, when they please, to cast off the yoke of government that "God hath laid upon them, and to judge and punish him, by whom they "should be judged and punished themselves." To this I first answer briefly, That if it be natural for the multitude to chuse their governors, or to govern, or to participate of the government as best pleases themselves; or that there never was a government in the world that was not so set up by them, in pursuance of the power naturally inherent in themselves; what can be thought of that damnable conclusion, which has been made by fools or knaves, that the multitude may not, if need be, correct or depose their own magistrates? Surely the unnaturalness and injustice of such a position cannot be sufficiently expressed.

CHAP. II. pressed. If that were admitted, all the most solemn pacts and contracts made between nations and their magistrates, originally or personally, and confirmed by laws and mutual oaths, would be of no value. He that would break the most sacred bonds, that can be amongst men, should by perjury and wickedness become judge of his own case, and by the worst of crimes procure impunity for all. It would be in his power by folly, wickedness, and madness, to destroy the multitude, which he was created and sworn to preserve, tho' wise, virtuous, and just, and headed by the wisest and justest of men; or to lay a yoke upon those who by the laws of God and nature ought to be free: he might in his own case judge that body by which he ought to be judged; and who, in consideration of themselves, and their own good, made him to be whatsoever he is more than every one of them: the governments instituted for the preservation of nations would turn to their destruction: it would be impossible to check the fury of a corrupt and perfidious magistrate: the worst of men would be raised to a height, that was never deserved by the best; and the assurance of indemnity would, by increasing their insolence, turn their other vices into madness, as has been too often seen in those, who have had more power than they deserved, and were more hardly brought to account for their actions than ought to have been; tho' I never heard of any who had so much as our author asserts to be in all, nor that any was absolutely assured he should not be questioned for the abuse of what he had.

Besides, if every people may govern, or constitute and chuse one or more governors, they may divide the powers between several men, or ranks of men, allotting to every one so much as they please, or retaining so much as they think fit. This has been practised in all the governments, which under several forms have flourished in Palestine, Greece, Italy, Germany, France, England, and the rest of the world. The laws of every place shew what the power of the respective magistrate is, and, by declaring how much is allowed to him, declare what is denied; for he has not that which he has not; and is to be accounted a magistrate whilst he exercises that which he has.

If any doubts do hereupon arise, I hope to remove them, proving, in the first place, that several nations have plainly and explicitly made contracts with their magistrates.

2. That they are implicit, and to be understood, where they are not plainly expressed.

3. That they are not dreams, but real things, and perpetually obliging.

4. That judges are in many places appointed to decide the contests arising from the breach of these contracts; and where they are not, or the party offending is of such force or pride, that he will not submit, nations have been obliged to take the extremest courses.

To the first: I suppose it will not be denied, that the annual magistrates of divers commonwealths are under some compact, and that there is a power of constraining them to perform the contents, or to punish them for the violation. The modest behaviour of the Roman consuls and dictators (as long as their laws were in force) might not probably proceed from their good-nature,

Tho'

Tho' the people had not been, as our author says, "mad, foolish, and always SECT. 30.
 "desirous to chuse the worst men for being most like to themselves," but admirably wise and virtuous, it is not to be imagined, that in the space of three or four hundred years they should never have fallen upon one who would have transgressed, if he could have done it safely, tho' they had used the utmost caution in their choice. But the power of the consuls being only for a year, that of the dictator for six months at most, and the commission, that he should take care * the commonwealth might suffer no damage, shews the end and condition upon which they were chosen; and tho' their power is by some thought to have been absolute, yet the consuls were frequently opposed, and brought into order by the senate, tribunes, or people, and sometimes the dictator himself. Camillus in his fourth dictatorship Plut. vit. Camil.
 was threatened by the tribunes with a great fine, and by that means obliged to abdicate his magistracy. I have already mentioned Marcus Fabius Maximus, who in the behalf of his son Quintus condemned to die by Papius the dictator, appealed to the † people: and when the conduct of Fabius, in the war against Hannibal, was not approved, Nænius the tribune thought he made a very modest proposition, in that he did not desire his magistracy should be abrogated; but that the master of the horse should be made equal to him in power, which was done accordingly. It is agreed by all, that the consuls were in the place of kings, and that the power of the dictator was at the least equal to what theirs had been. If they therefore were under such a rule, which they could not transgress, or might be reduced to order if they did, and forced to submit to the people as the kings had done, the kings were also made upon the same conditions, and equally obliged to perform them.

The scripture is more clear in the case. The judges are said to have been in power equal to kings; and I may perhaps acknowledge it, with relation to the deuteronomical king, or such as the people might have chosen without offending God. The Gileadites made a covenant with Jephthah, that he should be their head and captain: he would not return to his country till they had done it. This was performed solemnly before the Lord in Mispeth, and all Israel followed them. They might therefore make a covenant with their kings, for the difference of name does not increase or diminish the right. Nay, they were in duty obliged to do it: the words of the xviith of Deuter. "He shall not multiply wives, &c. that his heart be not lifted up above his brethren," can have no other signification, than that they should take care he did it not, or, as Josephus says, hinder him if he attempt it; for the law was not given to the king who was not, but to those who might make him if they thought fit. In pursuance of this law——

[The rest of this chapter is wanting in the original manuscript.]

* Ne quid detrimenti respublica accipiat.

† Qui solus plus quam tua dictura potest polletque, cui & reges cessere, &c. T. Liv. l. viii.

C H A P. III.

S E C T. I.

Kings, not being fathers of their people, nor excelling all others in virtue, can have no other just power than what the laws give ; nor any title to the priviledges of the Lord's anointed.

HAVING proved, that the right of fathers is from nature, and incommunicable, it must follow, that every man doth perpetually owe all love, respect, service, and obedience, to him that did beget, nourish, and educate him, and to no other under that name. No man therefore can claim the right of a father over any, except one that is so ; no man can serve two masters ; the extent and perpetuity of the duty which every man owes to his father, renders it impossible for him to owe the same to any other : this right of father cannot be devolved to the heir of the father, otherwise than as every son by the law of nature is heir to his father, and has the same right of commanding his children, as his father had of commanding him when he was a child : no man can owe to his brother that which he owed to his father, because he cannot receive that from him which he had from his father ; but the utmost of all absurdities that can enter into the heart of man is, for one to exact the rights due to a father, who has no other title than force and usurpation, it being no less than to say, that I owe as much to one who has done me the greatest of all injuries, as to him who has conferred upon me the greatest benefits : or, which is yet worse, if possible, that as these usurpations cannot be made but by robbing, spoiling, imprisoning, or killing the person in possession ; that duty, which by the eternal law of nature I owe to my father, should oblige me to pay the same veneration, obedience, and service, to the man that has spoiled, imprisoned, or killed my father, as I owed to him ; or that the same law, which obliged me to obey and defend my father, because he was so, should oblige me to obey and defend his enemy, because he has imprisoned or killed him ; and not only to pass over the law of God, which makes me the avenger of my father's blood, but to reward his murderer with the rights that comprehend all that is most tender and sacred in nature, and to look upon one that has done me the greatest of all injustices and injuries, as upon him to whom I owe my birth and education. This being evident to all those who have any measure of common sense, I suppose it may be safely concluded, that what right soever a father may have over his family, it cannot relate to that which a king has over his people ; unless he, like the man in the island of Pines, mentioned before, be also the father of them all. That which is absolutely unlike in manner and substance, institution and exercise, must be unlike in all respects ; and

and the conclusions, which have their strength from similitude and parity, can have none when there is not the least similitude of either. And tho' it were true, that fathers are held by no contracts (which generally it is not; for when the son is of age, and does something for the father to which he is not obliged, or gives him that which he is not bound to give, suppose an inheritance received from a friend, goods of his own acquisition, or that he be emancipated, all good laws look upon those things as a valuable consideration, and give the same force to contracts thereupon made, as to those that pass between strangers), it could have no relation to our question concerning kings. One principal reason, that renders it very little necessary by the laws of nations, to restrain the power of parents over their children, is, because it is presumed they cannot abuse it: they are thought to have a law in their bowels, obliging them more strictly to seek their good, than all those that can be laid upon them by another power; and yet if they depart from it, so as inhumanly to abuse or kill their children, they are punished with as much rigour, and accounted more unpardonable than other men. Ignorance or wilful malice persuading our author to pass over all this, he boldly affirms, "That the father of a family governs it by no other law than his own will;" and from thence infers, that the condition of kings is the same. He would seem to soften the harshness of this proposition by saying, "That a king is always tied by the same law of nature to keep this general ground, that the safety of the kingdom is his chief law." But he spoils it in the next page, by asserting, "That it is not right for kings to do injury; but it is right, that they go unpunished by the people, if they do; so that in this point it is all one, whether Samuel describe a king or a tyrant; for patient obedience is due unto both; no remedy in the text against tyrants, but crying and praying unto God in that day." In this our author, according to the custom of theatres, runs round in a circle, pretends to grant that which is true, and then by a lye endeavours to destroy all again. Kings by the law of nature are obliged to seek chiefly the good of the kingdom; but there is no remedy, if they do it not; which is no less than to put all upon the conscience of those who manifestly have none. But if God has appointed, that all other transgressions of the laws of nature, by which a private man receives damage, should be punished in this world, notwithstanding the right reserved to himself of a future punishment; I desire to know, why this alone, by which whole nations may be, and often are destroyed, should escape the hands of justice? If he presume no law to be necessary in this case, because it cannot be thought, that kings will transgress, as there was no law in Sparta against adultery, because it was not thought possible for men educated under that discipline to be guilty of such a crime; and as divers nations left a liberty to fathers to dispose of their children as they thought fit, because it could not be imagined, that any one would abuse that power; he ought to remember, that the Spartans were mistaken, and for want of that law, which they esteemed useless, adulteries became as common there as in any part of the world: and the other error being almost every-where discovered, the laws of all civilized nations make it capital for a man to kill his children; and

CHAP. III. give redress to children, if they suffer any other extreme injuries from their parents, as well as other persons. But tho' this were not so, it would be nothing to our question, unless it could be supposed, that whoever gets the power of a nation into his hands, must be immediately filled with the same tenderness of affection to the people under him, as a father naturally has towards the children he hath begotten. He that is of this opinion, may examine the lives of Herod, Tiberius, Caligula, and some later princes of like inclinations, and conclude it to be true, if he find, that the whole course of their actions, in relation to the people under them, do well suit with the tender and sacred name of father; and altogether false, if he find the contrary. But as every man that considers what has been, or sees what is every day done in the world, must confess, that princes, or those who govern them, do most frequently so utterly reject all thoughts of tenderness and piety towards the nations under them, as rather to seek what can be drawn from them, than what should be done for them, and sometimes become their most bitter and public enemies; it is ridiculous to make the safety of nations to depend upon a supposition, which by daily experience we find to be false; and impious, to prefer the lusts of a man, who violates the most sacred laws of nature, by destroying those he is obliged to preserve, before the welfare of that people, for whose good he is made to be what he is, if there be any thing of justice in the power he exercises.

Our author foolishly thinks to cover the enormity of this nonsense, by turning "salutem populi" into "salutem regni:" for tho' "regnum" may be taken for the power of commanding, in which sense the preservation of it is the usual object of the care of princes; yet it does more rightly signify the body of that nation, which is governed by a king. And therefore, if the maxim be true, as he acknowledges it to be, then "salus populi est lex suprema;" and the first thing we are to inquire is, whether the government of this or that man do conduce to the accomplishment of that supreme law, or not; for otherwise it ought to have been said, "salus regis est lex suprema," which certainly never entered into the head of a wiser or better man than Filmer.

His reasons are as good as his doctrine: "No law," says he, "can be imposed on kings, because there were kings, before any laws were made." This would not follow, tho' the proposition were true; for they, who imposed no laws upon the kings they at first made, from an opinion of their virtue, as in those called by the antients "heroum regna," might lay restrictions upon them, when they were found not to answer the expectation conceived of them, or that their successors degenerated from their virtue. Other nations also, being instructed by the ill effects of an unlimited power given to some kings (if there was any such), might wisely avoid the rock upon which their neighbours had split, and justly moderate that power, which had been pernicious to others. However, a proposition of so great importance ought to be proved; but that being hard, and perhaps impossible, because the original of nations is almost wholly unknown to us, and their practice seems to have been so various, that what is true in one, is not so in another; he is pleased only to affirm it, without giving the least shadow of a reason to persuade suade us to believe him. This might justify me, if I should reject his assertion as a thing said gratis: but I may safely go a step farther, and affirm, that men lived under laws before there were any kings; which cannot be denied, if such a power necessarily belongs to kings as he ascribes to them. For Nimrod, who established his kingdom in Babel, is the first who by the scripture is said to have been a mighty one in the earth. He was therefore the first king, or kings were not mighty; and he being the first king, mankind must have lived till his time without laws, or else laws were made before kings. To say that there was then no law, is in many respects most absurd; for the nature of man cannot be without it, and the violences committed by ill men before the flood, could not have been blamed if there had been no law; for that which is not, cannot be transgressed. Cain could not have feared, that every man who met him would slay him, if there had not been a law to slay him that had slain another. But in this case the scripture is clear, at least from the time that Noah went out of the ark; for God then gave him a law sufficient for the state of things at that time, if all violence was prohibited under the name of shedding blood, though not under the same penalty as murder. But penal laws being in vain, if there be none to execute them, such as know God does nothing in vain, may conclude, that he who gave this law, did appoint some way for its execution, tho' unknown to us. There is therefore a law not given by kings, but laid upon such as should be kings, as well as on any other persons, by one who is above them; and perhaps I may say, that this law presseth most upon them, because they who have most power, do most frequently break out into acts of violence, and most of all disdain to have their will restrained: and he that will exempt kings from this law, must either find, that they are excepted in the text, or that God who gave it has not a power over them.

Moreover, it has been proved at the beginning of this treatise, that the first kings were of the accursed race, and reigned over the accursed nations, whilst the holy seed had none. If therefore there was no law where there was no king, the accursed posterity of Ham had laws, when the blessed descendents of Shem had none, which is most absurd; the word "outlaw," or "lawless," being often given to the wicked, but never to the just and righteous.

The impious folly of such assertions goes farther than our author perhaps suspected: for if there be no law where there is no king, the Israelites had no law till Saul was made king, and then the law they had was from him. They had no king before, for they asked one. They could not have asked one of Samuel, if he had been a king. He had not been offended, and God had not imputed to them the sin of rejecting him, if they had asked that only which he had set over them. If Samuel were not king, Moses, Joshua, and the other judges, were not kings; for they were no more than he. They had therefore no king, and consequently, if our author say true, no law. If they had no law till Saul was king, they never had any; for he gave them none; and the prophets were to blame for denouncing judgments against them for receding from, or breaking their law; if they had none. He cannot say that Samuel gave them a law; for that which he wrote in 1 Sam. x. a book, and laid up before the Lord, was not a law to the people, CHAP. III. but to the king. If it had been a law to the people it must have been made public; but as it was only to the king, he laid it up before God, to testify against him if he should adventure to break it. Or if it was a law to the people, the matter is not mended; for it was given in the time of a king by one who was not king. But in truth it was the law of the kingdom by which he was king, and had been wholly impertinent, if it was not to bind him; for it was given to no other person, and to no other end.

Our author's assertion, upon which all his doctrine is grounded, "That there is no nation that allows children any action or remedy for being unjustly governed," is as impudently false as any other proposed by him: for tho' a child will not be heard that complains of the rod; yet our own law gives relief to children against their fathers, as well as against other persons that do them injuries, upon which we see many ill effects, and I do rather relate than commend the practice. In other places the law gives relief against the extravagancies of which fathers may be guilty in relation to their children, tho' not to that excess as to bring them so near to an equality as in England: they cannot imprison, sell, or kill, their children, without exposing themselves to the same punishments with other men; and if they take their estates from them, the law is open and gives relief against them: but on the other side, children are punished with death, if they strike or outrageously abuse their parents; which is not so with us.

Now, if the laws of nations take such care to preserve private men from being too hardly used by their true and natural fathers, who have such a love and tenderness for them in their own blood, that the most wicked and barbarous do much more frequently commit crimes for them than against them; how much more necessary is it to restrain the fury that kings, who at the best are but phantastical fathers, may exercise to the destruction of the whole people? It is a folly to say that David, and some other kings, have had, or that all should have a tenderness of affection towards their people as towards their children; for besides that even the first proposition is not acknowledged, and will be hardly verified in any one instance, there is a vast distance between what men ought to be, and what they are. Every man ought to be just, true, and charitable; and if they were so, laws would be of no use: but it were a madness to abolish them upon a supposition that they are so; or to leave them to a future punishment, which many do not believe, or not regard. I am not obliged to believe, that David loved every Israelite as well as his son Absalom; but tho' he had, I could not from thence infer, that all kings do so, unless I were sure, that all of them were as wise and virtuous as he.

But to come more close to the matter: do we not know of many kings who have come to their power by the most wicked means that can enter into the heart of man, even by the most outrageous injuries done to the people, sometimes by a foreign aid? As kings were, by the power of the Romans, imposed upon the Britons, that they might waste the forces, and break the spirits of that fierce people. This Tacitus acknowledges, and says, "That amongst other instruments of enslaving nations, they imposed kings

Inter instrumenta servi-tutis reges habuere. Tacit.

"kings upon them." The Medices were made masters of Florence by the force of Charles the Fifth's army. Sometimes, by a corrupt party in their own country, they have destroyed the best men, and subdued the rest; as Agathocles, Dionysius, and Cæsar, did at Rome and Syracuse. Others taking upon them to defend a people, have turned the arms, with which they were entrusted, against their own masters; as Francesco Sforza, who, being chosen by those of Milan to be their general against the Venetians, made peace with them, and by their assistance made himself prince, or, in our author's phrase, father of that great city. If these be acts of tenderness, love, justice, and charity, those who commit them may well think they have gained the affections of their people, and grow to love those from whom they fear nothing, and by whom they think they are loved. But if, on the other hand, they know they have attained to their greatness by the worst of all villainies, and that they are on that account become the object of the public hatred, they can do no less, than hate and fear those by whom they know themselves to be hated. The Italians ordinarily say, that he who does an injury never pardons, because he thinks he is never pardoned: but he that enslaves and oppresses a people does an injury, which can never be pardoned, and therefore fears it will be revenged.

Chi fa injuria non perdona mai.

Other princes, who come to their thrones by better ways, and are not contented with the power that the law allows, draw the same hatred upon themselves, when they endeavour by force or fraud to enlarge it; and must necessarily fear and hate their own people, as much as he, who by the ways before-mentioned has betrayed or subdued them. Our author makes nothing of this; but, taking it for granted, that it was all one whether Samuel spoke of a king or a tyrant, declares that the same patient obedience is due to both; but, not being pleased to give any reason, why we should believe him, I intend to offer some, why we should not.

First, there is nothing in the nature or institution of monarchy, that obliges nations to bear the exorbitances of it, when it degenerates into tyranny.

In the second place, we have no precept for it.

Thirdly, we have many approved examples, and occasional particular commands to the contrary.

I. To the first: The point of paternity being explained; the duty of children to parents proved to proceed from the benefits received from them, and that the power over them, which at the first, seems to have been left at large, because it was thought they would never abuse it, has long since been much restrained in all civilized nations, and particularly in our own; we may conclude, that men are all made of the same paste, and that one owes no more to another, than another to him, unless for some benefit received, or by virtue of some promise made. The duty arising from a benefit received, must be proportionable to it: that which grows from a promise, is determined by the promise or contract made, according to the true sense and meaning of it. He therefore, that would know what the Babylonians, Hebrews, Athenians, or Romans, did owe to Nimrod, Saul, Theseus, or Romulus,

CHAP. III. ulus, must inquire what benefits were received from them, or what was promised to them. It cannot be said, that any thing was due to them for the sake of their parents; they could have no prerogative by birth: Nimrod was the sixth son of Cush, the son of Cham, who was the youngest son of Noah: his kingdom was erected, whilst Noah, and his elder sons Shem and Japhet, as well as Ham, Cush, and his elder sons, were still living. Saul was the son of Kish, a man of Benjamin, who was the youngest son of Jacob; and he was chosen in the most democratical way by lot amongst the whole people. Theseus, according to the custom of the times, pretended to be the son of Neptune; and Rhea was so well pleased with the soldier, that had gotten her with child, that she resolved to think, or say, that Mars was the father of the children, that is to say, they were bastards; and therefore, whatever was due to them, was upon their own personal account, without any regard to their progenitors. This must be measured according to what they did for those nations before they were kings, or by the manner of their advancement. Nothing can be pretended before they were kings: Nimrod rose up after the confusion of languages, and the people, that understood the tongue he spoke, followed him; Saul was a young man unknown in Israel; Theseus and Romulus had nothing to recommend them, before other Athenians and Romans, except the reputation of their valour; and the honours conferred upon them for that reason must proceed from expectation or hope, and not from gratitude or obligation. It must therefore proceed from the manner by which they came to be kings. He that neither is nor has any title to be a king, can come to be so only by force, or by consent. If by force, he does not confer a benefit upon the people, but injures them in the most outrageous manner. If it be possible therefore, or reasonable to imagine, that one man did ever subdue a multitude, he can no otherwise resemble a father, than the worst of all enemies, who does the greatest mischiefs, resembles the best of all friends, who confers the most inestimable benefits; and consequently does as justly deserve the utmost effects of hatred, as the other does of love, respect, and service. If by consent, he who is raised from amongst the people, and placed above his brethren, receives great honours and advantages, but confers none. The obligations of gratitude are on his side, and whatsoever he does in acknowledgment to his benefactors for their love to him, is no more than his duty; and he can demand no more from them, than what they think fit to add to the favours already received. If more be pretended, it must be by virtue of that contract, and can no otherwise be proved, than by producing it to be examined, that the true sense, meaning, and intention of it, may be known.

This contract must be in form and substance according to a general rule given to all mankind, or such as is left to the will of every nation. If a general one be pretended, it ought to be shewn, that, by inquiring into the contents, we may understand the force and extent of it. If this cannot be done, it may justly pass for a fiction; no conclusion can be drawn from it; and we may be sure, that what contracts soever have been made between nations and their kings, have been framed according to the will of those nations; and and consequently, how many soever they are, and whatsoever the sense of SECT. 1.

 any or all of them may be, they can oblige no man, except those, or at the most the descendents of those that made them. Whoever therefore would persuade us, that one or more nations are, by virtue of those contracts, bound to bear all the insolences of tyrants, is obliged to shew, that by those contracts they did for ever indefinitely bind themselves so to do, how great soever they might be.

I may justly go a step farther, and affirm, that if any such should appear in the world, the folly and turpitude of the thing would be a sufficient evidence of the madness of those that made it, and utterly destroy the contents of it: but no such having been as yet produced, nor any reason given to persuade a wise man that there has ever been any such, at least among civilized nations (for whom only we are concerned), it may be concluded there never was any; or if there were, they do not at all relate to our subject; and consequently, that nations still continue in their native liberty, and are no otherwise obliged to endure the insolence of tyrants, than they,
 or each of them, may esteem them tolerable.

2. To the second: tho' the words of Samuel had implied a necessity incumbent upon the Hebrews to bear all the injuries that their kings should do to them, it could no-way relate to us; for he does not speak of all kings, but of such as they had asked, even such as reigned over the slavish Asiatics their neighbours, who are no less infamous in the world for their base-ness and cowardice, than detestable for their idolatry and vices. It was not a plot or trick of Samuel to keep the government in himself and family:
 such scurrilous expressions or thoughts are fit only for Filmer, Heylin, and their disciples: but the prophet, being troubled at the folly and wickedness of the people, who chose rather to subject themselves to the irregular will of a man, than to be governed by God, and his law, did, by the immediate command of God, declare to them what would be the event of their fury; that since they would be like to their neighbours in sin and folly, he told them they should be like to them in shame and misery; since they desired to cast off the thing that was good, they should suffer evil as the product of their own counsels; and that when they should cry to the Lord, from a sense of their miseries, he does not tell them, as our author falsely says, they should have no other remedy against tyrants but crying and praying, but that their cries and prayers should not be heard. It was just, that when they had rejected God, he should reject them, and leave them under the weight of the calamities they had brought upon themselves. In all other cases God had ever said, that when his people returned to him, he would hear and save them. When they cried, by reason of the oppressions they suffered under the Egyptians, Canaanites, Midianites, Philistines, and others, tho' their crimes had deserved them all, yet God heard, and relieved them. But when they meditated this final defection from his law, and rejection of his government, God seemed to change his nature, and forget to be gracious: "When ye shall cry to me by reason of your king, I will not hear."

CHAP. III. "hear you." This was the strongest dehoration from their wicked intention that can be imagined; but being not enough to reclaim them, they answered, "Nay, but we will have a king." They were like to their neighbours in folly and vice, and would be like to them in government; which brought all the calamities upon them that the others suffered. But I know not what conclusion can be drawn from hence in favour of our author's doctrine, unless all nations are obliged furiously to run into the same crimes with the Israelites, or to take upon themselves the same punishment, tho' they do not commit the same crimes.

If this was not a precept to the Israelites, instructing them what they should do, but a denunciation of what they should suffer for the evil which they had committed, the Old Testament will afford none; and I hope in due time to answer such as he alledges from the New. Nay, we may conclude there can be none there, because, being dictated by the same spirit, which is always uniform, and constant to itself, it could not agree with the xviith of Deuteronomy, which so extremely restrains such a king as God allowed, as not to suffer him in any manner to raise his heart above his brethren; and was said in vain, if at the same time it gave him a power which might not be resisted, or forbad others to resist him if he would not obey the law.

3. To the third: whatsoever was done by the command of God against Pharoah king of Egypt, and against the kings of the Canaanites, Midianites, Moabites, Edomites, Amorites, or Philistines, by Moses, Joshua, Ehud, Barak, Gideon, Sampson, Jephtha, Samuel, and the rest of the judges, comes expressly under the particular precepts and examples promised by me, to shew, that God had occasionally commanded, and his servants executed his commands in resisting and destroying the persons of kings, who were their own kings also, if possession was only to be regarded. And tho' this be sufficient to overthrow our author's doctrine; "that we are not to examine the titles of king, whether they be from usurpation, or any other means, but only to look upon the power;" yet they who seek truth, ought not to content themselves merely with victory; or to esteem that a victory, which is obtained by what the schools call "argumentum ad hominem," grounded upon a false proposition, and is of no force except against those who are so ill advised to advance it. Therefore laying aside the advantages that may be justly taken against Filmer, for the folly of asserting the same right to be in a usurper, as in a lawful prince; and confessing, that tho' such as have no title, may and ought to be suppressed as enemies and robbers, when respect and obedience is due to those who are rightly instituted; I say, that none can be claimed by a prince lawfully instituted, if he assume to himself a power which is not granted to him by the law of his institution, because, as Grotius says, "his legal power does not extend so far;" or turn the power that is given him, to ends contrary to those for which it was given, because he thereby destroys it, and puts himself into the same condition as if it had never been. This is proved by the example of Saul; tho' the people sinned grievously in asking a king, yet God assenting to their demand, no prince was ever more solemnly

Quia cate-
nus non ha-bet imperi-
um. De jur.
bel, solemnly instituted than he. The people chose him by lot from amongst SECT. I.

all the tribes, and he was placed in the throne by the general consent of the whole nation: but he turning his lawful power into tyranny, disobeying the word of the prophet, slaying the priests, sparing the Amalekites, and oppressing the innocent, overthrew his own right; and God declared the kingdom, which had been given him, under a conditional promise of perpetuity, to be intirely abrogated. This did not only give a right to the whole people of opposing him, but to every particular man; and upon this account David did not only fly from his fury, but resisted it. He made himself head of all the discontented persons that would follow him: he had at first four, and afterwards six hundred men; he kept these in arms against Saul, and lived upon the country; and resolved to destroy Nabal, with all his house, only for refusing to send provisions for his men. Finding himself weak and unsafe, he went to Achish the Philistine, and offered his service even against Israel. This was never reputed a sin in David, or in those that followed him, by any except the wicked court-flatterer Doeg the Edomite, and the drunken fool Nabal, who is said to have been a man of Belial.

If it be objected, that this was rather a flight than a war, inasmuch as he neither killed Saul nor his men, or that he made war as a king anointed by Samuel; I answer, that he who had six hundred men, and entertained as many as came to him, sufficiently shewed his intention rather to resist than to fly: and no other reason can be given why he did not farther pursue that intention, than that he had no greater power: and he who arms six hundred men against his prince, when he can have no more, can no more be said to obey patiently, than if he had so many hundreds of thousands. This holds, tho' he kill no man; for that is not the war, but the manner of making it: and it were as absurd to say, David made no war, because he killed no men, as that Charles the Eighth made no war in Italy, because Guicciardin says, he conquered Naples without breaking a lance. But as David's strength increased, he grew to be less sparing of blood. Those who say, kings never die, but that the right is immediately transferred to the next heirs, cannot deny that Ishboseth inherited the right of Saul, and that David had no other right of making war against him, than against Saul, unless it were conferred upon him by the tribe of Judah, that made him king. If this be true, it must be confessed, that not only a whole people, but a part of them, may at their own pleasure abrogate a kingdom, tho' never so well established by common consent; for none was ever more solemnly instituted than that of Saul; and few subjects have more strongly obliged themselves to be obedient. If it be not true, the example of Nabal is to be followed; and David, tho' guided by the Spirit of God, deserves to be condemned as a fellow that rose up against his master.

If to elude this it be said, that God instituted and abrogated Saul's kingdom, and that David, to whom the right was transmitted, might therefore proceed against him and his heirs as private men; I answer, that if the obedience due to Saul proceeded from God's institution, it can extend to none,

CHAP. III. but those who are so peculiarly instituted and anointed by his command, and the hand of his prophet, which will be of little advantage to the kings, that can give no testimony of such an institution or unction; and an indisputable right will remain to every nation of abrogating the kingdoms which are instituted by and for themselves. But as David did resist the authority of Saul and Ishbosheth, without assuming the power of a king, tho' designed by God, and anointed by the prophet, till he was made king of Judah by that tribe; or arrogating to himself a power over the other tribes, till he was made king by them, and had entered into a covenant with them; it is much more certain, that the persons and authority of ill kings, who have no title to the privileges due to Saul by virtue of his institution, may be justly resisted; which is as much as is necessary to my purpose.

1 Sam. xxvi. Object. But David's heart smote him, when he had cut off the skirt of Saul's garment, and he would not suffer Abishai to kill him. This might be of some force, if it were pretended, that every man was obliged to kill an ill king, whensoever he could do it, which I think no man ever did say; and no man having ever affirmed it, no more can be concluded than is confessed by all. But how is it possible, that a man of a generous spirit, like to David, could see a great and valiant king, chosen from amongst all the tribes of Israel, anointed by the command of God, and the hand of the prophet, famous for victories obtained against the enemies of Israel, and a wonderful deliverance thereby purchased to that people, cast at his feet to receive life or death from the hand of one whom he had so furiously persecuted, and from whom he least deserved, and could least expect mercy, without extraordinary commotion of mind; most especially when Abishai, who saw all that he did, and thereby ought best to have known his thoughts, expressed so great a readiness to kill him? This could not but make him reflect upon the instability of all that seemed to be most glorious in men, and shew him, that if Saul, who had been named even among the prophets, and assisted in an extraordinary manner to accomplish such great things, was so abandoned and given over to fury, misery, and shame, he that seemed to be most firmly established ought to take care lest he should fall.

Surely these things are neither to be thought strange in relation to Saul, who was God's anointed, nor communicable to such as are not: some may suppose he was king by virtue of God's unction (tho' if that were true, he had never been chosen and made king by the people); but it were madness to think, he became God's anointed by being king: for if that were so, the same right and title would belong to every king, even to those, who by his command were accursed and destroyed by his servants Moses, Joshua, and Samuel. The same men, at the same time, and in the same sense, would be both his anointed and accursed, loved and detested by him; and the most sacred privileges made to extend to the worst of his enemies.

Again; the war made by David, was not upon the account of being king, as anointed by Samuel, but upon the common natural right of defending himself against the violence and fury of a wicked man; he trusted to the promise, "that he should be king," but knew that as yet he was not so: and when Saul found he had spared his life, he said, "I now know well, that thou shalt SECT. I.

 "surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall surely be established 1 Sam. xxiv.
 "in thy hand;" not that it was already. Nay, David himself was so far from taking upon him to be king, till the tribe of Judah had chosen him, that he often acknowledged Saul to be lord. When Baanah and Rechab brought the head of Ishbosheth to him, he commanded them to be slain; "be- 2 Sam. iv,
 "cause they had killed a righteous man upon his bed, in his own house;"
 which he could not have said, if Ishbosheth had unjustly detained from him the ten tribes, and that he had a right to reign over them before they had chosen him. The word of God did not make him king, but only foretold, that he should be king; and by such ways as he pleased prepared the hearts of the people to set him up; and till the time designed by God for that work was accomplished, he pretended to no other authority, than what the six hundred men who first followed him, afterwards the tribe of Judah, and at last all the rest of the people, conferred upon him.

I no way defend Absalom's revolt; he was wicked, and acted wickedly;
 but after his death no man was ever blamed or questioned for siding with him: and Amasa, who commanded his army, is represented in scripture as a good man, even David saying, that Joab, by slaying Abner and Amasa, had killed "two men who were better than himself;" which could not have 2 Sam. xx.
 been, unless the people had a right of looking into matters of government, and of redressing abuses: tho', being deceived by Absalom, they so far erred, as to prefer him, who was in all respects wicked, before the man, who, except in the matter of Uriah, is said to be after God's own heart. This right was acknowledged by David himself, when he commanded Hushai to say to Absalom, "I will be thy servant, O king;" and by Hushai in the following 2 Kings.
 chapter, "Nay, but whom the Lord, and his people, and all the men of "Israel chuse, his will I be, and with him will I abide:" which could have no sense in it, unless the people had a right of chusing, and that the choice in which they generally concurred, was esteemed to be from God.

But if Saul, who was made king by the whole people, and anointed by the command of God, might be lawfully resisted when he departed from the law of his institution; it cannot be doubted, that any other, for the like reason, may be resisted. If David, tho' designed by God to be king, and anointed by the hand of the prophet, was not king till the people had chosen him, and he had made a covenant with them; it will, if I mistake not, be hard to find a man who can claim a right which is not originally from them. And if the people of Israel could erect, and pull down, institute, abrogate, or transfer to other persons or families, kingdoms more firmly established than any we know, the same right cannot be denied to other nations.

S E C T. II.

The kings of Israel and Judah were under a law not safely to be transgressed.

OUR author might be pardoned if he only vented his own follies; but he aggravates his own crime, by imputing them to men of more credit; and tho' I cannot look upon Sir Walter Raleigh as a very good interpreter of scripture, he had too much understanding to say, "That if practice declare the greatness of authority, even the best kings of Israel and Judah were not tied to any law, but they did whatsoever they pleased in the greatest matters;" for there is no sense in those words. "If practice declares the greatness of authority, even the best were tied to no law," signifies nothing; for practice cannot declare the greatness of authority. Peter the Cruel of Castile, and Christiern the Second of Denmark, killed whom they pleased; but no man ever thought they had therefore a right to do so: and if there was a law, all were tied by it, and the best were less likely to break it than the worst. But if Sir Walter Raleigh's opinion, which he calls a conjecture, be taken, there was so great a difference between the kings of Israel and Judah, that as to their general proceedings in point of power, hardly any thing can be said which may rightly be applied to both; and he there endeavours to shew, that the reason why the ten tribes did not return to the house of David, after the destruction of the houses of Jeroboam and Baasha, was, because they would not endure a power so absolute as that which was exercised by the house of David. If he has therefore any-where said, that the kings did what they pleased, it must be in the sense that Moses Maimonides says, the kings of Israel committed many extravagancies, because they were * "insolent, impious, and despisers of the law." But whatsoever Sir Walter Raleigh may say (for I do not remember his words, and have not leisure to seek whether any such are found in his books), it is most evident, that they did not what they pleased. The tribes, that did not submit to David, nor crown him till they thought fit, and then made a covenant with him, took care it might be observed, whether he would or not. Absalom's rebellion, followed by almost all Israel, was a terrible check to his will. That of Sheba, the son of Bichri, was like to have been worse, if it had not been suppressed by Joab's diligence; and David often confessed the sons of Zeruiah were too hard for him. Solomon indeed, overthrowing the law given by Moses, multiplying gold and silver, wives and horses, introducing idolatry, and lifting up his heart above his brethren, did what he pleased; but Rehoboam paid for all: the ten tribes revolted from him, by reason of the heavy burdens laid upon them; stoned Adoram, who was sent to levy the tributes, and set up Jeroboam, who, as Sir Walter Raleigh says in the place before cited, had no other title than the courtesy of the people, and utterly

2 l. hist.
cap. 19.

* Quia superbi erant corde, impii, & spretores legis. Mor. Nevoch.

utterly rejected the house of David. If practice therefore declares a right, SECT. 2.
 the practice of the people to avenge the injuries they suffered from their kings, { as soon as they found a man fit to be their leader, shews they had a right of doing it.

It is true, the best of the kings, with Moses, Joshua, and Samuel, may in one sense be said to have done what they pleased, because they desired to do that only which was good. But this will hardly be brought to confer a right upon all kings: and I deny that even the kings of Judah did what they pleased, or that it were any thing to our question, if they did. Zedekiah professed to the great men (that is, to the sanhedrin), "that without them he could do nothing." When Amaziah, by his folly, had brought Jer. xxxviii. a great slaughter upon the tribe of Judah, they conspired against him in public council: whereupon he fled to Lachish, and they, pursuing him thither, 2 Kings xiv. killed him, avowed the fact, and it was neither questioned, nor blamed: which examples agree with the paraphrase of Josephus on Deut. xvii. "He Antiq. Jud. shall do nothing without the consent of the sanhedrin; and if he attempt it, they shall hinder him." This was the law of God, not to be abrogated by man; a law of liberty directly opposite to the necessity of submitting to the will of a man. This was a gift bestowed by God upon his children and people; whereas slavery was a great part of the curse denounced against Ham for his wickedness, and perpetually incumbent upon his posterity. The great sanhedrin were constituted judges, as Grotius says, most particularly of such matters as concerned their kings; and Maimonides affirms, that the kings were judged by them: the distribution of the power to the inferior sanhedrins, in every tribe and city, with the right of calling the people together in general assemblies as often as occasion required, were the foundations of their liberty; and, being added to the law of the kingdom, prescribed in the xviith of Deuteronomy (if they should think fit to have a king), established the freedom of that people upon a solid foundation. And tho' they in their fury did in a great measure wave the benefits God had bestowed upon them; yet there was enough left to restrain the lusts of their kings. Ahab did not treat with Naboth, as with a servant, whose person and estate depended upon his will; and does not seem to have been so tender-hearted to grieve much for his refusal, if by virtue of his royal authority he could have taken away his vineyard, and his life: but, that failing, he had no other way of accomplishing his design, than by the fraud of his accursed wife, and the perfidious wretches she employed. And no better proof, that it did fail, can reasonably be required, than that he was obliged to have recourse to such sordid, odious, and dangerous remedies: but we are furnished with one, that is more unquestionable; "Hast thou killed, and also taken possession?" "In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall they lick thy 1 Kings xxi. blood, even thine." This shews, that the kings were not only under a law, but under a law of equality with the rest of the people, even that of relation. He had raised his heart above his brethren: but God brought him down, and made him to suffer what he had done; he was in all respects wicked, but the justice of this sentence consisted in the law he had broken, which could

CHAP. III could not have been, if he had been subject to none. But as this retaliation was the sum of all the judicial law given by God to his people, the sentence pronounced against Ahab, in conformity to it, and the execution committed to Jehu, shews, that the kings were no less obliged to perform the law, than other men, tho' they were not so easily punished for transgressing it, as others were; and, if many of them did escape, it perfectly agrees with what had been foretold by Samuel.

S E C T. III.

Samuel did not describe to the Israelites the glory of a free monarchy; but the evils the people should suffer, that he might divert them from desiring a king.

THO' no restraint had been put upon the lusts of the Hebrew kings, it could be no prejudice to any other nation. They deflected from the law of God: and, rejecting him, that he should reign over them no longer, they fell into that misery, which could affect none, but those who enjoy the same blessings, and with the same fury despise them. If their kings had more power than consisted with their welfare, they gave it, and God renounces the institution of * such. He gave them a law of liberty; and if they fell into the shame and misery, that accompanies slavery, it was their own work. They were not obliged to have any king; and could not without a crime have any but one, who must not raise his heart above the rest of them. This was taught by Moses: and Samuel, who spoke by the same spirit, could not contradict him; and in telling the people, what such a king as they desired would do when he should be established, he did announce to them the misery they would bring upon themselves, by chusing such a one, as he had forbidden. This free monarchy, which our author thinks to be so majestically described, was not only displeasing to the prophet, but declared by God to be a rejection of him, and inconsistent with his reign over them. This might have been sufficient to divert any other people from their furious resolution; but the prophet, farther enforcing his dissuasion, told them, that God (who had in all other cases been their helper) would not hear them when they should cry to him by reason of their king. This is the majestic description of that free monarchy, with which our author is so much pleased: it was displeasing to the prophet, hateful to God, an aggravation of all the crimes they had committed since they came out of Egypt, and that which would bring (as it did) most certain and irreparable destruction upon themselves.

But it seems, the regal majesty in that age was in its infancy, and little in comparison of that, which we find described by Tacitus, Suetonius, and others, in later times. "He shall take your sons," says Samuel, "and set them over his chariots, and your daughters to make them confectioners" "and * "Ye have chosen kings, but not by me; and prince, but I know them not." Hof.

“and cooks;” but the majesty of the Roman emperors was carried to a higher SECT. 3.
pitch of glory. Ahab could not, without employing treachery and fraud, get a small spot of ground for his money to make a garden of herbs: but Tiberius, Caligula, and Nero, killed whom they pleased, and took what they pleased of their estates. When they had satiated their cruelty and avarice, by the murders and confiscations of the most eminent and best men, they commonly exposed their children to the lust of their slaves. If the power of doing evil be glorious, the utmost excess is its perfection; and it is pity, that Samuel knew no more of the effects produced by unrestrained lust, that he might have made the description yet more majestic: and as nothing can be suffered by man beyond constupration, torments, and death, instead of such trifles as he mentioned, he might have shewed them the effects of fury in its greatest exaltation.

If it be good for a nation to live under such a power, why did not God of his own goodness institute it? Did his wisdom, and love to his people, fail? Or if he himself had not set up the best government over them, could he be displeased with them for asking it? Did he separate that nation from the rest of mankind, to make their condition worse than that of others? Or can they be said to have sinned and rejected God, when they desired nothing but the government, which, by a perpetual ordinance, he had established over all the nations of the world? Is not the law of nature a rule which he has given to things? and the law of man's nature, which is reason, an emanation of the divine wisdom, or some footsteps of divine light remaining in us? Is it possible, that this, which is from God, can be contrary to his will; and can he be offended with those who desire to live in a conformity to that law? Or could it justly be said, the people had chosen that which is not good, if nothing in government be good but what they chose?

But as the worst men delight in the worst things, and fools are pleased with the most extreme absurdities, our author not only gives the highest praises to that which bears so many marks of God's hatred; but after having said, that Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, were kings, he goes on, and says, “The Israelites begged a king of Samuel;” which had been impertinent, if the magistrates instituted by the law were kings: and tho' it might be a folly in them to ask what they had already, it could be no sin to desire that which they enjoyed by the ordinance of God. If they were not kings, it follows, that the only government set up by God, amongst men, wanted the principal part, even the head and foundation, from whence all the other parts have their action and being; that is, God's law is against God's law, and destroys itself.

But if God did neither by a general and perpetual ordinance establish over all nations the monarchy which Samuel describes, nor prescribe it to his own people by a particular command, it was purely the people's creature, the production of their own fancy, conceived in wickedness, and brought forth in iniquity, an idol set up by themselves to their own destruction, in imitation of their accursed neighbours; and their reward was no better than the concession of an impious petition, which is one of God's heaviest

CHAP. III. heaviest judgments. Samuel's words are acknowledged by all interpreters, who were not malicious or mad, to be a dissuasion from their wicked purpose; not a description of what a king might justly do by virtue of his office, but what those who should be set up against God, and his law, would do when they should have the power in their hands: and I leave such as have the understandings of men, and are not abandoned by God, to judge what influence this ought to have upon other nations, either as to obligation or imitation.

S E C T. IV.

No people can be obliged to suffer from their kings what they have not a right to do.

OUR author's next work is to tell us, "That the scope of Samuel was to teach the people a dutiful obedience to their king, even in the things that they think mischievous or inconvenient: for, by telling them what the king would do, he indeed instructs them what a subject must suffer; yet not so, that it is right for kings to do injury; but it is right for them to go unpunished by the people, if they do it; so that in this point it is all one whether Samuel describe a king, or a tyrant." This is hard; but the conclusion is grounded upon nothing. There is no relation between a prediction, that a thing shall be attempted or done to me, and a precept, that I shall not defend myself, or punish the person that attempts or does it. If a prophet should say, that a thief lay in the way to kill me, it might reasonably persuade me not to go, or to go in such a manner as to be able to defend myself: but can no way oblige me to submit to the violence that shall be offered, or my friends and children not to avenge my death if I fall; much less can other men be deprived of the natural right of defending themselves by my imprudence or obstinacy in not taking the warning given, whereby I might have preserved my life. For every man has a right of resisting, some way or other, that which ought not to be done to him; and tho' human laws do not, in all cases, make men judges and avengers of the injuries offered to them, I think there is none that does not justify the man who kills another that offers violence to him, if it appear, that the way prescribed by the law, for the preservation of the innocent, cannot be taken. This is not only true in the case of outrageous attempts to assassinate or rob upon the high-way, but in divers others of less moment. I knew a man who being appointed to keep his master's park, killed three men in one night, that came to destroy his deer; and putting himself into the hands of the magistrate, and confessing the fact, both in matter and manner, he was at the public assizes not only acquitted, but commended for having done his duty; and this, in a time when, it is well known, justice was severely administered, and little favour expected by him or his master. Nay, all laws must fall, human societies that subsist by them be dissolved, and all innocent innocent persons be exposed to the violence of the most wicked, if men might not justly defend themselves against injustice by their own natural right, when the ways prescribed by public authority cannot be taken. SECT. 4.

Our author may perhaps say, this is true in all except the king: and I desire to know why, if it be true in all except the king, it should not be true in relation to him? Is it possible, that he who is instituted for the obtaining of justice, should claim the liberty of doing injustice as a privilege? Were it not better for a people to be without law, than that a power should be established by law to commit all manner of violences with impunity? Did not David resist those of Saul? Did he not make himself head of the tribe of Judah, when they revolted against his son, and afterwards of the ten tribes, that rejected his posterity? Did not the Israelites stone Adoram who collected the taxes, revolt from the house of David, set up Jeroboam; and did not the prophet say it was from the Lord? If it was from the Lord, was it not good? If it was good then, is it not so for ever? Did good proceed from one root then, and from another now? If God had avenged the blood of Naboth by fire from heaven, and destroyed the house of Ahab, as he did the two captains, and their men, who were sent to apprehend Elijah, it might be said, he reserved that vengeance to himself; but he did it by the sword of Jehu and the army (which was the people who had set him up) for an example to others.

But it is good to examine what this "dutiful obedience" is that our author mentions. Men usually owe no more than they receive. It is hard to know what the Israelites owed to Saul, David, Jeroboam, Ahab, or any other king, whether good or bad, till they were made kings: and the act of the people by which so great a dignity was conferred, seems to have laid a duty upon them, who did receive more than they had to give: so that something must be due from them unless it were released by virtue of a covenant or promise made; and none could accrue to them from the people afterwards, unless from the merit of the person in rightly executing his office. If a covenant or promise be pretended, the nature and extent of the obligation can only be known by the contents expressed, or the true intention of it. If there be a general form of covenant set and agreed upon, to which all nations must submit, it were good to know where it may be found, and by whose authority it is established, and then we may examine the sense of it. If no such do appear, we may rationally look upon those to be impostors who should go about from thence to derive a right: and as that which does not appear, is as if it were not, we may justly conclude there is no other, or none that can have any effect, but such as have been made by particular nations with their princes; which can be of no force or obligation to others, nor to themselves, any farther than according to the true intention of those that made them. There is no such thing therefore as a dutiful obedience, or duty of being obedient, incumbent upon all nations by virtue of any covenant; nor upon any particular nation, unless it be expressed by a covenant: and whoever pretends to a right of taking our sons and daughters, CHAP. III. ters, lands or goods, or to go unpunished if he do, must shew, that these things are expressed or intended by the covenant.

But tho' nations, for the most part, owe nothing to kings, till they are kings, and that it can hardly be conceived, that any people did ever owe so much to a man, as might not be fully repaid by the honour and advantages of such an advancement; yet it is possible, that when they are made kings, they may, by their good government, lay such obligations upon their subjects, as ought to be recompensed by obedience and service. There is no mortal creature that deserves so well from mankind, as a wise, valiant, diligent, and just, king, who as a father cherishes his people; as a shepherd feeds, defends, and is ready to lay down his life for his flock; who is a terror to evil-doers, and a praise to those that do well. This is a glorious prerogative, and he who has it is happy. But before this can be adjudged to belong to all, it must be proved, that all have the virtues that deserve it; and he that exacts the dutiful obedience that arises from them, must prove, that they are in him. He that does this, need not plead for impunity when he does injuries; for if he do them, he is not the man we speak of: not being so, he can have no title to the duty, by human institution or covenant; nor by divine law, since, as is already proved, God has neither established kings over all nations by precept, nor recommended them by example, in setting them over his own people. He has not therefore done it at all; there is no such thing in nature; and nations can owe nothing to kings merely as kings, but what they owe by the contract made with them.

As these contracts are made voluntarily, without any previous obligation, it is evident men make them in consideration of their own good; and they can be of force no longer, than he with whom they are made perform his part in procuring it; and that if he turn the power which was given to him for the public good, to the public inconvenience and damage, he must necessarily lose the benefit he was to receive by it. The word "think" is foolishly and affectedly put in by our author; for those matters are very often so evident, that even the weakest know them. No great sagacity is required to understand, that lewd, slothful, ignorant, false, unjust, covetous, and cruel princes, bring inconveniences and mischiefs upon nations; and many of them are so evidently guilty of some or all these vices, that no man can be mistaken in imputing them; and the utmost calamities may rationally be expected from them, unless a remedy be applied.

But, says he, Samuel by telling them "what the king would do, instructs them what the subjects must suffer, and that it is right he should go unpunished:" but, by his favour, Samuel says no such thing; neither is it to be concluded, that because a king will do wickedly, he must be suffered, any more than a private man, who should take the same resolution. But he told them, that "when they should cry to the Lord by reason of their king, he would not hear them." This was as much as to say, their ruin was unavoidable; and that, having put the power into the hands of those, who, instead of protecting, would oppress them; and thereby having provoked God against them, so as he would not hearken to their cries, they could have have no relief. But this was no security to the authors of their calamity. SECT. 4.

The houses of Jeroboam, Baasha, and Omri, escaped not unpunished, tho' the people did not thereby recover their liberty. The kings had introduced a corruption that was inconsistent with it. But they who could not settle upon a right foundation to prevent future mischiefs, could avenge such as they had suffered, upon the heads of those who had caused them, and frequently did it most severely. The like befel the Romans, when, by the violence of tyranny, all good order was overthrown, good discipline extinguished, and the people corrupted. Ill princes could be cut in pieces, and mischiefs might be revenged, tho' not prevented. But it is not so everywhere, nor at all times; and nothing is more irrational, than from one or a few examples to conclude a general necessity of future events. They alter according to circumstances: and as some nations by destroying tyrants could not destroy tyranny; others in removing the tyrant, have cut up tyranny by the roots. This variety has been seen in the same nation at different times: the Romans recovered their liberty by expelling Tarquin; but remained slaves notwithstanding the slaughter of Cæsar. Whilst the body of the people was uncorrupted, they cured the evil wrought by the person, in taking him away. It was no hard matter to take the regal power, that by one man had been enjoyed for life, and to place it in the hands of two annual magistrates, whilst the nobility and people were, according to the condition of that age, strong, and ready to maintain it. But when the mischief had taken deeper root; when the best part of the people had perished in the civil wars; when all their eminent men had fallen in battle, or by the proscriptions; when their discipline was lost, and virtue abolished, the poor remains of the distressed people were brought under the power of a mercenary soldiery, and found no relief. When they killed one tyrant, they often made room for a worse: it availed them nothing to cut off a rotten branch, whilst the accursed root remained, and sent forth new sprouts of the same nature to their destruction. Other generous nations have been subdued beyond a possibility of recovery; and those that are naturally base, slide into the like misery, without the impulse of an exterior power. They are slaves by nature, and have neither the understanding nor courage that is required for the constitution and management of a government within themselves. They can no more subsist without a master, than a flock without a shepherd. They have no comprehension of liberty, and can neither desire the good they do not know, nor enjoy it if it were bestowed upon them. They bear all burdens; and whatever they suffer, they have no other remedy or refuge, than in the mercy of their lord. But such nations as are naturally strong, stout, and of good understanding, whose vigour remains unbroken, manners uncorrupted, reputation unblemished, and increasing in numbers; who neither want men to make up such armies as may defend them against foreign or domestic enemies, nor leaders to head them, do ordinarily set limits to their patience. They know how to preserve their liberty, or to vindicate the violation of it; and the more patient they have been, the more

CHAP. III. inflexible they are when they resolve to be so no longer. Those who are so foolish to put them upon such courses, do to their cost find that there is a difference between lions and asses; and he is a fool who knows not, that * swords were given to men, that none might be slaves, but such as know not how to use them.

S E C T. V.

The mischiefs suffered from wicked kings are such as render it both reasonable and just for all nations, that have virtue and power, to exert both in repelling them.

IF our author deserve credit, we need not examine, whether nations have a right of resisting, or a reasonable hope of succeeding in their endeavours to prevent or avenge the mischiefs that are feared or suffered, for it is not worth their pains. "The inconveniences," says he, "and miseries which are reckoned up by Samuel, as belonging unto kingly government, were not intolerable, but such as have been and are still borne by the subjects free consent from their princes. Nay, at this day, and in this land, many tenants by their tenures are tied unto the same subjection, even unto subordinate and inferior lords." He is an excellent advocate for kingly government, that accounts inconveniences and miseries to be some of the essentials of it, which others esteem to be only incidents. Tho' many princes are violent and wicked, yet some have been gentle and just: tho' many have brought misery upon nations, some have been beneficial to them: and they who are esteemed most severe against monarchy, think the evils that are often suffered under that form of government, proceed from the corruption of it, or deviation from the principle of its institution; and that they are rather to be imputed to the vices of the person, than to the thing itself; but if our author speak truth, it is universally and eternally naught, inconvenience and misery belong to it.

He thinks to mend this, by saying, they are not intolerable: but what is intolerable, if inconveniences and miseries be not? For what end can he think governments to have been established, unless to prevent or remove inconveniences and miseries; or how can that be called a government, which does not only permit, but cause them? What can incline nations to set up governments? Is it that they may suffer inconveniences, and be brought to misery? or if it be to enjoy happiness, how can that subsist under a government, which, not by accident, deflection, or corruption, but by a necessity inherent in itself, causes inconveniences and miseries? If it be pretended, that no human constitution can be altogether free from inconveniences; I answer, that the best may to some degree fall into them, because they may be corrupted; but evil and misery can properly belong to none that is not evil in its own nature.

If

* Ignoratque datos, ne quisquam serviat, enses.      Lucan.

If Samuel deserve credit, or may be thought to have spoken sense, he could not have enumerated the evils, which he foresaw the people should suffer from their kings, nor say, that they should cry to the Lord by reason of them, unless they were in themselves grievous, and in comparison greater than what they had suffered or known; since that would not have diverted them from their intention, but rather have confirmed them in it. And I leave it to our author to shew, why any people should, for the pleasure of one or a few men, erect or suffer that which brings more of evil with it than any other. SECT. 5.

Moreover, there is a great difference between that which nations sometimes suffer under kings, and that which they willingly suffer; most especially if our author's maxim be received, that all laws are the mandates of kings, and the subjects liberties and privileges no more than their gracious concessions; for how patient soever they are under the evils they suffer, it might reasonably be believed they are so because they know not how to help it: and this is certainly the case of too many places that are known to us. Whoever doubts of this, if he will not put himself to the trouble of going to Turkey or Morocco, let him pass only into Normandy, and ask the naked, barefooted, and half-starved people, whether they are willing to suffer the miseries under which they groan; and whether the magnificence of Versailles, and the pomp of their haughty master, do any way alleviate their calamities. If this also be a matter of too much pains, the wretches that come hither every day will inform him, that it is not by their own consent they are deprived of all honours and offices in the commonwealth, even of those, which, by a corrupt custom, that had gained the force of a law, they had dearly bought; prohibited to exercise any trade; exposed to the utmost effects of fraud and violence, if they refuse to adore their master's idols. They will tell him, that it is not willingly they leave their lands and estates to seek a shelter in the most remote parts of the world; but because they are under a force which they are not able to resist; and because one part of the nation, which is enriched with the spoils of the other, have foolishly contributed to lay a yoke upon them which they cannot break.

To what he says concerning tenures, I answer, no man in England owes any service to his lord, unless by virtue of a contract made by himself or his predecessors, under which he holds the land granted to him on that condition by the proprietor. There may be something of hardship, but nothing of injustice. It is a voluntary act in the beginning and continuance; and all men know that what is done to one who is willing * is no injury. He who did not like the conditions, was not obliged to take the land; and he might leave it, if afterwards he came to dislike them. If any man say, the like may be done by any one in the kingdom, I answer, that it is not always true; the protestants now in France cannot without extreme hazard go out of that country, tho' they are contented to lose their estates. It is accounted a crime, for which they are condemned perpetually to the galleys, and

* Volenti non fit injuria.

CHAP. III. and such as are aiding to them to grievous fines. But before this be acknowledged to have any similitude or relation to our discourse concerning kings, it must be proved, that the present king, or those under whom he claims, is or were proprietors of all the lands in England, and granted the several parcels under the condition of suffering patiently such inconveniences and miseries as are above-mentioned; or that they who did confer the crown upon any of them, did also give a propriety in the land; which I do not find in any of the fifteen or sixteen titles that have been since the coming in of the Normans: and if it was not done to the first of every one, it cannot accrue to the others, unless by some new act to the same purpose, which will not easily be produced.

It will be no less difficult to prove, that any thing unworthy of freemen is by any tenures imposed in England, unless it be the offering up of the wives and daughters of tenants to the lust of abbots and monks; and they who are so far from being willingly suffered, that since the dens and nurseries of those beasts were abolished, no man that succeeds them has had impudence sufficient to exact the performance; and tho' the letter of the law may favour them, the turpitude of the thing has extinguished the usage.

But even the kings of Israel and Judah, who brought upon the people those evils that had been foretold by Samuel, did not think they had a right to the powers they exercised. If the law had given a right to Ahab to take the best of their vineyards, he might without ceremony have taken that of Naboth, and by the majestic power of an absolute monarch, have chastised the churlish clown, who refused to sell or change it for another: but for want of it, he was obliged to take a very different course. If the lives of subjects had in the like manner depended upon the will of kings, David might without scruple have killed Uriah, rather than to place him in the front of the army, that he might fall by his own courage. The malice and treachery of such proceedings argues a defect of power; and he that acts in such an oblique manner, shews, that his actions are not warranted by the law, which is boldly executed in the face of the sun. This shews the interpretation put upon the words, "against thee only have I sinned," by court-flatterers, to be false. If he had not sinned against Bathsheba, whom he corrupted, Uriah whom he caused to be killed, the people that he scandalized, and the law which he violated, he had never endeavoured to cover his guilt by so vile a fraud. And as he did not thereby fly the sight of God, but of men, it is evident, that he in that action feared men more than God.

Psal. li.

If by the examples of Israel and Judah we may judge, whether the inconveniences and miseries brought upon nations by their kings be tolerable or intolerable, it will be enough to consider the madness of Saul's cruelty towards his subjects, and the slaughter brought upon them by the hand of the Philistines on mount Gilboa, where he fell with the flower of all Israel; the civil wars that happened in the time of David, and the plague brought upon the people by his wickedness; the heavy burdens laid upon them by Solomon, and the idolatry favoured by him; the wretched folly of Rehoboam, and the defection of the ten tribes caused by it; the idolatry established by Jeroboam, and

and the kings of Israel, and that of many of those of Judah also; the frequent wars, and unheard of slaughters ensuing thereupon between the tribes; the daily devastations of the country by all sorts of strangers; the murders of the prophets; the abolition of God's worship; the desolation of towns and provinces; the captivity of the ten tribes carried away into unknown countries; and, in the end, the abolition of both kingdoms, with the captivity of the tribe of Judah, and the utter destruction of the city. It cannot be said, that these things were suffered under kings, and not from or by them; for the desolation of the cities, people, and country, is, in many places of scripture, imputed to the kings that taught Israel to sin, as appears by what was denounced against Jeroboam, Jehu, Ahaz, Manasseh, Zedekiah, and others. Nay, the captivity of Babylon, with the evils ensuing, were first announced to Hezekiah for his vanity; and Josiah, by the like, brought a great slaughter upon himself and people. But if mischiefs fell upon the people by the frailty of these, who, after David, were the best, nothing surely less than the utmost of all miseries could be expected from such as were set to do evil, and to make the nation like to themselves, in which they met with too great success.

If it be pretended, that God's people, living under an extraordinary dispensation, can be no example to us, I desire other histories may be examined; for, I confess, I know no nation so great, happy, and prosperous, nor any power, so well established, that two or three ill kings, immediately succeeding each other, have not been able to destroy, and bring to such a condition, that it appeared the nations must perish, unless the senates, diets, and other assemblies of state, had put a stop to the mischief, by restraining or deposing them; and tho' this might be proved by innumerable testimonies, I shall content myself with that of the Roman empire, which perished by the vices, corruption, and baseness, of their princes: the noble kingdom of the Goths in Spain overthrown by the tyranny of Witza and Rodrigo: the present state of Spain now languishing, and threatening ruin from the same causes: France brought to the last degree of misery and weakness by the degenerate races of Pharamond and Charles, preserved and restored by the virtues of Pepin and Capet; to which may be added those of our own country, which are so well known that I need not mention them.

S E C T. VI.

It is not good for such nations as will have kings, to suffer them to be glorious, powerful, or abounding in riches.

OUR author having hitherto spoken of all nations, as born under a necessity of being subject to absolute monarchy, which he pretends to have been set up by the universal and indispensable law of God and nature, now seems to leave to their discretion, whether they will have a king or not; but

CHAP. III. says, that those "who will have a king, are bound to allow him royal maintenance, by providing revenues for the crown; since it is for the honour, profit, and safety, of the people, to have their king glorious, powerful, and abounding in riches." If there be any thing of sense in this clause, there is nothing of truth in the foundation or principle of his whole book. For as the right and being of a father is natural or inherent, and noways depending upon the will of the child; that of a king is so also, if he be, and ought to enjoy the rights belonging to the father of the people: and it is not less ridiculous to say, "those who will have a king," than it would be to say, "he that will have a father;" for every one must have one whether he will or not. But if the king be a father, as our author from thence infers, that all laws are from him, none can be imposed upon him; and whatsoever the subject enjoys is by his concessions: it is absurd to speak of an obligation lying upon the people to allow him royal maintenance, by providing revenues, since he has all in himself, and they have nothing, that is not from him, and depending upon his will. For this reason a worthy gentleman of the house of commons, in the year 1640, desired, that the business of the judges, who in the star-chamber had given for their opinion concerning ship-money, "that, in cases of necessity, the king might provide it by his own authority, and that he was judge of that necessity," might be first examined, that they might know whether they had any thing to give, before they should speak of giving. And as it is certain, that if the sentence of those perjured wretches had stood, the subjects of England by consequence would have been found to have nothing to give; it is no less sure, that if our author's principle concerning the paternal and absolute power of kings be true, it will, by a more compendious way, appear, that it is not left to the choice of any nation, whether they will have a king or not; for they must have him, and can have nothing to allow him, but must receive all from him.

But if those only who "will have a king," are bound to have one, and to allow this "royal maintenance," such as will not have a king, are, by one and the same act, delivered from the necessity of having one, and from providing maintenance for him; which utterly overthrows the magnificent fabric of paternal monarchy; and the kings, who were lately represented by our author, placed on the throne by God and nature, and endowed with an absolute power over all, appear to be purely the creatures of the people, and to have nothing but what is received from them.

From hence it may be rationally inferred, that * he who makes a thing to be, makes it to be only what he pleases. This must hold in relation to kings as well as other magistrates; and as they who made consuls dictators, and military tribunes, gave them only such power, and for such a time, as best pleased themselves, it is impossible they should not have the same right in relation to kings, in making them what they please, as well as not to make them unless they please; except there be a charm belonging to the name, or the letters
that

* Qui dat esse, dat modum esse.

that compose it; which cannot belong to all nations; for they are different SECT. 6.
in every one according to their several languages.

But, says our author, it is "for the honour, profit, and safety of the " people, that the king should be glorious, powerful, and abounding in riches,"
There is therefore no obligation upon them, and they are to judge whether it be so or not. The scripture says plainly the contrary: "He shall not mul-Deut. xvii.
" tiply silver and gold, wives and horses: he shall not lift up his heart " above his brethren. He shall not therefore be glorious, powerful, or abounding in riches. Reason and experience teach us the same thing: if those nations, that have been proud, luxurious, and vicious, have desired by pomp and riches to foment the vices of their princes, thereby to cherish their own; such as have excelled in virtue, and good discipline, have abhorred it; and, except the immediate exercise of their office, have kept their supreme magistrates to a manner of living little different from that of private men:
and it had been impossible to maintain that frugality, in which the integrity of their manners did chiefly consist, if they had set up an example directly contrary to it, in him who was to be an example to others; or to provide for their own safety, if they had overthrown that integrity of manners by which it could only be obtained and preserved. There is a necessity incumbent upon every nation that lives in the like principle, to put a stop to the entrance of those vices that arise from the superfluity of riches, by keeping their kings in that honest poverty, which is the mother and nurse of modesty, sobriety, and all manner of virtue: and no man can deny this to be well done, unless he will affirm, that pride, luxury, and vice, is more profitable to a nation, than the virtues that are upheld by frugality.

There is another reason of no less importance to those nations, who, tho' they think fit to have kings, yet desire to preserve their liberty, which obliges them to set limits to the glory, power, and riches of their kings; and that is,
That they can no otherwise be kept within the rules of the law. Men are naturally propense to corruption; and if he, whose will and interest it is to corrupt them, be furnished with the means, he will never fail to do it.
Power, honours, riches, and the pleasures that attend them, are the baits by which men are drawn to prefer a personal interest before the public good; and the number of those who covet them, is so great, that he who abounds in them will be able to gain so many to his service as shall be sufficient to subdue the rest. It is hard to find a tyranny in the world that has not been introduced this way; for no man by his own strength could ever subdue a multitude; none could ever bring many to be subservient to his ill designs, but by the rewards they received or hoped. By this means Caesar accomplished his work, and overthrew the liberty of his country, and with it all that was then good in the world. They who were corrupted in their minds, desired to put all the power and riches into his hands, that he might distribute them to such as served him. And he, who was nothing less than covetous in his own nature, desired riches, that he might gain followers; and by the plunder of Gaul he corrupted those that betrayed Rome to him. And tho' I do not delight

CHAP. III. delight to speak of the affairs of our own time, I desire those who know the present state of France to tell me, whether it were possible for the king to keep that nation under servitude, if a vast revenue did not enable him to gain so many to his particular service as are sufficient to keep the rest in subjection: and if this be not enough, let them consider, whether all the dangers that now threaten us at home, do not proceed from the madness of those, who gave such a revenue, as is utterly unproportionable to the riches of the nation, unsuitable to the modest behaviour expected from our kings, and which in time will render parliaments unnecessary to them.

On the other hand, the poverty and simplicity of the Spartan kings was no less safe and profitable to the people, than truly glorious to them. Agesilaus denied that Artaxerxes was greater than he, unless he were more temperate, or more valiant; and he made good his words so well, that, without any other assistance than what his wisdom and valour did afford, he struck such a terror into that great, rich, powerful and absolute monarch, that he did not think himself safe in Babylon or Ecbatane, till the poor Spartan was, by a captain of as great valour, and greater poverty, obliged to return from Asia to the defence of his own country. This was not peculiar to the severe Laconic discipline. When the Roman kings were expelled, a few carts were prepared to transport their goods: and their lands, which were consecrated to Mars, and now go under the name of Campus Martius, hardly contain ten acres of ground. Nay, the kings of Israel, who led such vast armies into the field (that is, were followed by all the people who were able to bear arms), seem to have possessed little. Ahab, one of the most powerful, was so fond of Naboth's vineyard (which, being the inheritance of his fathers, according to their equal division of lands, could not be above two acres), that he grew sick when it was refused.

But, if an allowance be to be made to every king, it must be either according to an universal rule or standard, or must depend upon the judgment of nations. If the first, they who have it, may do well to produce it; if the other, every nation, proceeding according to the measure of their own discretion, is free from blame.

It may also be worth observation, whether the revenue given to a king be in such manner committed to his care, that he is obliged to employ it for the public service without the power of alienation; or whether it be granted as a propriety, to be spent as he thinks fit. When some of the ancient Jews and Christians scrupled the payment of tribute to the emperors, the reasons alledged to persuade them to a compliance seem to be grounded upon a supposition of the first: for, said they, the defence of the state lies upon them, which cannot be performed without armies and garrisons; these cannot be maintained without pay, nor money raised to pay them without tributes and customs. This carries a face of reason with it, especially in those countries which are perpetually or frequently subject to invasions: but this will not content our author. He speaks of employing the revenue in keeping the king's house, and looks upon it as a propriety to be spent as he thinks convenient; which is no less than to cast it into a pit, of which no man ever knew the bottom. That which

which is given one day, is squandered away the next: the people is always SECT. 7.
oppressed with impositions, to foment the vices of the court: these daily increasing, they grow insatiable, and the miserable nations are compelled to hard labour, in order to satiate those lusts that tend to their own ruin.

It may be considered, that the virtuous * pagans, by the light of nature, discovered the truth of this. Poverty grew odious in Rome, when great men, by desiring riches, put a value upon them, and introduced that pomp and luxury which could not be borne by men of small fortunes †. From thence all furies and mischiefs seemed to break loose: the base, slavish, and so often subdued Asia, by the basest of men revenged the defeats they had received from the bravest; and by infusing into them a delight in pomp and luxury, in a short time rendered the strongest and bravest of nations the weakest and basest. I wish our own experience did not too plainly manifest, that these evils were never more prevalent than in our days, when the luxury, majestic pomp, and absolute power, of a neighbouring king, must be supported by an abundance of riches, torn out of the bowels of his subjects, which renders them, in the best country of the world, and at a time when the crown most flourishes, the poorest and most miserable of all the nations under the sun. We too well know who are most apt to learn from them, and by what means and steps they endeavour to lead us into the like misery. But the bird is safe when the snare is discovered; and if we are not abandoned by God to destruction, we shall never be brought to consent to the settling of that pomp, which is against the practice of all virtuous people, and has brought all the nations that have been taken with it into the ruin that is intended for us.

S E C T. VII.

When the Israelites asked for such a king as the nations about them had, they asked for a tyrant, tho' they did not call him so.

“NOW that Saul was no tyrant,” says our author, “note, that the “people asked a king as all nations had: God answers, and bids “Samuel to hear the voice of the people in all things which they spake, and “appoint them a king. They did not ask a tyrant; and to give them a ty“rant when they asked a king, had not been to hear their voice in all things, “but rather, when they asked an egg, to have given them a scorpion; unless “we will say, that all nations had tyrants.” But before he drew such a conclusion, he should have observed, that God did not give them a scorpion when

* ————Sævior armis

Luxuria incubuit, victumque ulciscitur orbem. Lucan.

† Nullum crimen abest, facinusque libidinis, ex quo

Paupertas Romana perit. Juv. Sat. vi. 292.

CHAP. III. they asked an egg, but told them, that was a scorpion which they called an egg: they would have a king to judge them, to go out before them, and to fight their battles; but God in effect told them, he would overthrow all justice, and turn the power that was given him, to the ruin of them, and their posterity. But since they would have it so, he commanded Samuel to hearken to their voice, and for the punishment of their sin and folly, to give them such a king as they asked, that is, one who would turn to his own profit, and their misery, the power with which he should be entrusted; and this truly denominates a tyrant. Aristotle makes no other distinction between a king and a tyrant, than that the king governs for the good of the people, the tyrant for his own pleasure or profit: and they who asked such a one, asked a tyrant, tho' they called him a king. This is all could be done in their language: for as they who are skilled in the oriental languages assure me, there is no name for a tyrant in any of them, or any other way of expressing the thing, than by circumlocution, and adding proud, insolent, lustful, cruel, violent, or the like epithets, to the word lord, or king. They did in effect ask a tyrant: they would not have such a king as God had ordained, but such a one as the nations had. Not that all nations had tyrants; but those who were round about them, of whom they had knowledge, and which, in their manner of speaking, went under the name of all, were blessed with such masters. This way of expression was used by Lot's daughters, who said, there was not a man in all the earth to come in to them; because there was none in the neighbourhood with whom it was thought fit they should accompany. Now, that the eastern nations were then, and are still, under the government of those which all free people call tyrants, is evident to all men. God therefore, in giving them a tyrant, or rather a government, that would turn into tyranny, gave them what they asked, under another name; and, without any blemish to the mercy promised to their fathers, suffered them to bear the penalty of their wickedness and folly in rejecting him, that he should not reign over them.

But tho' the name of tyrant was unknown to them, yet in Greece, from whence the word comes, it signified no more than one who governed according to his own will, distinguished from kings that governed by law; and was not taken in an ill sense, till those who had been advanced for their justice, wisdom, and valour, or their descendents, were found to depart from the ends of their institution, and to turn that power to the oppression of the people, which had been given for their protection: but by these means it grew odious, and that kind of government came to be thought only tolerable by the basest of men; and those who destroyed it, were in all places esteemed to be the best.

If monarchy had been universally evil, God had not in the xviiith of Deuteronomy given leave to the Israelites to set up a king; and if that kind of king had been asked, he had not been displeased: and they could not have been said to reject God, if they had not asked that which was evil; for nothing that is good is contrary, or inconsistent with a people's obedience to him. The monarchy they asked was displeasing to God, it was therefore evil. But a tyrant is no more than an evil and corrupted monarch: the the king therefore that they demanded was a tyrant: God in granting one SECT. 7. who would prove a tyrant, gave them what they asked; and that they might know what they did, and what he would be, he told them they rejected him, and should cry by reason of the king they desired.

This denotes him to be a tyrant: for as the government of a king ought to be gentle and easy, tending to the good of the people, resembling the tender care of a father to his family; if he who is set up to be a king, and to be like to that father, do lay a heavy yoke upon the people, and use them as slaves, and not as children, he must renounce all resemblance of a father, and be accounted an enemy.

“But,” says our author, “whereas the people’s crying argues some tyrannical oppression, we may remember, that the people’s cries are not always an argument of their living under a tyrant. No man will say Solomon was a tyrant: yet all the congregation complained, that Solomon made their yoke grievous.” It is strange, that when children, nay, when whelps cry, it should be accounted a mark that they are troubled, and that the cry of the whole people should be none: or that the government which is erected for their ease, should not be esteemed tyrannical, if it prove grievous to those it should relieve. But as I know no example of a people that did generally complain without cause, our adversaries must alledge some other than that of Solomon, before I believe it of any. We are to speak reverently of him: he was excellent in wisdom; he built the temple, and God appeared twice to him: but it must be confessed, that during a great part of his life he acted directly contrary to the law given by God to kings, and that his ways were evil and oppressive to the people, if those of God were good. Kings were forbidden to multiply horses, wives, silver, and gold: but he brought together more silver and gold, and provided more horses, wives, and concubines, than any man is known to have had: and tho’ he did not actually return to Egypt; yet he introduced their abominable idolatry, and so far raised his heart above his brethren, that he made them subservient to his pomp and glory. The people might probably be pleased with a great part of this; but when the yoke became grievous, and his foolish son would not render it more easy, they threw it off; and the thing being from the Lord, it was good, unless he be evil.

But as just governments are established for the good of the governed, and the Israelites desired a king, that it might be well with them, not with him, who was not yet known to them; that which exalts one to the prejudice of those that made him, must always be evil, and the people that suffers the prejudice must needs know it better than any other. He that denies this, may think the state of France might have been best known from Bulion the late treasurer, who, finding Lewis the Thirteenth to be troubled at the people’s misery, told him they were too happy, since they were not reduced to eat grass. But if words are to be understood as they are ordinarily used, and we have no other than that of “tyranny” to express a monarchy that is either evil in the institution, or fallen into corruption, we may justly call that “tyranny” which the Scripture calls a “grievous yoke,” and which neither
the

CHAP. III. the old nor the new counsellors of Rehoboam could deny to be so: for tho' the first advised him to promise amendment, and the others to do worse, yet all agreed, that what people said was true.

This yoke is always odious to such as are not by natural stupidity and baseness fitted for it; but those who are so, never complain. An ass will bear a multitude of blows patiently; but the least of them drives a lion into rage. He that said, the rod is made for the back of fools, confessed that oppression will make a wise man mad. And the most unnatural of all oppressions is to use lions like asses, and to lay that yoke upon a generous nation, which only the basest can deserve; and, for want of a better word, we call this tyranny.

Our author is not contented to vindicate Solomon only, but extends his indulgence to Saul. His custom is to patronize all that is detestable; and no better testimony could be given of it. "It is true," says he, "Saul lost his kingdom, but not for being too cruel or tyrannical unto his subjects, but for being too merciful unto his enemies:" but he alledges no other reason, than that the slaughter of the priests is not blamed; not observing that the writers of Scripture, in relating those things that are known to be abominable by the light of nature, frequently say no more of them: and if this be not so, Lot's drunkenness and incest, Reuben's pollution of his father's bed, Abimelech's slaughter of his seventy brothers, and many of the most wicked acts that ever were committed, may pass for laudable and innocent. But if Saul were not to be blamed for killing the priests, why was David blamed for the death of * Uriah? Why were the dogs to lick the blood of Ahab and Jezebel, if they did nothing more than kings might do without blame? Now, if the slaughter of one man was so severely avenged upon the authors, and their families, none but such as Filmer can think that of so many innocent men, with their wives and children, could escape unproved or unpunished. But the whole series of the history of Saul shewing evidently, that his life and reign were full of the most violent cruelty and madness, we are to seek no other reason for the ruin threatened and brought upon him, and his family. And as those princes who are most barbarously savage against their own people, are usually most gentle to the enemies of their country, he could not give a more certain testimony of his hatred to those he ought to have protected, than by preserving those nations, who were their most irreconcilable enemies. This is proved by reason, as well as by experience; for every man knows he cannot bear the hatred of all mankind: such as know they have enemies abroad, endeavour to get friends at home: those who command powerful nations, and are beloved by them, fear not to offend strangers. But if they have rendered their own people enemies to them, they cannot hope for help in a time of distress, nor so much as a place of retreat or refuge, unless from strangers; nor from them, unless they deserve it by favouring them to the prejudice of their own country. As no man can serve two masters, no man can pursue two contrary interests: Moses, Joshua, Gideon, SECT. 7. and Samuel, were severe to the Amorites, Midianites, and Cananites, but mild and gentle to the Hebrews. Saul, who was cruel to the Hebrews, spared the Amalekites, whose preservation was their destruction: and whilst he destroyed those he should have saved, and saved those, that by a general and particular command of God he should have destroyed, he lost his ill-governed kingdom, and left an example to posterity of the end that may be expected from pride, folly, and tyranny.

* "Thou hast killed Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon: now therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house." 2 Sam. xii.

The matter would not be much altered, if I should confess, that, in the time of Saul, all nations were governed by tyrants (tho' it is not true, for Greece did then flourish in liberty, and we have reason to believe, that other nations did so also); for tho' they might not think of a good government at the first, nothing can oblige men to continue under one that is bad, when they discover the evils of it, and know how to mend it. They who trusted men that appeared to have great virtues, with such a power as might easily be turned into tyranny, might justly retract, limit, or abolish it, when they found it to be abused. And tho' no condition had been reserved, the public good, which is the end of all * government, had been sufficient to abrogate all that should tend to the contrary. As the malice of men, and their inventions to do mischief, increase daily, all would soon be brought under the power of the worst, if care were not taken, and opportunities embraced, to find new ways of preventing it. He that should make war at this day as the best commanders did two hundred years past, would be beaten by the meanest soldier. The places then accounted impregnable are now slighted as indefensible; and if the arts of defending were not improved as well as those of assaulting, none would be able to hold out a day. Men were sent into the world rude and ignorant, and if they might not have used their natural faculties to find out that which is good for themselves, all must have been condemned to continue in the ignorance of our first fathers, and to make no use of their understanding to the ends for which it was given.

The bestial barbarity in which many nations, especially of Africa, America, and Asia, do now live, shews what human nature is, if it be not improved by art and discipline; and if the first errors, committed through ignorance, might not be corrected, all would be obliged to continue in them; and for any thing I know, we must return to the religion, manners, and policy, that were found in our country at Cæsar's landing. To affirm this is no less than to destroy all that is commendable in the world, and to render the understanding given to men utterly useless. But if it be lawful for us, by the use of that understanding, to build houses, ships, and forts, better than our ancestors, to make such arms as are most fit for our defence, and to invent printing, with an infinite number of other arts beneficial to mankind, why have we not the same right in matters of government, upon which all others do almost absolutely depend? If men are not obliged to live in caves, and hollow trees, to eat acorns, and to go naked, why should they be for ever obliged

* Salus populi suprema lex.

CHAP. III. obliged to continue under the same form of government that their ancestors happened to set up in the time of their ignorance? Or if they were not so ignorant to set up one that was not good enough for the age in which they lived, why should it not be altered, when tricks are found out to turn that to the prejudice of nations, which was erected for their good? From whence should malice and wickedness gain a privilege of putting new inventions to do mischief every day into practice? and who is it that so far protects them, as to forbid good and innocent men to find new ways also of defending themselves from it? If there be any that do this, they must be such as live in the same principle: who, whilst they pretend to exercise justice, provide only for the indemnity of their own crimes, and the advancement of unjust designs. They would have a right of attacking us, with all the advantages of the arms now in use, and the arts, which by the practice of so many ages have been wonderfully refined, whilst we should be obliged to employ no others in our just defence, than such as were known to our naked ancestors when Cæsar invaded them, or to the Indians, when they fell under the dominion of the Spaniards. This would be a compendious way of placing uncontrouled iniquity in all the kingdoms of the world, and to overthrow all that deserves the name of good by the introduction of such accursed maxims. But if no man dares to acknowledge any such, except those whose acknowledgment is a discredit, we ought not to suffer them to be obliquely obtruded upon us, nor to think, that God has so far abandoned us into the hands of our enemies, as not to leave us the liberty of using the same arms in our defence as they do to offend and injure us.

We shall be told, that prayers and tears were the only arms of the first christians, and that Christ commanded his disciples to pray for those that persecuted them: but besides, that those precepts of the most extreme lenity do ill suit with the violent practices of those who attempt to enslave nations, and who, by alledging them, do plainly shew, either that they do not extend to all christians, or that they themselves are none whilst they act contrary to them; they are to know, that those precepts were merely temporary, and directed to the persons of the apostles, who were armed only with the sword of the spirit; that the primitive Christians used prayers and tears only no longer, than whilst they had no other arms. But knowing, that by lifting themselves under the ensigns of christianity they had not lost the rights belonging to all mankind, when nations came to be converted, they no-way thought themselves obliged to give their enemies a certain opportunity of destroying them, when God had put means into their hands of defending themselves: and proceeded so far in this way, that the christian valour soon became no less famous and remarkable than that of the pagans. They did with the utmost vigour defend both their civil and religious rights against all the powers of earth and hell, who by force and fraud endeavoured to destroy them.

S E C T. VIII.

Under the name of tribute, no more is understood, than what the law of each nation gives to the supreme magistrate for the defraying of public charges; to which the customs of the Romans, or sufferings of the Jews, have no relation.

“IF any desire the directions of the New Testament,” says our author, “he may find our Saviour limiting and distinguishing royal power, by giving to Cæsar those things that are Cæsar’s, and to God the things that are God’s.” But that will be of no advantage to him in this contest. We do not deny to any man, that which is his due; but do not so well know who is Cæsar, nor what it is that can truly be said to be due to him. I grant, that when those words were spoken, the power of the Romans, exercised by Tiberius, was then expressed by the name of Cæsar, which he without any title had assumed. The Jews, amongst many other nations, having been subdued, submitted to it; and, being no-way competent judges of the rights belonging to the senate or people of Rome, were obliged to acknowledge that power which their masters were under. They had no commonwealth of their own, nor any other government amongst themselves, that was not precarious. They thought Christ was to have restored their kingdom, and by them to have reigned over the nations; but he shewed them they were to be subject to the Gentiles, and that within few years their city and temple should be destroyed. Their commonwealth must needs expire, when all that was prefigured by it was accomplished. It was not for them at such a time to presume upon their abrogated privileges, nor the promises made to them, which were then fulfilled. Nay, they had by their sins profaned themselves, and given to the Gentiles a right over them, which none could have had, if they had continued in their obedience to the law of God. This was the foundation of the Cæsars dominion over them, but can have no influence upon us. The first of the Cæsars had not been set up by them: the series of them had not been continued by their consent: they had not interrupted the succession by placing or displacing such as they pleased: they had not brought in strangers or bastards, nor preferred the remotest in blood before the nearest: they had no part in making the laws, by which they were governed, nor had the Cæsars sworn to them: they had no “great charter,” acknowledging their liberties to be innate or inherent in them, confirmed by immemorial custom, and strengthened by thirty acts of their own general assemblies, with the assent of the Romans: the Cæsar who then governed, came not to the power by their consent: the question, “Will ye have this man to reign?” had never been asked; but he being imposed upon them, they were to submit to the laws, by which he governed their masters. This can be nothing to us, whose case is in every respect most unlike to theirs. We have no dictatorial power

CHAP. III. over us; and neither we nor our fathers have rendered or owed obedience to any human laws but our own, nor to any other magistracy, than what we have established. We have a king who reigns by law. His power is from the * "law that makes him king:" and we can know only from thence what he is to command, and what we are obliged to obey. We know the power of the Cæsars was usurped, maintained, and exercised, with the most detestable violence, injustice, and cruelty. But tho' it had been established by the consent of the Romans, from an opinion that it was good for them in that state of affairs, it were nothing to us: and we could be no more obliged to follow their example in that, than to be governed by consuls, tribunes, and decemviri, or to constitute such a government as they set up when they expelled their kings. Their authority was as good at one time as at the other; or if a difference ought to be made, the preference is to be given to what they did when their manners were most pure, the people most free, and when virtue was most flourishing among them. But if we are not obliged to set up such a magistracy as they had, it is ridiculous to think, that such an obedience is due to one who is not in being as they paid to him that was. And if I should confess, that Cæsar, holding the senate and people of Rome under the power of the sword, imposed what tribute he pleased upon the provinces; and that the Jews, who had no part in the government, were obliged to submit to his will; our liberty of paying nothing, except what the parliament appoints, and yielding obedience to no laws, but such as are made to be so by their authority, or by our own immemorial customs, could not be thereby infringed. But we may justly affirm, that the tribute imposed was not, as our author infers, "all their coin," nor a considerable part of it, nor more than what was understood to go for the defraying of the public charges. Christ by asking, whose image and superscription was stamp't upon their money, and thereupon commanding them to give to Cæsar that which was Cæsar's, did not imply, that all was his; but that Cæsar's money being current amongst them, it was a continual and evident testimony, that they acknowledged themselves to be under his jurisdiction, and therefore could not refuse to pay the tribute laid upon them by the same authority, as other nations did.

It may also be observed, that Christ did not so much say this to determine the questions, that might arise, concerning Cæsar's power; for he plainly says, that was not his work; but to put the Pharisees to silence, who tempted him. According to the opinion of the Jews, that the Messias would restore the kingdom of Israel, they thought his first work would be to throw off the Roman yoke; and not believing him to be the man, they would have brought him to avow the thing, that they might destroy him. But as that was not his business, and that his time was not yet come, it was not necessary to give them any other answer, than such as might disappoint their purpose. This shews that, without detracting from the honour due to Austin, Ambrose, or Tertullian, I may justly say, that the decision of such questions as arise concerning our government, must be decided by our laws, and not by their writings. They

* Lex facit ut sit rex. Bracton.

They were excellent men, but living in another time, under a very different SECT. 8. government, and applying themselves to other matters, they had no knowledge at all of those that concern us. They knew what government they were under, and thereupon judged what a broken and dispersed people owed to that which had given law to the best part of the world before they were in being, under which they had been educated, and which, after a most cruel persecution, was become propitious to them. They knew, that the word of the emperor was a law to the senate and people, who were under the power of that man that could get the best army; but perhaps had never heard of such mixed governments as ours, tho' about that time they began to appear in the world. And it might be as reasonably concluded, that there ought to be no rule in the succession or election of princes, because the Roman emperors were set up by the violence of the soldiers, and for the most part, by the slaughter of him who was in possession of the power, as that all other princes must be absolute when they have it, and do what they please, till another more strong, and more happy, may, by the like means, wrest the same power from them.

I am much mistaken if this be not true; but without prejudice to our cause, we may take that which they say, according to their true meaning, in the utmost extent. And to begin with Tertullian: it is good to consider the subject of his discourse, and to whom he wrote. The treatise cited by our author is the apologetic, and tends to persuade the pagans, that civil magistrates might not intermeddle with religion; and that the laws made by them touching those matters, were of no value, as relating to things of which they had no cognisance. * "It is not," says he, "length of time, nor the dignity of the legislators, but equity only, that can commend laws; and when any are found to be unjust, they are deservedly condemned." By which words he denied, that the magistratical power, which the Romans acknowledged in Cæsar, had any thing to do in spiritual things. And little advantage can be taken by Christian princes from what he says concerning the Roman emperors; for he expressly declares, † "That the Cæsars would have believed in Christ, if they had either not been necessary to the secular government, or that Christians might have been Cæsars." This seems to have proceeded from an opinion received by Christians in the first ages, that the use of the civil as well as the military sword was equally accursed: that "Christians were to be ‡ sons of peace, enemies to no man; and that Christ, by commanding Peter to put up his sword, did for ever disarm all Christians." He proceeds to say, || "We cannot fight to defend our goods, having in our bap-

* Leges non annorum numerus, nec conditorum dignitas, sed sola æquitas commendat, atque ideo si iniquæ cognoscuntur merito damnantur. Tertul. Ap.

† Sed & Cæsares super Christo credidissent, si aut Cæsares non essent sæculo necessarii, aut Christiani potuissent esse Cæsares. Ibid.

‡ Filii pacis, nullius hostes; & Christus exarmando Petrum, omnem christianum militem in æternum discinxit. Ibid.

|| Nobis omnis gloriæ & dignitatis ardore frigentibus, &c. Nec alia res est nobis magis aliena quam publica: unam nobis rempublicam mundum agnoscimus.

CHAP. III. "tism renounced the world, and all that is in it; nor to gain honours, accounting nothing more foreign to us than public affairs, and acknowledging no other commonwealth than that of the whole world;" nor to save our lives, because we account it a happiness to be killed. He dissuades the pagans from executing Christians, rather from charity to them in keeping them from the crime of slaughtering the innocent, than that they were unwilling to suffer:
 and gives no other reasons of their prayers for the emperors, than that they were commanded to love their enemies, and to pray for those who persecuted them, except such as he drew from a mistake, that the world was shortly to finish with the dissolution of the empire. All his works, as well those that were written before he fell into montanism, as those published afterwards, are full of the like opinions; and if Filmer acknowledges them to be true, he must confess, that princes are not fathers, but * enemies: and not only they, but all those who render themselves ministers of the powers they execute, in taking upon them the sword that Christ had cursed, do renounce him; and we may consider how to proceed with such as do so. If our author will not acknowledge this, then no man was ever guilty of a more vile prevarication than he, who alledges those words in favour of his cause, which have their only strength in opinions that he thinks false, and in the authority of a man whom in that very thing he condemns; and must do so, or overthrow all that he endeavours to support. But Tertullian's opinions concerning these matters have no relation to our present question. The design of his Apology, and the treatise to Scapula, almost upon the same subject, was to shew, that the civil magistracy, which he comprehends under the name of Cæsar, had nothing to do with matters of religion; and that, as no man could be a Christian who would undertake the work of a magistrate, they who were jealous the public offices might be taken out of their hands, had nothing to fear from Christians who resolved not to meddle with them. Whereas our question is only, whether that magistratical power, which, by law or usurpation, was then in Cæsar, must necessarily in all times, and in all places, be in one man, or may be divided and balanced according to the laws of every country, concerning which he says nothing: or whether we, who do not renounce the use of the civil or military sword, who have a part in the government, and think it our duty to apply ourselves to public cares, should lay them aside, because the antient Christians every hour expecting death, did not trouble themselves with them.

If Ambrose, after he was a bishop, employed the ferocity of a soldier, which he still retained, rather in advancing the power of the clergy, than the good of mankind, by restraining the rage of tyrants, it can be no prejudice to our cause, of which he had no cognisance. He spoke of the violent and des-potical government, to which he had been a minister before his baptism, and seems to have had no knowledge of the Gothic polity, that within a few years grew famous by the overthrow of the Roman tyranny, and delivering the world from the yoke which it could no longer bear. And if Austin might * Qui enim magis inimici Christianorum, quam de quorum majestate convenimur in crimen?

 Tertul. ib.

say, that "the emperor is subject to no laws, because he has a power of making laws," I may justly say, that our kings are subject to laws, because they can make no law, and have no power but what is given by the laws. If this be not the case, I desire to know who made the laws, to which they and their predecessors have sworn; and whether they can, according to their own will, abrogate those antient laws, by which they are made to be what they are, and by which we enjoy what we have; or whether they can make new laws by their own power? If no man but our author have impudence enough to assert any such thing; and if all the kings we ever had, except Richard the Second, did renounce it; we may conclude, that Austin's words have no relation to our dispute; and that it were to no purpose to examine, whether the fathers mention any reservation of power to the laws of the land, or to the people; it being as lawful for all nations, if they think fit, to frame governments different from those that were then in being, as to build bastions, halfmoons, hornworks, ravelins, or counterscarps, or to make use of muskets, cannon, mortars, carabines, or pistols, which were unknown to them.

What Solomon says of the Hebrew kings, does as little concern us. We have already proved their power not to have been absolute, tho' greater than that which the law allows to ours. It might, upon occasion, be a prudent advice to private persons living under such governments as were usual in the eastern countries, "to keep the king's commandments, and not to say, What doest thou? because where the word of a king is, there is power, and all that he pleaseth he will do." But all these words are not his; and those that are, must not be taken in a general sense; for tho' his son was a king, yet in his words there was no power: he could not do what he pleased, nor hinder others from doing what they pleased: he would have added weight to the yoke that lay upon the necks of the Israelites, but he could not; and we do not find him to have been master of much more than his own tongue, to speak as many foolish things as he pleased. In other things, whether he had to deal with his own people, or with strangers, he was weak and impotent; and the wretches who flattered him in his follies could be of no help to him. The like has befallen many others: those who are wise, virtuous, valiant, just, and lovers of their people, have and ought to have power; but such as are lewd, vicious, foolish, and haters of their people, ought to have none, and are often deprived of all. This was well known to Solomon, who says, that "a wise child is better than an old and foolish king, that will not be advised." When Nebuchodonosor set himself in the place of God, his kingdom was taken from him, and he was driven from the society of men to herd with beasts. There was power for a time in the word of Nero: he murdered many excellent men: but he was called to account, and the world abandoned the monster it had too long endured. He found none to defend him, nor any better help, when he desired to die, than the hand of a slave. Besides this, some kings by their institution have little power; some have been deprived of what they had, for abusing, or rendring themselves unworthy of it; and history affords us innumerable examples of both sorts.

But

CHAP. III. But tho' I should confess that there is always power in the word of a king, it would be nothing to us, who dispute concerning right, and have no regard to that power which is void of it. A thief or a pirate may have power; but that avails him not, when, as often befel the Cæsars, he meets with one who has more, and is always unsafe, since, having no effect upon the consciences of men, every one may destroy him that can: and I leave it to kings to consider how much they stand obliged to those, who, placing their rights upon the same foot, expose their persons to the same dangers.

But if kings desire, that in their word there should be power, let them take care, that it be always accompanied with truth and justice. Let them seek the good of their people, and the hands of all good men will be with them. Let them not exalt themselves insolently, and every one will desire to exalt them. Let them acknowledge themselves to be the servants of the public, and all men will be theirs. Let such as are most addicted to them, talk no more of Cæsars, nor the tributes due to them. We have nothing to do with the name of Cæsar. They who at this day live under it, reject the prerogatives antiently usurped by those that had it, and are governed by no other laws than their own. We know no law to which we owe obedience, but that of God, and ourselves. Asiatic slaves usually pay such tributes as are imposed upon them; and whilst braver nations lay under the Roman tyranny, they were forced to submit to the same burdens. But even those tributes were paid for maintaining armies, fleets, and garrisons, without which the poor and abject life they led could not have been preserved. We owe none but what we freely give. None is or can be imposed upon us, unless by ourselves. We measure our grants according to our own will, or the present occasions, for our own safety. Our ancestors were born free, and, as the best provision they could make for us, they left us that liberty intire, with the best laws they could devise to defend it. It is no way impaired by the opinions of the fathers. The words of Solomon do rather confirm it. The happiness of those who enjoy the like, and the shameful misery they lie under, who have suffered themselves to be forced or cheated out of it, may persuade, and the justice of the cause encourage us, to think nothing too dear to be hazarded in the defence of it.

S E C T. IX.

Our own laws confirm to us the enjoyment of our native rights.

IF that which our author calls divinity did reach the things in dispute between us, or that the opinions of the fathers, which he alledges, related to them, he might have spared the pains of examining our laws; for a municipal sanction were of little force to confirm a perpetual and universal law given by God to mankind, and of no value against it, since man cannot abrogate gate what God hath instituted, nor one nation free itself from a law that is SECT. 9.

given to all. But having abused the scriptures, and the writings of the fathers (whose opinions are to be valued only so far as they rightly interpret them) he seems desirous to try, whether he can as well put a false sense upon our law, and has fully compassed his design. According to his custom he takes pieces of passages from good books, and turns them directly against the plain meaning of the authors, expressed in the whole scope and design of their writings. To shew that he intends to spare none, he is not ashamed to cite Bracton, who, of all our antient law-writers, is most opposite to his maxims. He lived, says he, in Henry the Third's time, since parliaments were instituted: as if there had been a time when England had wanted them; or that the establishment of our liberty had been made by the Normans, who, if we will believe our author, came in by force of arms, and oppressed us. But we have already proved the essence of parliaments to be as antient as our nation, and that there was no time in which there were not such councils or assemblies of the people as had the power of the whole, and made or unmade such laws as best pleased themselves. We have indeed a French word from a people that came from France, but the power was always in ourselves; and the Norman kings were obliged to swear they would govern according to the laws that had been made by those assemblies. It imports little, whether Bracton lived before or after they came amongst us. His words are, "Omnes sub eo, & ipse sub nullo, sed tantum sub deo; all are under him, and he under none but God only. If he offend, since no writ can go out against him, their remedy is, by petitioning him to amend his faults; which if he will not do, it is punishment enough for him to expect God as an avenger. Let none presume to look into his deeds, much less to oppose him." Here is a mixture of sense and nonsense, truth and falshood, the words of Bracton, with our author's foolish inferences from them. Bracton spoke of the politic capacity of the king, when no law had forbidden him to divide it from his natural. He gave the name of king to the sovereign power of the nation, as Jacob called that of his descendents the sceptre; which he said should not depart from Judah till Shiloh came, tho' all men know, that his race did not reign the third part of that time over his own tribe, nor full fourscore years over the whole nation. The same manner of speech is used in all parts of the world. Tertullian, under the name of Cæsar, comprehended all magistratical power, and imputed to him the acts, of which in his person he never had any knowledge. The French say, their king is always present, "sur son lit de justice," in all the sovereign courts of the kingdom, which are not easily numbered; and that maxim could have in it neither sense nor truth, if by it they meant a man, who can be but in one place at one time, and is always comprehended within the dimensions of his own skin. These things could not be unknown to Bracton, the like being in use amongst us; and he thought it no offence so far to follow the dictates of reason prohibited by no law, as to make a difference between the invisible and omnipresent King, who never dies, and the person that wears the crown, whom no man, without the guilt of treason, may endeavour to kill, since there is an act of parliament in the case. I will

CHAP. III. not determine whether he spoke properly or no as to England ; but if he did not, all that he said being upon a false supposition, is nothing to our purpose. The same Bracton says, "the king doth no wrong," inasmuch as he doth nothing but by law. * "The power of the king is the power of the law, a power of right not of wrong." Again, "if † the king does injustice, he is not king." In another place he has these words ; || "the king therefore ought to exercise the power of the law, as becomes the vicar and minister of God upon earth, because that power is the power of God alone ; but the power of doing wrong is the power of the devil, and not of God. And the king is his minister, whose work he does : whilst he does justice he is the vicar of the eternal King ; but if he deflect from it to act unjustly, he is the minister of the devil." He also says, that the king is, "singulis major, universis minor ;" and that he who is, "in justitia exequenda omnibus major, in justitia recipienda cuilibet ex plebe fit æqualis." I shall not say Bracton is in the right when he speaks in this manner ; but it is a strange impudence in Filmer to cite him as a patron of the absolute power of kings, who does so extremely depress them. But the grossest of his follies is yet more pardonable than his detestable fraud in falsifying Bracton's words, and leaving out such as are not for his purpose, which shew his meaning to be directly contrary to the sense put upon them. That this may appear, I shall set down the words as they are found in Bracton : "Ipse autem rex non debet esse sub homine, sed sub Deo, & sub lege, quia lex facit regem. Attribuat ergo rex legi quod lex attribuit ei, id est dominationem & potestatem : non est enim rex ubi dominatur voluntas & non lex ; & quod sub lege esse debeat, cum sit Dei vicarius, evidenter apparet." If Bracton therefore be a competent judge, the king is under the law ; and he is not a king, nor God's vicegerent, unless he be so ; and we all know how to proceed with those, who, being under the law, offend against it. For the law is not made in vain. In this case something more is to be done than petitioning ; and it is ridiculous to say, that if "he will not amend, it is punishment enough for him to expect God an avenger ;" for the same may be said of all malefactors. God can sufficiently punish thieves and murderers : but the future judgment, of which perhaps they have no belief, is not sufficient to restrain them from committing more crimes, nor to deter others from following their example. God was always able to punish murderers, but yet by his law he commands man to shed the blood of him who should shed man's blood ; and declares, that the land cannot be purged of the guilt by any other means. He had judgments in store for Jeroboam, Ahab, and those that were like them ; but yet he commanded that, according to that law, their houses should be destroyed from the earth. The dogs licked up the blood of Ahab, where they had licked that of Naboth, and eat Jezebel, who had contrived his murder. SECT. 9.

* Potestas regis est potestas legis, potestas juris, non injuriæ. Bract. de leg. Angl.

† Qui si facit injuriam, non est rex. Ibid.

|| Exercere igitur debet rex potestatem juris, sicut Dei vicarius & minister in terra, quia illa potestas solius Dei est : potestas autem injuriæ diaboli est, non Dei ; & cujus horum opera fecerit rex, ejus minister erit : igitur dum facit justitiam, vicarius est Regis æterni : minister autem diaboli, dum declinet ad injuriam. Ibid. l. 3.

 “But,” says our author, “we must not look into his deeds, much less oppose them.” Must not David look into Saul’s deeds, nor oppose them? Why did he then bring together as many men as he could to oppose, and make foreign alliances against him, even with the Moabites, and the accursed Philistines? Why did Jehu not only destroy Ahab’s house, but kill the king of Judah, and his forty brothers, only for going to visit his children? Our author may perhaps say, because God commanded them. But if God commanded them to do so, he did not command them, and all mankind, not to do so; and if he did not forbid, they have nothing to restrain them from doing the like, unless they have made municipal laws of their own to the contrary, which our author and his followers may produce when they can find them.

His next work is, to go back again, to the tribute paid by Christ to Cæsar, and judiciously to infer, that all nations must pay the same duty to their magistrates, as the Jews did to the Romans, who had subdued them. “Christ did not,” says he, “ask what the law of the land was, nor inquire whether there was a statute against it, nor whether the tribute were given by the consent of the people, but upon sight of the superscription concluded, &c.” It had been strange, if Christ had inquired after their laws, statutes, or consent, when he knew, that their commonwealth, with all the laws by which it had subsisted, was abolished; and that Israel was become a servant to those, who exercised a most violent domination over them; which, being a peculiar punishment for their peculiar sins, can have no influence upon nations, that are not under the same circumstances.

But of all that he says, nothing is more incomprehensible, than what he can mean by lawful kings, to whom all is due that was due to the Roman usurpers. For lawful kings are kings by the law: in being kings by the law, they are such kings as the law makes them; and that law only must tell us what is due to them; or by a universal patriarchal right, to which no man can have a title, as is said before, till he prove himself to be the right heir of Noah. If neither of these are to be regarded, but that right follows possession, there is no such thing as a usurper; he who has the power has the right, as indeed Filmer says; and his wisdom, as well as his integrity, is sufficiently declared by the assertion.

This wicked extravagancy is followed by an attempt of as singular ignorance and stupidity, to shuffle together usurpers and conquerors, as if they were the same; whereas, there have been many usurpers, who were not conquerors, and conquerors, that deserved not the name of usurpers. No wise man ever said, that Agathocles or Dionysius conquered Syracuse; Tarquin, Galba, or Otho, Rome; Cromwel, England; or that the magi, who seized the government of Persia, after the death of Cambyfes, conquered that country. When Moses and Joshua had overthrown the kingdoms of the Amorites, Moabites, and Cananites; or when David subdued the Ammonites, Edomites, and others; none, as I suppose, but such divines as Filmer, will say they usurped a dominion over them. There is such a thing amongst men as just war, or else true

CHAP. III. valour would not be a virtue, but a crime; and instead of glory, the utmost infamy would always be the companion of victory. There are, says * Gro-tius, laws of war, as well as of peace. He who for a just cause, and by just means, carries on a just war, has as clear a right to what is acquired as can be enjoyed by man; but all usurpation is detestable and abominable.

S E C T. X.

The words of St. Paul injoining obedience to higher powers, favour all sorts of governments, no less than monarchy.

OUR author's next quarrel is with St. Paul, "who did not," as he says, "in injoining subjection to the higher powers, signify the laws of the land, or mean the highest powers, as well aristocratical and democratical as regal, but a monarch that carries the sword, &c." But what if there be no monarch in the place? or what if he do not carry the sword? Had the apostle spoken in vain, if the liberty of the Romans had not been overthrown by the fraud and violence of Cæsar? Was no obedience to be exacted whilst that people enjoyed the benefit of their own laws, and virtue flourished under the moderate government of a legal and just magistracy, established for the common good, by the common consent of all? Had God no minister amongst them, till law and justice was overthrown, the best part of the people destroyed by the fury of a corrupt mercenary soldiery, and the world subdued under the tyranny of the worst monsters, that it had ever produced? Are these the ways of establishing God's vicegerents? And will he patronize no governors or governments, but such as these? Does God uphold evil, and that only? If the world has been hitherto mistaken, in giving the name of evil to that which is good, and calling that good which is evil; I desire to know, what can be called good amongst men, if the government of the Romans, till they entered Greece and Asia, and were corrupted by the luxury of both, do not deserve that name? Or what is to be esteemed evil, if the establishment and exercise of the Cæsars power were not so? But says he, "Wilt thou not be afraid of the power?" And was there no power in the governments, that had no monarchs? Were the Carthaginians, Romans, Grecians, Gauls, Germans, and Spaniards, without power? Was there no sword in that nation, and their magistrates, who overthrew the kingdoms of Armenia, Egypt, Numidia, Macedon, and many others, whom none of the monarchs were able to resist? Are the Venetians, Switzers, Grisons, and Hollanders, now left in the same weakness, and no obedience at all due to their magistrates? If this be so, how comes it to pass, that justice is so well administered amongst them? Who is it that defends the Hollanders in such a manner, that the greatest monarchs, with all their swords, have had no great reason to boast of any advantages gained against them? At least till we (whom they could not resist, when we had no monarch, though * Belli æque ac pacis jura. De jur. bel. & pac.

though we have been disgracefully beaten by them since we had one) by SECT. 10.
 making leagues against them, and sowing divisions amongst them, instigated and assisted the greatest power now in the world to their destruction and our own. But our author is so accustomed to fraud, that he never cites a passage of scripture, which he does not abuse or vitiate; and that he may do the same in this place, he leaves out the following words, "For there is no power but of God," that he might intitle one sort only to his protection. If therefore the people and popular magistrates of Athens;
 the two kings, ephori, and senate of Sparta; the sanhedrins amongst the Hebrews; the consuls, tribunes, prætors, and senate of Rome; the magistrates of Holland, Switzerland, and Venice; have or had power, we may conclude, that they also were ordained by God; and that, according to the precept of the apostle, the same obedience for the same reason, due to them as to any monarch.

The apostle, farther explaining himself, and shewing, who may be accounted a magistrate, and what the duty of such a one is, informs us, when we should fear, and on what account. "Rulers," says he, "are not a terror to good works, but to the evil: wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same; for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doth evil." He therefore is only the minister of God, who is not a terror to good works, but to evil; who executes wrath upon those that do evil, and is a praise to those that do well. And he who doth well, ought not to be afraid of the power; for he shall receive praise. Now if our author were alive, tho' he was a man of a hard forehead, I would ask him, whether in his conscience he believed, that Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, and the rabble of succeeding monsters, were a praise to those who did well, and a terror to those who did ill; and not the contrary, a praise to the worst, and a terror to the best men of the world? Or for what reason * Tacitus could say, that virtue brought men who lived under them to certain destruction, and recite so many examples of the brave and good, who were murdered by them for being so, unless they had endeavoured to extinguish all that was good, and to † tear up virtue by the roots? Why did he call Domitian an ‡ enemy to virtue, if he was a terror only to those that did evil? If the world has hitherto been misled in these things, and given the name of virtue to vice, and of vice to virtue, then Germanicus, Valerius Asiaticus, Corbulo, Helvidius Priscus, Thraseas, Soranus, and others, that resembled them, who fell under the rage of those beasts, nay, Paul himself, and his disciples, were evil doers; and Macro, Narcissus, Pallas, Vinnius, Laco, and Tigellinus, were virtuous and good men. If this be so, we are beholden to Filmer, for admonishing mankind of the error in which they had so long continued. If not, those who persecuted and murdered them for their virtues, were not a terror to such as did evil, and a praise to those who did well. The worst men had no need to fear them; but the best had, because

* Ob virtutes certissimum exitium. Hist. l. i. c. 2.

† Ipsam excindere virtutem. Ann. l. xvi. c. 21.

‡ Virtutibus infestum.

CHAP. III. because they were the best. All princes, therefore, that have power, are not to be esteemed equally the ministers of God. They that are so, must receive their dignity from a title, that is not common to all, even from a just employment of their power to the encouragement of virtue, and to the discouragement of vice. He that pretends to the veneration and obedience due to the ministers of God, must by his actions manifest, that he is so. And tho' I am unwilling to advance a proposition, that may sound harshly to tender ears, I am inclined to believe, that the same rule, which obliges us to yield obedience to the good magistrate, who is the minister of God, and assures us, that in obeying him we obey God, does equally oblige us not to obey those, who make themselves the ministers of the devil, lest in obeying them we obey the devil, whose works they do.

That none, but such as are wilfully ignorant, may mistake Paul's meaning, Peter, who was directed by the same spirit, says distinctly, "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake." If therefore there be several ordinances of men tending to the same end, that is, the obtaining of justice, by being a terror to the evil, and a praise to the good, the like obedience is for conscience sake enjoined to all, and upon the same condition. But, as no man dares to say, that Athens and Persia, Carthage and Egypt, Switzerland and France, Venice and Turkey, were and are under the same government; the same obedience is due to the magistrate in every one of those places, and all others on the same account, whilst they continue to be the ministers of God.

If our author say, that Peter cannot comprehend kings under the name of human ordinances, since Paul says, they are the ordinance of God, I may as well say, that Paul cannot call that the ordinance of God, which Peter calls the ordinance of man. But as it was said of Moses and Samuel, that they who spoke by the same spirit could not contradict each other, Peter and Paul, being full of wisdom and sanctity, and inspired by the same spirit, must needs say the same thing; and Grotius shews, that they perfectly agree, though the one calls kings, rulers, and governors, the ordinance of man, and the other the ordinance of God; inasmuch as God having from the beginning ordained, that men should not live like wolves in woods, every man by himself, but together in civil societies, left to every one a liberty of joining with that society which best pleased him, and to every society to create such magistrates, and frame such laws, as should seem most conducing to their own good, according to the measure of light and reason they might have. And every magistracy so instituted might rightly be called the ordinance of man, who was the instituter, and the ordinance of God, according to which it was instituted; "* because," says he, "God approved and ratified the salutary constitutions of government made by men."

But says our author, Peter expounds his own words of the human ordinance to be the king, who is the "lex loquens;" but he says no such thing, and I do not find, that any such thought ever entered into the apostle's mind. The words are often found in the works of Plato and Aristotle, but applied only to such a man as is a king by nature, who is endowed with all all the virtues that tend to the good of human societies in a greater measure SECT. 10. than any or all those that compose them; which character, I think, will be ill applied to all kings. And that this may appear to be true, I desire to know whether it would well have agreed with Nero, Caligula, Domitian, or others like to them; and if not with them, then not with all, but only with those who are endowed with such virtues. But if the king be made by man, he must be such as man makes him to be; and if the power of a law had been given by any human sanction to the word of a foolish, mad, or wicked man (which I hardly believe), it would be destroyed by its own iniquity and turpitude, and the people left under the obligation of rendering obedience to those, who so use the sword, that the nations under them may live soberly, peaceably, and honestly.

* Quia salubrem hominum constitutionem Deus probavit & sanxit. De jur. bel. & pac.

This obliges me a little to examine what is meant by the sword. The pope says there are two swords, the one temporal, the other spiritual; and that both of them were given to Peter, and to his successors. Others more rightly understand the two swords to be that of war, and that of justice, which, according to several constitutions of governments, have been committed to several hands, under several conditions and limitations. The sword of justice comprehends the legislative and the executive power: the one is exercised in making laws, the other in judging controversies according to such as are made. The military sword is used by those magistrates who have it, in making war, or peace, with whom they think fit, and sometimes by others who have it not, in pursuing such wars as are resolved upon by another power. The Jewish doctors generally agree, that the kings of Judah could make no law, because there was a curse denounced against those who should add to, or detract from, that which God has given by the hand of Moses; that they might sit in judgment with the high-priest and sanhedrin; but could not judge by themselves, unless the sanhedrin did plainly fail of performing their duty. Upon this account Maimonides excuses David for commanding Solomon not to suffer the grey hairs of Joab to go down to the grave in peace, and Solomon for appointing him to be killed at the foot of the altar: for he having killed Abner and Amasa, and by those actions shed the blood of war in time of peace, the sanhedrin should have punished him; but, being protected by favour or power, and even David himself fearing him, Solomon was put in mind of his duty, which he performed, tho' Joab laid hold upon the horns of the altar, which, by the express words of the law, gave no protection to willful murderers.

The use of the military sword amongst them was also moderated. Their kings might make war upon the seven accursed nations that they were commanded to destroy, and so might any other man; for no peace was to be made with them: but not against any other nation, without the assent of the sanhedrin. And when Amaziah, contrary to that law, had foolishly made war upon Joash king of Israel, and thereby brought a great slaughter upon Judah, the princes, that is, the sanhedrin, combined against him, pursued him to Lachish, and killed him there.

CHAP. III. The legislative power of Sparta was evidently in the people. The laws that go under the name of Lycurgus, were proposed by him to the general assembly of the people, and from them received their authority: but the discipline they contained was of such efficacy for framing the minds of men to virtue, and by banishing silver and gold they so far banished all manner of crimes, that from the institution of those laws to the times of their corruption, which was more than eight hundred years, we hardly find, that three men were put to death, of whom two were kings; so that it seems difficult to determine where the power of judging did reside, tho' it is most probable, considering the nature of their government, that it was in the senate, and, in cases extraordinary, in the ephori, with a right of appealing to the people. Their kings therefore could have little to do with the sword of justice, neither the legislative nor the judicial power being any ways in them.

Plut. vit. Ly-cur.

The military sword was not much more in their power, unless the excellency of their virtues gave them the credit of persuading, when the law denied the right of commanding. They were obliged to make war against those, and those only, who were declared enemies by the senate and ephori, and in the manner, place, and time, they directed: so that Agesilaus, tho' carrying on a glorious war in Persia, no sooner received the parchment-roll, wherein he was commanded by the ephori to come home for the defence of his own country, than he immediately returned, and is on that account called by no less a man than Xenophon, a good and faithful king, rendering obedience to the laws of his country.

De reg. Age-fil.

By this it appears, that there are kings who may be feared by those that do ill, and not by such as do well; for, having no more power than what the law gives, and being obliged to execute it as the law directs, they cannot depart from the precept of the apostle. My own actions therefore, or the sense of my own guilt arising from them, is to be the measure of my fear of that magistrate who is the minister of God, and not his power.

The like may be said of almost all the nations of the world, that have had any thing of civil order amongst them. The supreme magistrate, under what name soever he was known, whether king, emperor, asymnetes, suffetes, consul, dictator, or archon, has usually a part assigned to him in the administration of justice, and making war; but that he may know it to be assigned, and not inherent, and so assigned as to be employed for the public good, not to his own profit or pleasure, it is circumscribed by such rules as he cannot safely transgress. This is above all seen in the German nations, from whom we draw our original and government; and is so well described by Tacitus in his treatise of their customs and manners, that I shall content myself to refer to it, and to what I have cited from him in the former part of this work. The Saxons, coming into our country, retained to themselves the same rights. They had no kings but such as were set up by themselves, and they abrogated their power when they pleased. * Offa acknowledged, " that he was chosen for the defence of their liberty, not from his own

De morib.
Germ.

" merit

* Ad libertatis vestrae tuitionem non meis meritis, sed sola liberalitate vestra.

“merit, but by their favour;” and in the “conventus pananglicus,” at SECT. 10. which all the chief men, as well secular as ecclesiastical, were present, it was decreed by the king, archbishops, bishops, abbots, dukes, and senators, that the kings should be chosen by the priests, and by the elders of the people. In pursuance of which, Egbert, who had no right to the succession, was made king. Ethelwerd was chosen in the same manner (a) by the consent of all. Ethelwolf a monk, for want of a better, was advanced to the same honour. His son Alfred, tho’ crowned by the pope, and marrying without the consent of the nobility and kingdom, (b) against their customs and statutes, acknowledged, that he had received the crown from the bounty of the princes, elders, and people; and in his will declared, that he left the people as he had found them, free as the inward thoughts of man. His son Edward (c) was elected to be his successor. Ethelstan, tho’ a bastard, and without all title, was elected by the consent of the nobility and people. Eadred, by the same authority, was elected and preferred before the sons of Edmund his predecessor. Edwin, tho’ rightly chosen, was deposed for his ill life, and Edgar (d) elected king, by “the will of God, and consent of the people.” But he also was deprived of the crown for the rape of a nun, and after seven years restored by the whole people, “coram omni multitidine populi Anglorum.” Ethelred, who is said to have been (e) cruel in the beginning, wretched in the course, and infamous in the end of his reign, was deposed by the same power that had advanced him. Canutus made a (f) contract with the princes, and the whole people, and thereupon was, by general consent, crowned king, over all England. After him Harold was chosen in the usual manner. He being dead, a message was sent to Hardi-Canute, with an offer of the crown, which he accepted, and accordingly was received. Edward the Confessor was (g) elected king with the consent of the clergy and people at London; and Harold excused himself for not performing his oath to William the Norman, because he said he had made it unduly and presumptuously, (h) without consulting the nobility and people, and without their authority. William was received with great joy by the clergy and people, and saluted king by all, swearing to observe the antient good and approved laws of England: and tho’ he did but ill perform his oath, yet before his death he seemed to repent of the ways he had taken, and only wishing his son might be king of England, he confessed in his last will, made at Caen in Normandy, (i) that he neither found nor left the kingdom as an inheritance. If he possessed no right except what was conferred upon him, no more was conferred than had been enjoyed by the antient

(a) Omnium consensu.

(b) Contra morem & statuta.

(c) Successor monarchiæ electus.

(d) Et eligerunt, Deo dictante, Edgarum in Regem, annuente populo.

(e) Sævus in principio, miser in medio, turpis in exitu.

(f) Canutus foedus cum principibus & omni populo, & illi cum ipso percusserunt.

(g) Annuente clero & populo Londini, in regem eligitur.

(h) Absque generali senatus & populi conventu & edicto. Matth. Paris. Gul. Gemit &c.

(i) Neminem Anglici regni constituo hæredem: non enim tantum decus hæreditario jure possedi. Ibid.

CHAP. III. kings, according to the approved laws, which he swore to observe. Those laws gave no power to any, till he was elected; and that which they did then give was so limited, that the nobility and people reserved to themselves the disposition of the greatest affairs, even to the deposition and expulsion of such as should not well perform the duty of their oaths and office. And I leave it to our author to prove, how they can be said to have had the sword, and the power, so as to be feared, otherwise than, as the apostle says, by those that do evil; which we acknowledge to be not only in the king, but in the lowest officer of justice in the world.

If it be pretended, that our later kings are more to be feared than William the Norman, or his predecessors, it must not be, as has been proved, either from the general right of kings, or from the doctrine of the apostle, but from something else, that is peculiar and subsequent, which I leave our author's disciples to prove, and an answer may be found in due time. But to shew, that our ancestors did not mistake the words of the apostle, it is good to consider when, to whom, and upon what occasion, he spoke. The christian religion was then in its infancy: his discourses were addressed to the professors of it, who, tho' they soon grew to be considerable in number, were, for the most part, of the meanest sort of people, servants, or inhabitants of the cities, rather than citizens and freemen; joined in no civil body or society, nor such as had or could have any part in the government. The occasion was, to suppress the dangerous mistake of many converted Jews, and others, who, knowing themselves to be freed from the power of sin and the devil, presumed they were also freed from the obligation of human laws. And if this error had not been cropped in the bud, it would have given occasion to their enemies (who desired nothing more) to destroy them all; and who, knowing that such notions were stirring among them, would have been glad, that they who were not easily to be discovered, had by that means discovered themselves.

This induced a necessity of diverting a poor, mean, scattered people from such thoughts concerning the state; to convince them of the error into which they were fallen, that Christians did not owe the same obedience to civil laws and magistrates as other men, and to keep them from drawing destruction upon themselves by such ways, as not being warranted by God, had no promise of his protection. St. Paul's work was to preserve the professors of christianity, as appears by his own words; "I exhort, that first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men: for kings, and for all that are in authority, that we may live a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty. Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, to be ready for every good work." St. Peter agrees with him fully in describing the magistrate, and his duty; shewing the reasons why obedience should be paid to him, and teaching christians to be humble, and contented with their condition, as free, yet not using their liberty for a cover to malice; and not only to fear God, and honour the king (of which conjunction of words such as Filmer are very proud), but to honour all men, as is said in the same verse. This was, in

I Tim. ii.

Tit. iii.

in a peculiar manner, the work of that time, in which those who were to SECT. 10.
 preach and propagate the gospel, were not to be diverted from that duty, by entangling themselves in the care of state-affairs: but it does in some sense agree with all times; for it can never be the duty of a good man to oppose such a magistrate, as is the minister of God, in the exercise of his office, nor to deny to any man that which is his due.

But as the Christian law exempts no man from the duty he owes to his father, master, or the magistrate, it does not make him more a slave than he was before, nor deprive him of any natural or civil right; and if we are obliged to pay tribute, honour, or any other thing, where it is not due, it must be by some precept very different from that which commands us to give to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's. If he define the magistrate to be the minister of God doing justice, and from thence draw the reasons he gives for rendering obedience to him, we are to inquire, whose minister he is who overthrows it, and look for some other reason for rendering obedience to him, than the words of the apostles. If David, who was willing to lay down his life for the people, who "hated iniquity," and would not "suffer a lyer to come into his presence," was the minister of God, I desire to know, whose minister Caligula was, who set up himself to be worshipped for a God, and would at once have destroyed all the people, that he ought to have protected? Whose minister was Nero, who, besides the abominable impurities of his life, and hatred to all virtue, as contrary to his person and government, set fire to the great city? If it be true, that "contrariorum contraria est ratio," these questions are easily decided; and if the reasons of things are eternal, the same distinction, grounded upon truth, will be good for ever. Every magistrate, and every man by his works, will for ever declare whose minister he is, in what spirit he lives, and consequently what obedience is due to him according to the precept of the apostle. If any man ask, what I mean by justice, I answer, That the law of the land, as far as it is "sanctio recta, jubens honesta, prohibens contraria," declares what it is. But there Cicero.
 have been and are laws, that are neither just nor commendable. There was a law in Rome, that no god should be worshipped without the consent of the senate: upon which, Tertullian says scoffingly, "\ That God shall not be God, unless he please man*;" and, by virtue of this law, the first Christians were exposed to all manner of cruelties; and some of the emperors (in other respects excellent men) most foully polluted themselves, and their government, with innocent blood. Antoninus Pius was taken in this snare; and Tertullian bitterly derides Trajan, for glorying in his clemency, when he had commanded Pliny, who was proconsul in Asia, not to make any search for Christians, but only to punish them according to law, when they should be brought before him. No municipal law can be more firmly established by human authority, than that of the inquisition in Spain, and other places; and those accursed tribunals, which have shed more Christian blood than all the pagans, that ever were in the world, is commonly called "the holy office." If a gentleman in Poland kill a peasant, he is by a law now in use free from punish-

Q q

* Nisi homini Deus placuerit, Deus non erit.

CHAP. III. punishment, if he lay a ducat upon the dead body. Evenus the Third, king of Scotland, caused a law to pass, by which the wives and daughters of noblemen were exposed to his lust, and those of the commons to the lust of the nobility. These, and an infinite number of others like to them, were not right sanctions, but such as have produced unspeakable mischiefs and calamities. They were not therefore laws: the name of justice is abusively attributed to them: those that govern by them cannot be the ministers of God: and the apostle, commanding our obedience to the minister of God for our good, commands us not to be obedient to the minister of the devil to our hurt; for we cannot serve two masters.

S E C T. XI.

That which is not just, is not law; and that which is not law, ought not to be obeyed.

OUR author, having for a long time pretended conscience, now pulls off his mask, and plainly tells us, that it is not on account of conscience, but for fear of punishment, or hopes of reward, that laws are to be obeyed. "That familiar distinction of the schoolmen," says he, "whereby they subject kings to the directive, but not to the coercive power of the law, is a confession, that kings are not bound by the positive laws of any nation, since the compulsory power of laws is that which properly makes laws to be laws." Not troubling myself with this distinction of the schoolmen, nor acknowledging any truth to be in it, or that they are competent judges of such matters, I say, that if it be true, our author's conclusion is altogether false; for the directive power of the law, which is certain, and grounded upon the inherent good and rectitude that is in it, is that alone which has a power over the conscience, whereas the coercive is merely contingent; and the most just powers, commanding the most just things, have so often fallen under the violence of the most unjust men, commanding the most execrable villanies, that if they were therefore to be obeyed, the consciences of men must be regulated by the success of a battle or conspiracy, than which nothing can be affirmed more impious and absurd. By this rule, David was not to be obeyed, when by the wickedness of his son he was driven from Jerusalem, and deprived of all coercive power; and the conscientious obedience that had been due to him, was transferred to Absalom, who sought his life. And in St. Paul's time it was not from him, who was guided only by the Spirit of God, and had no manner of coercive power, that Christians were to learn their duty, but from Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, who had that power well established by the mercenary legions. If this were so, the governments of the world might be justly called "magna latrocinia;" and men, laying aside all consideration of reason or justice, ought only to follow those, who can inflict the greatest punishments, or give the greatest rewards.

rewards. But since the reception of such opinions would be the extirpation SECT. II.
of all that can be called good, we must look for another rule of our obedience; and shall find that to be the law, which being, as I said before, “sanctio recta,” must be founded upon that eternal principle of reason and truth, from whence the rule of justice, which is sacred and pure, ought to be deduced, and not from the depraved will of man, which fluctuating according to the different interests, humours, and passions, that at several times reign in several nations, one day abrogates what had been enacted the other. The sanction therefore, that deserves the name of a law, “which derives not Tertul.
“its excellency from antiquity, or from the dignity of the legislators, but from “an intrinsic equity and justice,” ought to be made, in pursuance of that universal reason, to which all nations, at all times, owe an equal veneration and obedience. By this we may know, whether he who has the power does justice or not: whether he be the minister of God to our good, a protector of good, and a terror to ill men; or the minister of the devil to our hurt, by encouraging all manner of evil, and endeavouring, by vice and corruption, to make the people worse, that they may be miserable, and miserable, that they may be worse. I dare not say, I shall never fear such a man, if he be armed with power: but I am sure I shall never esteem him to be the minister of God, and shall think I do ill if I fear him. If he has therefore a coercive power over me, it is through my weakness; “for * he that will “suffer himself to be compelled, knows not how to die.” If therefore he who does not follow the directive power of the law, be not the minister of God, he is not a king, at least not such a king as the apostle commands us to obey: and if that sanction, which is not just, be not a law, and can have no obligation upon us, by what power soever it be established, it may well fall out, that the magistrate, who will not follow the directive power of the law, may fall under the coercive, and then the fear is turned upon him, with this aggravation, that it is not only actual, but just. This was the case of Nero; the coercive power was no longer in him, but against him. He that was forced to fly, and to hide himself, that was abandoned by all men, and condemned to die “† according to antient custom,” did, as I suppose, fear, and was no-way to be feared. The like may be said of Amaziah king of Judah, when he fled to Lachish; of Nabuchodonosor, when he was driven from the society of men; and of many emperors and kings of the greatest nations in the world, who have been so utterly deprived of all power, that they have been imprisoned, deposed, confined to monasteries, killed, drawn thro’ the streets, cut in pieces, thrown into rivers, and indeed suffered all that could be suffered by the vilest slaves.

If any man say these things ought not to have been done, an answer may be given in a proper place; though it were enough to say, that the justice of the world is not to be overthrown by a mere assertion without proof; but that is nothing to the present question: for if it was ill done to drive Nero to despair, or to throw Vitellius into the common sewer, it was not because * Qui cogi potest, nescit mori.

† More majorum. Sueton. vit. Ner. c. xlix.

CHAP. III. they were the ministers of God; for their lives were no-way conformable to the character which the apostle gives to those who deserve that sacred name. If those only are to be feared who have the power, there was a time when they were not to be feared, for they had none; and if those princes are not obliged by the law, who are not under the coercive power, it gave no exemption to those, for they fell under it: and as we know not what will befall others who walk in their steps, till they are dead, we cannot till then know whether they are free from it or not.

S E C T. XII.

The right and power of a magistrate depends upon his institution, not upon his name.

IT is usual with impostors to obtrude their deceits upon men, by putting false names upon things, by which they may perplex mens minds, and from thence deduce false conclusions. But the points above-mentioned being settled, it imports little whether the governors, to whom Peter enjoins obedience, were only kings, and such as are employed by them, or all such magistrates as are the ministers of God; for he informs us of their works, that we may know them, and accordingly yield obedience to them. This is that therefore which distinguishes the magistrate to whom obedience is due, from him to whom none is due, and not the name that he either assumes, or others put upon him. But if there be any virtue in the word king, and that the admirable prerogatives, of which our author dreams, were annexed to that name, they could not be applied to the Roman emperors, nor their substituted officers, for they had it not. It is true, Mark Antony, in a drunken fit, at the celebration of the impure Lupercalia, did offer a diadem to Julius Cæsar, which some flatterers pressed him to accept (as our great lawyers did Cromwell) but he durst not think of putting it upon his head. Caligula's affectation of that title, and the ensigns of royalty he wore, were taken for the most evident marks of his madness: and tho' the greatest and bravest of their men had fallen by the wars or proscriptions; tho' the best part of the senate had perished in Theffaly; tho' the great city was exhausted, and Italy brought to desolation, yet they were not reduced so low as to endure a king. Piso was sufficiently addicted to Tiberius, yet he could not suffer, that Germanicus should be treated as the son of a king; "principis Romani, non Parthorum regis filio has epulas dari." And whoever understands the Latin tongue, and the history of those times, will easily perceive, that the word "princeps" signified no more than a principal or eminent man, as has been already proved: and the words of Piso could have no other meaning, than that the son of a Roman ought not to be distinguished from others, as the sons of the Parthian kings were. This is verified by his letter to Tiberius, under the name of friend, and the answer of Tiberius promising

Tacit. Ann.
ii. c. 57.

missing to him * “whatsoever one friend could do for another.” Here was SECT. 12.
 no mention of majesty, or sovereign Lord, nor the base subscriptions of servant, subject, or creature. And I fear, that as the last of those words was introduced amongst us by our bishops, the rest of them had been also invented by such Christians as were too much addicted to the Asiatic slavery. However, the name of king was never solemnly assumed by, nor conferred upon, those emperors; and could have conferred no right, if it had. They exercised as they pleased, or as they durst, the power that had been gained by violence or fraud. The exorbitances they committed, could not have been justified by a title, any more than those of a pirate, who should take the same. It was no otherwise given to them than by way of assimilation, when they were guilty of the greatest crimes: and Tacitus, describing the detestable lust of Tiberius, says, “Quibus adeo indomitis exarserat, ut more regio puerum ingenuam stupris pollueret; nec formam tantum, & decora corporis,” Annal. l. vi. c. 1.
 “sed in his modestam pueritiam, in aliis majorum imagines, incitamentum cupiditatis habebat.” He also informs us, that Nero took his time to put Barea Soranus to death, who was one of the most virtuous men of that age, when Tiridates king of Armenia was at Rome; † “that he might shew the imperial grandeur by the slaughter of the most illustrious men, which he accounted a royal action.” I leave it to the judgment of all wise men, whether it be probable, that the apostles should distinguish such as these from other magistrates; and dignify those only with the title of God’s ministers, who distinguished themselves by such ways; or that the succeeding emperors should be ennobled with the same prerogative, who had no other title to the name, than by resembling those that had it in such things as these. If this be too absurd and abominable to enter into the heart of a man, it must be concluded, that their intention was only to divert the poor people to whom they preached, from involving themselves in the care of civil matters, to which they had no call. And the counsel would have been good (as things stood with them) if they had been under the power of a pirate, or any other villain, substituted by him.

But tho’ the apostles had looked upon the officers set over the provinces belonging to the Roman empire, as sent by kings, I desire to know, whether it can be imagined, that they could think the subordinate governors to be sent by kings, in the countries that had no kings; or that obedience became due to the magistrates in Greece, Italy, or other provinces under the jurisdiction of Rome, only after they had emperors, and that none was due to them before? The Germans had then no king: the brave Arminius had been lately killed for aiming at a crown. When he had blemished all his virtues by that attempt, they forgot his former services. They never considered how many Roman legions he had cut in pieces, nor how many thousands of their allies he had destroyed. His valour was a crime deserving death, when he sought to make a prey of his country, which he had so bravely defended, and to en-

* Quod amicus amico præstare potest. Tacit.

† Ut magnitudinem imperatoriam cæde insignium virorum quasi regio facinore ostentaret. Ann. l. xvi. c. 23.

CHAP. III. slave those who with him had fought for the public liberty. But if the apostles were to be understood to give the name of God's ministers only to kings, and those who are employed by them, and that obedience is due to no other, a domestic tyrant had been their greatest benefactor. He had set up the only government that is authorised by God, and to which a conscientious obedience is due. Agathocles, Dionysius, Phalarus, Pheræis, Pisistratus, Nabis, Machanidas, and an infinite number of the most detestable villains that the world has ever produced, did confer the same benefits upon the countries they enslaved. But if this be equally false, sottish, absurd, and execrable, all those epithets belong to our author, and his doctrine, for attempting to depress all modest and regular magistracies, and endeavouring to corrupt the scripture to patronize the greatest of crimes. No man therefore, who does not delight in error, can think, that the apostle designed precisely to determine such questions as might arise concerning any one man's right, or, in the least degree, to prefer any one form of government before another. In acknowledging the magistrate to be man's ordinance, he declares, that man, who makes him to be, may make him to be what he pleaseth; and tho' there is found more prudence and virtue in one nation than in another, that magistracy, which is established in any one, ought to be obeyed, till they who made the establishment think fit to alter it. All therefore, whilst they continue, are to be looked upon with the same respect. Every nation, acting freely, has an equal right to frame their own government, and to employ such officers as they please. The authority, right, and power, of these must be regulated by the judgment, right, and power, of those who appoint them, without any relation at all to the name that is given; for that is no-way essential to the thing. The same name is frequently given to those, who differ exceedingly in right and power; and the same right and power is as often annexed to magistracies, that differ in name. The same power which had been in the Roman kings, was given to the consuls; and that which had been legally in the dictators, for a time not exceeding six months, was afterwards usurped by the Cæsars, and made perpetual. The supreme power (which some pretend belongs to all kings) has been and is enjoyed in the fullest extent by such as never had the name; and no magistracy was ever more restrained than those that had the name of kings in Sparta, Arragon, England, Poland, and other places. They therefore that did thus institute, regulate, and restrain, create magistracies, and give them names and powers, as seemed best to them, could not but have in themselves the coercive as well as the directive over them: for the regulation and restriction is coercion; but most of all the institution, by which they could make them to be or not to be. As to the exterior force, it is sometimes on the side of the magistrate, and sometimes on that of the people; and as magistrates, under several names, have the same work incumbent upon them, and the same power to perform it, the same duty is to be exacted from them, and rendered to them: which being distinctly proportioned by the laws of every country, I may conclude, that all magistratical power, being the ordinance of man, in pursuance of the ordinance of God, receives its being and measure from the legislative power of every nation. And whether ther the power be placed simply in one, a few, or many men ; or in one body composed of the three simple species ; whether the single person be called SECT. 13.

king, duke, marquis, emperor, sultan, mogul, or grand signor ; or the number go under the name of senate, council, pregadi, diet, assembly of estates, and the like, it is the same thing. The same obedience is equally due to all, whilst, according to the precept of the apostle, they do the work of God for our good : and if they depart from it, no one of them has a better title than the other to our obedience.

S E C T. XIII.

Laws were made to direct and instruct magistrates, and, if they will not be directed, to restrain them.

I Know not who they are, that our author introduces to say, that “ the first “ invention of laws was, to bridle or moderate the over-great power of “ kings ;” and unless they give some better proof of their judgment in other things, shall little esteem them. They should have considered, that there are laws in many places where there are no kings ; that there were laws in many before there were kings, as in Israel, the law was given three hundred years before they had any ; but most especially, that as no man can be a rightful king, except by law, nor have any just power, but from the law, if that power be found to be over-great, the law that gave it must have been before that which was to moderate, or restrain it ; for that could not be moderated, which was not in being. Leaving therefore our author to fight with these adversaries, if he please, when he finds them, I shall proceed to examine his own positions. “ The truth is,” says he, “ the original of laws was, for the “ keeping of the multitude in order. Popular estates could not subsist at all “ without laws, whereas kingdoms were governed many ages without them.
“ The people of Athens, as soon as they gave over kings, were forced to give “ power to Draco first, then to Solon, to make them laws.” If we will believe him therefore, wheresoever there is a king, or a man who, by having power in his hands, is in the place of a king, there is no need of law. He takes them all to be so wise, just, and good, that they are laws to themselves, “ leges viventes.” This was certainly verified by the whole succession of the Cæsars, the ten last kings of Pharamond’s race, all the successors of Charles-the Great, and others, that I am not willing to name ; but, referring myself to history, I desire all reasonable men to consider, whether the piety and tender care, that was natural to Caligula, Nero, or Domitian, was such a security to the nations that lived under them, as without law to be sufficient for their preservation : for, if the contrary appear to be true, and that their government was a perpetual exercise of rage, malice, and madness, by which the worst of men were armed with power to destroy the best, so that the empire could only be saved by their destruction, it is most certain, that mankind can never fall into a condition, which stands more in need of laws to protect
the

CHAP. III. the innocent, than when such monsters reign, who endeavour their extirpation, and are too well furnished with means to accomplish their detestable designs. Without any prejudice therefore to the cause that I defend, I might confess, that all nations were at the first governed by kings, and that no laws were imposed upon those kings, till they, or the successors of those, who had been advanced for their virtues, by falling into vice and corruption, did manifestly discover the inconveniences of depending upon their will. Besides these, there are also children, women, and fools, that often come to the succession of kingdoms, whose weakness and ignorance stands in as great need of support and direction, as the desperate fury of the others can do of restriction. And if some nations had been so sottish, not to foresee the mischief of leaving them to their will, others, or the same in succeeding ages discovering them, could no more be obliged to continue in so pernicious a folly, than we are to live in that wretched barbarity, in which the Romans found our ancestors, when they first entered this island.

If any man say, that Filmer does not speak of monsters, nor of children, women, or fools, but of wise, just, and good princes; I answer, that if there be a right inherent in kings, as kings, of doing what they please, and in those who are next in blood, to succeed them, and inherit the same, it must belong to all kings, and such as upon title of blood would be kings. And as there is no family that may not, and does not often produce such as I mentioned, it must also be acknowledged in them; and that power which is left to the wise, just, and good, upon a supposition, that they will not make an ill use of it, must be devolved to those, who will not or cannot make a good one; but will either maliciously turn it to the destruction of those they ought to protect, or through weakness suffer it to fall into the hands of those that govern them, who are found by experience to be for the most part the worst of all, most apt to use the basest arts, and to flatter the humours, and foment the vices, that are most prevalent in weak and vicious princes. Germanicus, Corbulo, Valerius Asiaticus, Thraseas, Soranus, Helvidius Priscus, Julius Agricola, and other excellent men, lived in the time of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero; but the power was put into the hands of Sejanus, Macro, Tigellinus, and other villains like to them: and I wish there were not too many modern examples to shew, that weak and vicious princes will never chuse such as shall preserve nations from the mischiefs that would ensue upon their own incapacity or malice; but that they must be imposed upon them by some other power, or nations be ruined for want of them. This imposition must be by law, or by force. But as laws are made to keep things in good order without the necessity of having recourse to force, it would be a dangerous extravagance to arm that prince with force, which probably in a short time must be opposed by force; and those who have been guilty of this error, as the kingdoms of the east, and the antient Roman empire, where no provision was made by law against ill-governing princes, have found no other remedy than to kill them, when by extreme sufferings they were driven beyond patience; and this fell out so often, that few of their princes were observed to die by a common death. But since the empire was transmitted to Germany, and the emperors restrained by laws, that nation has never been brought brought to the odious extremities of suffering all manner of indignities, or revenging them upon the heads of princes. And if the pope had not disturbed SECT. 13.

 them upon the account of religion, nor driven their princes to disturb others, they might have passed many ages without any civil dissension, and all their emperors might have lived happily, and died peaceably, as most of them have done.

This might be sufficient to my purpose: for, if all princes without distinction, whether good or bad, wise or foolish, young or old, sober or mad, cannot be entrusted with an unlimited power; and if the power they have,
 ought to be limited by law, that nations may not with danger to themselves, as well as to the prince, have recourse to the last remedy; this law must be given to all, and the good can be no otherwise distinguished from the bad, and the wise from the foolish, than by the observation or violation of it. But I may justly go a step farther, and affirm, that this law, which, by restrain-ing the lusts of the vicious and foolish, frequently preserves them from the destruction they would bring upon themselves or people, and sometimes upon both, is an assistance and direction to the wisest and best; so that they also, as well as the nations under them, are gainers by it. This will appear strange only to those who know not “* how difficult and insupportable the govern“ment of great nations is,” and how unable the best man is to bear it. And, if it surpasses the strength of the best, it may easily be determined how ordinary men will behave themselves under it, or what use the worst will make of it. I know there have been wise and good kings; but they had not an absolute power, nor would have accepted it, tho’ it had been offered: much less can I believe, that any of them would have transmitted such a power to their posterity, when none of them could know, any more than Solomon, whether his son would be a wise man, or a fool. But if the best might have desired, and had been able to bear it (tho’ Moses by his own confession was not) that could be no reason why it should be given to the worst and weakest, or those who probably will be so. Since the assurance, that it will not be abused during the life of one man, is nothing to the constitution of a state which aims at perpetuity. And no man knowing what men will be, especially if they come to the power by succession, which may properly enough be called by chance, it is reasonably to be feared they will be bad, and consequently necessary so to limit their power, that if they prove to be so, the commonwealth may not be destroyed, which they were instituted to preserve. The law provides for this in leaving to the king a full and ample power of doing as much good as his heart can wish, and in restraining his power so, that if he should depart from the duty of his office, the nation may not perish. This is a help to those who are wise and good, by directing them what they are to do, more certainly than any one man’s personal judgment can do; and no prejudice at all, since no such man did ever complain he was not suffered to do the evil, which he would abhor, if it were in his power; and is a most necessary curb to the fury of bad princes, preventing them

R r

* Quam grave & intolerandum sit cuncta regendi onus. Tacit.

CHAP. III. them from bringing destruction upon the people. Men are so subject to vices and passions, that they stand in need of some restraint in every condition; but most especially when they are in power. The rage of a private man may be pernicious to one or a few of his neighbours; but the fury of an unlimited prince would drive whole nations into ruin: and those very men, who have lived modestly when they had little power, have often proved the most savage of all monsters, when they thought nothing able to resist their rage. It is said of Caligula, that no man ever knew “* better servant, nor a worse master.” The want of restraint made him a beast, who might have continued to be a man. And tho’ I cannot say, that our law necessarily admits the next in blood to the succession (for the contrary is proved); yet the facility of our ancestors, in receiving children, women, or such men, as were not not more able than themselves to bear the weight of a crown, convinces me fully, that they had so framed our laws, that even children, women, or ill men, might either perform as much as was necessarily required of them, or be brought to reason, if they transgressed, and arrogated to themselves more than was allowed. For it is not to be imagined, that a company of men should so far degenerate from their own nature, which is reason, to give up themselves, and their posterity, with all their concerns in the world, to depend upon the will of a child, a woman, an ill man, or a fool.

If therefore laws are necessary to popular states, they are no less to monarchies; or rather, that is not a state or government, which has them not: and it is no less impossible for any to subsist without them, than for the body of a man to be, and perform its functions, without nerves or bones. And if any people had ever been so foolish to establish that which they called a government, without laws to support and regulate it, the impossibility of subsisting would evidence the madness of the constitution, and ought to deter all others from following their example.

Plut. vit.
Solon.

It is no less incredible, that those nations which rejected kings, did put themselves into the power of one man, to prescribe to them such laws as he pleased. But the instances alledged by our author are evidently false. The Athenians were not without laws when they had kings: Ægeus was subject to the laws, and did nothing of importance without the consent of the people; and Theseus, not being able to please them, died a banished man: Draco and Solon did not make, but propose laws, and they were of no force till they were established by the authority of the people. The Spartans dealt in the same manner with Lycurgus; he invented their laws, but the people made them: and, when the assembly of all the citizens had approved and sworn to observe them till his return from Crete, he resolved rather to die in a voluntary banishment, than by his return to absolve them from the oath they had taken. The Romans also had laws during the government of their kings; but not finding in them that perfection they desired, the decemviri were chosen to frame others, which yet were of no value till they were passed by the people people in the * "comitia centuriata;" and being so approved, they were established. But this sanction, to which every man, whether magistrate or private citizen, was subject, did no way bind the whole body of the people, who still retained in themselves the power of changing both the matter and the form of their government, as appears by their instituting and abrogating kings, consuls, dictators, tribunes, with consular power, and decemviri, when they thought good for the commonwealth. And if they had this power, I leave our author to shew, why the like is not in other nations.

* Nec meliorem servum, nec deteriozem dominum. Tac. Ann. l. 6. c. 20.

S E C T. XIV.

Laws are not made by kings, not because they are busied in greater matters than doing justice, but because nations will be governed by rule, and not arbitrarily.

OUR author pursuing the mistakes to which he seems perpetually condemned, says, that "when kings were either busied in war, or distracted with public cares, so that every private man could not have access unto their persons, to learn their wills and pleasures, then of necessity were laws invented, that so every particular subject might find his prince's pleasure." I have often heard, that governments were established for the obtaining of justice; and if that be true, it is hard to imagine what business a supreme magistrate can have to divert him from accomplishing the principal end of his institution. And it is as commonly said, that this distribution of justice to a people, is a work surpassing the strength of any one man. Jethro seems to have been a wise man, and it is probable he thought Moses to be so also; but he found the work of judging the people to be too heavy for him, and therefore advised him to leave the judgment of causes to others, who should be chosen for that purpose; which advice Moses accepted, and God approved. The governing power was as insupportable to him as the judicial. He desired rather to die than to bear so great a burthen; and God, neither accusing him of sloth or impatience, gave him seventy assistants. But if we may believe our author, the powers judicial and legislative, that of judging, as well as that of governing, are not too much for any man, woman, or child, whatsoever: and that he stands in no need, either of God's statutes to direct him, or man's counsel to assist him, unless it be when he is otherwise employed; and his will alone is sufficient for all. But what if he be not busied in greater matters, or distracted with public cares? Is every prince capable of this work? Though Moses had not found it too great for him, or it should be granted, that a man of excellent natural endowments, great wisdom, learning, experience, industry, and integrity, might perform it, is it certain, that all those who happen to be born in reigning families

R r 2

milies

* Ingenti hominum expectatione propositis decem tabulis populum ad concionem convocarunt; & quod bonum, faustum felixque sit reipublicæ, ipsis, liberisque eorum esset, ire & legere leges propositas jussere. T. Liv. l. iii. c. 34.

CHAP. III. milies are so? If Moses had the law of God before his eyes, and could repair to God himself for the application or explanation of it; have all princes the same assistance? Do they all speak with God face to face, or can they do what he did, without the assistance he had? If all kings of mature years are of that perfection, are we assured, that none shall die before his heir arrive to the same? Or shall he have the same ripeness of judgment in his infancy? If a child come to a crown, does that immediately infuse the most admirable endowments and graces? Have we any promise from heaven, that women shall enjoy the same prerogatives in those countries where they are made capable of the succession? Or does that law which renders them capable, defend them, not only against the frailty of their own nature, but confer the most sublime virtues upon them? But who knows not, that no families do more frequently produce weak or ill men, than the greatest? and that which is worse, their greatness is a snare to them; so that they who in a low condition might have passed unregarded, being advanced to the highest, have often appeared to be, or became the worst of all beasts; and they who advance them are like to them: for if the power be in the multitude, as our author is forced to confess (otherwise the Athenians and Romans could not have given all, as he says, nor a part, as I say, to Draco, Solon, or the decemviri) they must be beasts also, who should have given away their right and liberty, in hopes of receiving justice from such as probably will neither understand nor regard it, or protection from those who will not be able to help themselves, and expect such virtue, wisdom, and integrity, should be, and for ever remain, in the family they set up, as was never known to continue in any. If the power be not conferred upon them, they have it not; and if they have it not, their want of leisure to do justice, cannot have been the cause for which laws are made; and they cannot be the signification of their will, but are that to which the prince owes obedience, as well as the meanest subject. This is that which Bracton calls, De laud. leg. "esse sub lege," and says, that "rex in regno superiores habet Deum & Angl. c. 9. "legem." Fortescue says, the kings of England cannot change the laws: and indeed, they are so far from having any such power, that the judges swear to have no regard to the king's letters or commands, but if they receive any, to proceed according to law, as if they had not been. And the breach of this oath does not only bring a blemish upon their reputation, but exposes them to capital punishments, as many of them have found. It is not therefore the king that makes the law, but the law that makes the king. It gives the rule for succession, making kingdoms sometimes hereditary, and sometimes elective, and (more often than either simply) hereditary under condition. In some places males only are capable of inheriting, in others females are admitted. Where the monarchy is regular, as in Germany, England, &c. the kings can neither make nor change laws: they are under the law, and the law is not under them; their letters or commands are not to be regarded: in the administration of justice, the question is not what pleases them, but what the law declares to be right, which must have its course, whether the king be busy, or at leisure, whether he will or not. The king who never dies, is always present in the supreme

supreme courts, and neither knows nor regards the pleasure of the man, SECT. 14. that wears the crown. But lest he by his riches and power might have some influence upon judicial proceedings, the "great charter," that recapitulates and acknowledges our antient inherent liberties, obliges him to swear, that he will neither sell, delay, nor deny justice to any man, according to the laws of the land; which were ridiculous and absurd, if those laws were only the signification of his pleasure, or any way depended upon his will. This charter having been confirmed by more than thirty parliaments, all succeeding kings are under the obligation of the same oath, or must renounce the benefit they receive from our laws; which if they do, they will be found to be equal to every one of us.

Our author, according to his custom, having laid down a false proposition, goes about to justify it by false examples, as those of Draco, Solon, the decemviri, and Moses, of whom no one had the power he attributes to them; and it were nothing to us, if they had. The Athenians and Romans, as was said before, were so far from resigning the absolute power without appeal to themselves, that nothing done by their magistrates was of any force, till it was enacted by the people. And the power given to the decemviri, "fine "provocatione," was only in private cases, there being no superior magistrate, then in being, to whom appeals could be made. They were vested with the same power the kings and dictators enjoyed, from whom there lay no appeal, but to the people, and always to them; as appears by the case of Horatius, in the time of Tullus Hostilius; that of Marcus Fabius, when T. Liv. l. 1.
 Papirius Cursor was dictator; and of Nenius the tribune, during that of Q. c. 8.
 Fabius Maximus; all which I have cited already, and refer to them. There was therefore a reservation of the supreme power in the people, notwithstanding the creation of magistrates without appeal; and as it was quietly ex-exercised in making strangers, or whom they pleased, kings, restraining the power of dictators to six months, and that of the decemviri to two years; when the last did, contrary to law, endeavour, by force, to continue their power, the people did, by force, destroy it and them.

The case of Moses is yet more clear: he was the most humble and gentle of all men: he never raised his heart above his brethren, and commanded kings to live in the same modesty: he never desired the people should depend upon his will: in giving laws to them he fulfilled the will of God, not his own; and those laws were not the signification of his will, but of the will of God. They were the production of God's wisdom and goodness, not the invention of man; given to purify the people, not to advance the glory of their leader. He was not proud and insolent, nor pleased with that ostentation of pomp, to which fools give the name of majesty; and whoever so far exalts the power of a man, to make nations depend upon his pleasure, does not only lay a burden upon him, which neither Moses, nor any other, could ever bear, and every wise man will always abhor; but, with an impious fury, endeavours to set up a government contrary to the laws of God, presumes to accuse him of want of wisdom, or goodness to his own people, and to correct his errors; which is a work fit to be undertaken by such as our author.

From

From hence, as upon a solid foundation, he proceeds, and making use of king James's words, infers, that kings are above the laws, because he so teaches us. But he might have remembered, that, having affirmed the people could not judge of the disputes that might happen between them and kings, because they must not be judges in their own case, it is absurd to make a king judge of a case so nearly concerning himself, in the decision of which his own passions and interests may probably lead him into errors. And if it be pretended that I do the same, in giving the judgment of those matters to the people, the case is utterly different, both in the nature and consequences. The king's judgment is merely for himself; and if that were to take place, all the passions and vices, that have most power upon men, would concur to corrupt it. He that is set up for the public good, can have no contest with the whole people, whose good he is to procure, unless he deflect from the end of his institution, and set up an interest of his own in opposition to it. This is in its nature the highest of all delinquencies; and if such a one may be judge of his own crimes, he is not only sure to avoid punishment, but to obtain all that he sought by them; and the worse he is, the more violent will his desires be, to get all the power into his hands, that he may gratify his lusts, and execute his pernicious designs. On the other side, in a popular assembly, no man judges for himself, otherwise, than as his good is comprehended in that of the public: nothing hurts him, but what is prejudicial to the commonwealth: such amongst them as may have received private injuries, are so far only considered by others, as their sufferings may have influence upon the public: if they be few, and the matters not great, others will not suffer their quiet to be disturbed by them; if they are many and grievous, the tyranny thereby appears to be so cruel, that the nation cannot subsist, unless it be corrected or suppressed. Corruption of judgment proceeds from private passions, which in these cases never govern: and tho' a zeal for the public good may possibly be misguided, yet till it be so it can never be capable of excess. The last Tarquin, and his lewd son, exercised their fury and lust in the murders of the best men in Rome, and the rape of Lucretia. Appius Claudius was filled with the like madness. Caligula and Nero were so well established in the power of committing the worst of villainies, that we do not hear of any man that offered to defend himself, or woman that presumed to refuse them. If they had been judges in these cases, the utmost of all villainies and mischiefs had been established by law: but as long as the judgment of these matters was in the people, no private or corrupt passion could take place. Lucius Brutus, Valerius, Horatius, and Virginus, with the people that followed them, did not by the expulsion of the kings, or the suppression of the decemviri, assume to themselves a power of committing rapes and murders, nor any advantages beyond what their equals might think they deserved by their virtues, and services to the commonwealth; nor had they more credit than others for any other reason, than that they shewed themselves most forward in procuring the public good, and by their valour and conduct best able to promote it.

What-

Whatsoever happened after the overthrow of their liberty, belongs not to SECT. 14.
 my subject, for there was nothing of popularity in the judgments that were made. One tyrant destroyed another; the same passions and vices for the most part reigned in both: the last was often as bad as his predecessor whom he had overthrown; and one was sometimes approved by the people for no other reason, than that it was thought impossible for him to be worse than he who was in possession of the power. But if one instance can be of force amongst an infinite number of various accidents, the words of Valerius Asiaticus, who, by wishing he had been the man that had killed Caligula, did, in a moment, pacify the fury of the soldiers, who were looking for those that had done it, shew, that as long as men retain any thing of that reason which is truly their nature, they never fail of judging rightly of virtue and vice; whereas violent and ill princes have always done the contrary, and even the best do often deflect from the rules of justice, as appears not only by the examples of Edward the First and Third, who were brought to confess it, but even those of David and Solomon.

Moreover, to shew that the decision of these controversies cannot belong to any king, but to the people, we are only to consider, that as kings, and all other magistrates, whether supreme or subordinate, are constituted only for the good of the people, the people only can be fit to judge whether the end be accomplished. A physician does not exercise his art for himself, but for his patients; and when I am, or think I shall be sick, I send for him of whom I have the best opinion, that he may help me to recover, or preserve my health; but I lay him aside if I find him to be negligent, ignorant, or unfaithful; and it would be ridiculous for him to say, I make myself judge in my own case, for I only, or such as I shall consult, am fit to be the judge of it. He may be treacherous, and through corruption or malice endeavour to poison me, or have other defects, that render him unfit to be trusted: but I cannot, by any corrupt passion, be led wilfully to do him injustice, and if I mistake, it is only to my own hurt. The like may be said of lawyers, stewards, pilots, and generally of all that do not act for themselves, but for those who employ them. And if a company going to the Indies should find, that their pilot was mad, drunk, or treacherous, they whose lives and goods are concerned, can only be fit to judge, whether he ought to be trusted or not, since he cannot have a right to destroy those he was chosen to preserve; and they cannot be thought to judge perversely, because they have nothing to lead them but an opinion of truth, and cannot err but to their own prejudice. In the like manner, not only Solon and Draco, but Romulus, Numa, Hostilius, the consuls, dictators, and decemviri, were not distinguished from others, that it might be well with them, "sed ut bonum, felix, faustum, que sit populo Romano," but that the prosperity and happiness of the people might be procured; which being the thing always intended, it were absurd to refer the judgment of the performance to him who is suspected of a design to overthrow it, and whose passions, interests, and vices, if he has any, lead him that way. If king James said any thing contrary to this, he might be answered with some of his own words: "I was," says he, "sworn star-chamber, 1616.
Speech in
" to

CHAP. III. "to maintain the laws of the land, and therefore had been perjured if I had Hist. Scot. "broken them." It may also be presumed, he had not forgotten what his De jure reg. master Buchanan had taught in the books he wrote chiefly for his instruction, apud Scot. that the violation of the laws of Scotland could not have been so fatal to most of his predecessors, kings of that country (nor as he himself had made them to his mother) if kings as kings were above them.

S E C T. XV.

A general presumption, that kings will govern well, is not a sufficient security to the people.

"BUT," says our author, "yet will they rule their subjects by the law ;
 " and a king, governing in a settled kingdom, leaves to be a king, and " degenerates into a tyrant, so soon as he ceases to rule according unto his " laws : yet where he sees them rigorous or doubtful, he may mitigate or " interpret." This is therefore an effect of their goodness ; they are above laws, but will rule by law, we have Filmer's word for it. But I know not how nations can be assured their princes will always be so good : goodness is always accompanied with wisdom, and I do not find those admirable qualities to be generally inherent or entailed upon supreme magistrates. They do not seem to be all alike, and we have not hitherto found them all to live in the same spirit and principle. I can see no resemblance between Moses and Caligula, Joshua and Claudius, Gideon and Nero, Samson and Vitellius, Samuel and Otho, David and Domitian ; nor indeed between the best of these and their own children. If the sons of Moses and Joshua had been like to them in wisdom, valour, and integrity, it is probable they had been chosen to succeed them ; if they were not, the like is less to be presumed of others. No man has yet observed the moderation of Gideon to have been in Abimelech ; the piety of Eli in Hophni and Phinehas ; the purity and integrity of Samuel in Joel and Abiah, nor the wisdom of Solomon in Rehoboam. And if there was so vast a difference between them, and their children, who doubtless were instructed by those excellent men in the ways of wisdom and justice, as well by precept as example, were it not madness to be confident, that they who have neither precept nor good example to guide them, but, on the contrary, are educated in an utter ignorance or abhorrence of all virtue, will always be just and good ; or to put the whole power into the hands of every man, woman, or child, that shall be born in governing families, upon a supposition, that a thing will happen, which never did ; or that the weakest and worst will perform all that can be hoped, and was seldom accomplished by the wisest and best, exposing whole nations to be destroyed without remedy, if they do it not ? And if this be madness in all extremity, it is to be presumed, that nations never intended any such thing, unless our author prove, that all nations have been mad from the beginning, and must always continue

tinue to be so. To cure this, he says, "they degenerate into tyrants;" and SECT. 15. if he meant as he speaks, it would be enough. For a king cannot degenerate into a tyrant by departing from that law, which is only the product of his own will. But if he do degenerate, it must be by departing from that, which does not depend upon his will, and is a rule prescribed by a power that is above him. This indeed is the doctrine of Bracton, who, having said, that the power of the king is the power of the law, because the law makes him king, adds, "* that if he do injustice, he ceases to be king, degenerates into a tyrant, and becomes the vicegerent of the devil." But I hope this must be understood with temperament, and a due consideration of human frailty, so as to mean only those injuries that are extreme; for otherwise he would terribly shake all the crowns of the world.

But lest our author should be thought once in his life to have dealt sincerely, and spoken truth, the next lines shew the fraud of his last assertion, by giving to the prince a power of "mitigating or interpreting the laws, that he sees to be rigorous or doubtful." But as he cannot degenerate into a tyrant by departing from the law, which proceeds from his own will, so he cannot mitigate or interpret that which proceeds from a superior power, unless the right of mitigating or interpreting be conferred upon him by the same. For as all wise men confess, that "† none can abrogate, but those who may institute," and that all mitigation and interpretation varying from the true sense is an alteration, that alteration is an abrogation; for ‡ whatsoever is changed, is dissolved: and therefore the power of mitigating is inseparable from that of instituting. This is sufficiently evidenced by Henry the Eighth's answer to the speech made to him by the speaker of the house of commons 1545, in which he, tho' one of the most violent princes we ever had, confesses the parliament to be the law-makers, and that an obligation lay upon him rightly to use the power with which he was entrusted. The right therefore of altering being inseparable from that of making laws, the one being in the parliament, the other must be so also. Fortescue says plainly, the king cannot change any law: magna charta casts all upon || the laws of the land, and customs of England: but to say, that the king can by his will make that to be a custom, or an antient law, which is not, or that not to be so, which is, is most absurd. He must therefore take the laws and customs, as he finds them, and can neither detract from nor add any thing to them. The ways are prescribed as well as the end. Judgments are given by equals, "per pares." The judges, who may be assisting to those, are sworn to proceed according to law, and not to regard the king's letters or commands. The doubtful cases are reserved, and to be referred to the parliament, as in the statute of 35 Edw. III. concerning treasons, but never to the king. The law intending that these parliaments should be annual, and leaving to the king a power of calling them more often, if occasion require, takes away all pre-

* Quia si faciat injuriam, desinit esse rex, et degenerat in tyrannum, & fit vicarius diaboli.
Bract.

† Cujus est instituere, ejus est abrogare.

‡ Quicquid mutatur, dissolvitur: interit ergo.

|| Leges terræ, & consuetudines Angliæ.

CHAP. III. tence of a necessity, that there should be any other power to interpret or mitigate laws. For it is not to be imagined, that there should be such a pestilent evil in any antient law, custom, or later act of parliament, which, being on the sudden discovered, may not without any great prejudice continue for forty days, till a parliament may be called; whereas the force and essence of all laws would be subverted, if, under colour of mitigating and interpreting, the power of altering were allowed to kings, who often want the inclination, and for the most part the capacity, of doing it rightly. It is not therefore upon the uncertain will or understanding of a prince, that the safety of a nation ought to depend. He is sometimes a child, and sometimes overburdened with years. Some are weak, negligent, slothful, foolish, or vicious; others, who may have something of rectitude in their intentions, and naturally are not incapable of doing well, are drawn out of the right way by the subtilty of ill men, who gain credit with them. That rule must always be uncertain, and subject to be distorted, which depends upon the fancy of such a man. He always fluctuates, and every passion that arises in his mind, or is infused by others, disorders him. The good of a people ought to be established upon a more solid foundation. For this reason, the law is established, which no passion can disturb. It is void of desire and fear, lust and anger. It is "mens sine affectu," written reason retaining some measure of the divine perfection. It does not injoin that which pleases a weak, frail man; but, without any regard to persons, commands that which is good, and punishes evil in all, whether rich or poor, high or low. It is deaf, inexorable, inflexible.

By this means, every man knows when he is safe, or in danger, because he knows, whether he has done good or evil. But if all depended upon the will of a man, the worst would be often the most safe, and the best in the greatest hazard; slaves would be often advanced, the good and the brave scorned and neglected. The most generous nations have above all things sought to avoid this evil: and the virtue, wisdom, and generosity of each, may be discerned by the right fixing of the rule, that must be the guide of every man's life, and so constituting their magistracy, that it may be duly observed. Such as have attained to this perfection, have always flourished in virtue and happiness: they are, as Aristotle says, governed by God, rather than by men, whilst those who subjected themselves to the will of a man, were governed by a beast.

This being so, our author's next clause, that "tho' a king do frame all his actions to be according unto law, yet he is not bound thereunto, but as his good will, and for good example, or so far forth as the general law, for the safety of the commonwealth, doth naturally bind him," is wholly impertinent. For if the king, who governs not according to law, degenerates into a tyrant, he is obliged to frame his actions according to law, or not to be a king; for a tyrant is none, but as contrary to him, as the worst of men is to the best. But if these obligations were untied, we may easily guess, what security our author's word can be to us, that the king of his own good will, and for a good example, will frame his actions according to the laws; when when experience instructs us, that notwithstanding the strictest laws, and most exquisite constitutions, that men of the best abilities in the world could ever invent to restrain the irregular appetites of those in power, with the dreadful examples of vengeance taken against such as would not be restrained, they have frequently broken out; and the most powerful have, for the most part, no otherwise distinguished themselves from the rest of men, than by the enormity of their vices, and being the most forward in leading others to all manner of crimes by their example.

S E C T. XVI.

The observation of the laws of nature is absurdly expected from tyrants, who set themselves up against all laws: and he that subjects kings to no other law than what is common to tyrants, destroys their being.

OUR author's last clause, acknowledging kings to be bound by a general law to provide for the safety of the people, would be sufficient for my purpose, if it were sincere; for municipal laws do only shew how that should be performed: and if the king, by departing from that rule, degenerates, as he says, into a tyrant, it is easily determined what ought then to be done by the people. But his whole book being a heap of contradictions and frauds, we can rely upon nothing that he says: and his following words, which under the same law comprehend both kings and tyrants, shew that he intends kings should be no otherwise obliged than tyrants, which is, not at all. "By this means," says he, "are all kings, even tyrants and conquerors, bound to preserve the lands, goods, liberties, and lives of all their subjects, not by any municipal law of the land, so much as by the natural law of a father, which obligeth them to ratify the acts of their forefathers and predecessors in things necessary for the public good of their subjects." If he be therefore in the right, tyrants and conquerors are kings and fathers. The words that have been always thought to comprehend the most irreconcilable contrariety, the one expressing the most tender love and care, evidently testified by the greatest obligations conferred upon those who are under it; the other the utmost of all injuries that can be offered to men; signify the same thing; there is no difference between a magistrate who is what he is by law, and a public enemy, who by force or fraud sets himself up against all law: and what he said before, that kings degenerated into tyrants, signifies nothing; for tyrants also are kings.

His next words are no less incomprehensible: for neither king nor tyrant can be obliged to preserve the lands, goods, and liberties of their subjects, if they have none. But as liberty consists only in being subject to no man's will, and nothing denotes a slave but a dependence upon the will of another; if there be no other law in a kingdom than the will of a prince; there is no such thing as liberty. Property is also an appendage to liberty: and it is as im-

CHAP. III. possible for a man to have a right to lands or goods, if he has no liberty, and enjoys his life only at the pleasure of another, as it is to enjoy either, when he is deprived of them. He therefore who says kings and tyrants are bound to preserve their subjects lands, liberties, goods, and lives, and yet lays for a foundation, that laws are no more than the significations of their pleasure, seeks to delude the world with words which signify nothing.

The vanity of these whimsies will farther appear, if it be considered, that as kings are kings by law, and tyrants are tyrants by overthrowing the law; they are most absurdly joined together; and it is not more ridiculous to set him above the law, who is what he is by the law, than to expect the observation of the laws that injoin the preservation of the lands, liberties, goods, and lives, of the people, from one who by fraud or violence makes himself master of all, that he may be restrained by no law, and is what he is by subverting all law.

Besides, if the safety of the people be the supreme law, and this safety extend to, and consist in, the preservation of their liberties, goods, lands, and lives, that law must necessarily be the root and beginning, as well as the end and limit, of all magistratical power, and all laws must be subservient and subordinate to it. The question will not then be what pleases the king, but what is good for the people; not what conduces to his profit or glory, but what best secures the liberties he is bound to preserve: he does not therefore reign for himself, but for the people; he is not the master, but the servant, of the commonwealth; and the utmost extent of his prerogative is, to be able to do more good than any private man. If this be his work and duty, it is easily seen whether he is to judge of his own performance, or they by whom, and for whom, he reigns; and whether, in order to this, he be to give laws, or to receive them. It is ordinarily said in France, "Il faut que chacun soit servi à sa mode;" Every man's business must be done according to his own mind: and if this be true in particular persons, it is more plainly so in whole nations. Many eyes see more than one: the collected wisdom of a people much surpasses that of a single person; and tho' he should truly seek that which is best, it is not probable he would so easily find it, as the body of a nation, or the principal men chosen to represent the whole. This may be said with justice of the best and wisest princes that ever were; but another language is to be used, when we speak of those who may succeed, and who very often, through the defects of age, person, or sex, are neither fit to judge of other mens affairs, nor of their own; and are so far from being capable of the highest concerns relating to the safety of whole nations, that the most trivial cannot reasonably be referred to them.

There are few men (except such as are like Filmer, who, by bidding defiance to the laws of God and man, seems to declare war against both) whom I would not trust to determine whether a people, that can never fall into nonage or dotage, and can never fail of having men of wisdom and virtue amongst them, be not more fit to judge in their own persons, or by representatives, what conduces to their own good, than one who at a venture

venture may be born in a certain family, and who, besides his own infirmities, passions, vices, or interests, is continually surrounded by such as endeavour to divert him from the ways of truth and justice. And if no reasonable man dare prefer the latter before the former, we must rely upon the laws made by our forefathers, and interpreted by the nation, and not upon the will of a man. SECT. 16.

It is in vain to say, that a wise and good council may supply the defects, or correct the vices, of a young, foolish, or ill-disposed king. For Filmer denies, that a king, whatever he be, without exception (for he attributes profound wisdom to all), is obliged to follow the advice of his council; and even he would hardly have had the impudence to say, that good counsel, given to a foolish or wicked prince, were of any value, unless he were obliged to follow it. This council must be chosen by him, or imposed upon him: if it be imposed upon him, it must be by a power that is above him, which he says cannot be. If chosen by him who is weak, foolish, or wicked, it can never be good; because such virtue and wisdom is required to discern and chuse a few good and wise men, from a multitude of foolish and bad, as he has not. And it will generally fall out, that he will take for his counsellors, rather those he believes to be addicted to his person or interests, than such as are fitly qualified to perform the duty of their places. But if he should, by chance, or contrary to his intentions, make choice of some good and wise men, the matter would not be much mended; for they will certainly differ in opinion from the worst. And tho' the prince should intend well, of which there is no assurance; nor any reason to put so great a power into his hands, if there be none; it is almost impossible for him to avoid the snares that will be laid to seduce him. I know not how to put a better face upon this matter; for if I examine rather what is probable than possible, foolish or ill princes will never chuse such as are wise and good; but favouring those who are most like to themselves, will prefer such as second their vices, humours, and personal interests, and, by so doing, will rather fortify and rivet the evils that are brought upon the nation through their defects, than cure them. This was evident in Rehoboam: he had good counsel, but he would not hearken to it. We know too many of the same sort; and tho' it were not impossible (as Machiavelli says it is) for a weak prince to receive any benefit from a good council, we may certainly conclude, that a people can never expect any good from a council chosen by one who is weak or vicious.

If a council be imposed upon him, and he be obliged to follow their advice, it must be imposed by a power that is above him: his will therefore is not a law; but must be regulated by the law: the monarchy is not above the law; and if we will believe our author, it is no monarchy, because the monarch has not his will, and perhaps he says true. For if that be an aristocracy, where those that are, or are reputed to be, the best, do govern, then that is certainly a mixed state, in which the will of one man does not prevail. But if princes are not obliged by the law, all that is founded upon that supposition falls to the ground: they will always follow their own humours.

CHAP. III. mours, or the suggestions of those who second them. Tiberius hearkned to none but Chaldeans, or the ministers of his impurities and cruelties: Claudius was governed by slaves, and the profligate strumpets his wives. There were many wise and good men in the senate during the reigns of Caligula, Nero, and Domitian; but instead of following their counsel, they endeavoured to destroy them all, lest they should head the people against them; and such princes as resemble them will always follow the like courses.

If I often repeat these hateful names, it is not for want of fresher examples of the same nature; but I chuse such as mankind has universally condemned, against whom I can have no other cause of hatred than what is common to all those who have any love to virtue, and which can have no other relation to the controversies of later ages, than what may flow from the similitude of their causes, rather than such as are too well known to us, and which every man, according to the measure of his experience, may call to mind in reading these. I may also add, that as nothing is to be received as a general maxim, which is not generally true, I need no more to overthrow such as Filmer proposes, than to prove how frequently they have been found false, and what desperate mischiefs have been brought upon the world as often as they have been practised, and excessive powers put into the hands of such as had neither inclination nor ability to make a good use of them.

1. But if the safety of nations be the end for which governments are instituted, such as take upon them to govern, by what title soever, are by the law of nature bound to procure it; and in order to this, to preserve the lives, lands, liberties, and goods, of every one of their subjects: and he that, upon any title whatsoever, pretends, assumes, or exercises a power of disposing of them according to his will, violates the laws of nature in the highest degree.

2. If all princes are obliged, by the law of nature, to preserve the lands, goods, lives, and liberties, of their subjects, those subjects have, by the law of nature, a right to their liberties, lands, goods, &c. and cannot depend upon the will of any man; for that dependence destroys liberty, &c.

3. Ill men will not, and weak men cannot, provide for the safety of the people; nay, the work is of such extreme difficulty, that the greatest and wisest men that have been in the world are not able, by themselves, to perform it; and the assistance of counsel is of no use, unless princes are obliged to follow it. There must be therefore a power in every state to restrain the ill, and to instruct weak princes, by obliging them to follow the counsels given, else the ends of government cannot be accomplished, nor the rights of nations preserved.

All this being no more than is said by our author, or necessarily to be deduced from his propositions, one would think he were become as good a commonwealths-man as Cato; but the washed swine will return to the mire. He overthrows all by a preposterous conjunction of the rights of kings, which are just, and by law, with those of tyrants, which are utterly against law; and gives the sacred and gentle name of father to those beasts, who by their actions declare themselves enemies not only to all law and justice, but to mankind, that cannot subsist without them. This requires no other proof, than to examine whether Attila or Tamerlane did well deserve to be called fathers of the countries they destroyed. The first of these was usually called the scourge of God, and he gloried in the name. The other, being reproved for the detestable cruelties he exercised, made answer, "You speak to me as to a man: I am not a man, but the scourge of God, and plague of mankind." This is certainly sweet and gentle language, favouring much of a fatherly tenderness: there is no doubt, that those who use it will provide for the safety of the nations under them, and the preservation of the laws of nature is rightly referred to them; and it is very probable, that they who came to burn the countries, and destroy the nations, that fell under their power, should make it their business to preserve them, and look upon the former governors "as their fathers, whose acts they were obliged to confirm," tho' they seldom attained to the dominion by any other means, than the slaughter of them, and their families.
that

But if the enmity be not against the nation, and the cause of the war be only for dominion against the ruling person or family, as that of Baasha against the house of Joroboam, of Zimri against that of Baasha, of Omri against Zimri, and of Jehu against Joram, the prosecution of it is a strange way of becoming the son of the person destroyed. And Filmer alone is subtil enough to discover, that Jehu, by extinguishing the house of Ahab, drew an obligation upon himself, of looking on him as his father, and confirming his acts. If this be true, Moses was obliged to confirm the acts of the kings of the Amalekites, Moabites, and Amorites, that he destroyed; the same duty lay upon Joshua, in relation to the Canaanites: but it is not so easily decided, to which of them he did owe that deference; for the same could not be due to all, and it is hard to believe, that by killing above thirty kings, he should purchase to himself so many fathers; and the like may be said of divers others.

Moreover, there is a sort of tyrant who has no father, as Agathocles, Dionysius, Cæsar, and generally all those, who subvert the liberties of their own country. And if they stood obliged to look upon the former magistrates as their predecessors, and to confirm their acts, the first should have been to give impunity and reward to any that would kill them, it having been a fundamental maxim in those states, "that any man might kill a tyrant."

This being in all respects ridiculous and absurd, it is evident, that our author, who, by proposing such a false security to nations for their liberties, endeavours to betray them, is not less treacherous to kings, when, under a pretence of defending their rights, he makes them to be the same with those of tyrants, who are known to have none (and are tyrants, because they have none); and gives no other hopes to nations of being preserved by the kings they set up for that end, than what upon the same account may be expected from tyrants, whom all wise men have ever abhorred, and affirmed to have been "produced to bring destruction upon the world," and whose lives have verified the sentence.

* Unicuique licere tyrannum occidere.

† In generis humani exitium natos.

CHAP. III. This is truly to depose and abolish kings, by abolishing that by which, and for which, they are so. The greatness of their power, riches, state, and the pleasures that accompany them, cannot but create enemies. Some will envy that which is accounted happiness; others may dislike the use they make of their power: some may be unjustly exasperated by the best of their actions, when they find themselves incommoded by them; others may be too severe judges of slight miscarriages. These things may reasonably temper the joys of those, who delight most in the advantages of crowns. But the worst and most dangerous of all their enemies are these accursed sycophants, who, by making those that ought to be the best of men, like to the worst, destroy their being; and by persuading the world they aim at the same things, and are bound to no other rule than is common to all tyrants, give a fair pretence to ill men to say, they are all of one kind. And if this should be received for truth, even they who think the miscarriages of their governors may be easily redressed, and desire no more, would be the most fierce in procuring the destruction of that, which is naught in principle, and cannot be corrected.

S E C T. XVII.

Kings cannot be the interpreters of the oaths they take.

OUR author's book is so full of absurdities and contradictions, that it would be a rope of sand, if a continued series of frauds did not, like a string of poisons running through the whole, give it some consistence with itself, and shew it to be the work of one and the same hand. After having endeavoured to subvert the laws of God, nature, and nations, most especially our own, by abusing the Scriptures, falsely alledging the authority of many good writers, and seeking to obtrude upon mankind a universal law, that would take from every nation the right of constituting such governments within themselves, as seem most convenient for them, and giving rules for the administration of such as they had established, he gives us a full view of his religion and morals, by destroying the force of the oath taken by our kings at their coronation. "Others," says he, "affirm, that although laws of themselves do not bind kings, yet the oaths of kings at their coronation tie them to keep all the laws of their kingdoms. How far this is true, let us but examine the oath of the kings of England at their coronation; the words whereof are these: "Art thou pleased to cause to be administered in all thy judgments, indifferent and upright justice, and to use discretion with mercy and verity? Art thou pleased, that our upright laws and customs be observed? And dost thou promise, that those shall be protected and maintained by thee?" &c. To which the king answers in the affirmative, being first demanded by the archbishop of Canterbury, "Pleaseth it you, to confirm and observe the laws and customs of the antient times, granted from God by just and devout kings unto the English nation, by oath unto the said people, especially the laws, liberties, and customs granted un-

" to

“ to the clergy and laity by the famous king Edward?” From this he infers, SECT. 17.
 That the king “ is not to observe all laws, but such as are upright, because he “ finds evil laws mentioned in the oath of Richard the 2d, which he swears to “ abolish: now what laws are upright, and what evil, who shall judge but the “ king? &c. So that in effect the king doth swear to keep no laws but such “ as in his judgment are upright, &c. And if he did strictly swear to observe “ all laws, he could not without perjury give his consent to the repealing or ab-“ rogating of any statute by act of parliament,” &c. And again, “ But, let it “ be supposed for truth, that kings do swear to observe all laws of their king“ doms; yet no man can think it reason, that the kings should be more bound “ by their voluntary oaths than common persons: now if a private person make “ a contract, either with oath, or without oath, he is no farther bound than “ the equity and justice of the contract ties him; for a man may have relief a“ gainst an unreasonable and unjust promise, if either deceit or error, force or “ fear, induced him thereunto; or if it be hurtful or grievous in the perfor“ mance, since the law in many cases gives the king a prerogative above com“ mon persons.” Lest I should be thought to insist upon small advantages, I will not oblige any man to shew where Filmer found this oath, nor observe the faults committed in the translation; but notwithstanding his false representation,
 I find enough for my purpose, and intend to take it in his own words. But first I shall take leave to remark, that those who, for private interests, addict themselves to the personal service of princes, tho’ to the ruin of their country, find it impossible to persuade mankind, that kings may govern as they please, when all men know there are laws to direct and restrain them, unless they can make men believe they have their power from an universal and superior law; or that princes can attempt to dissolve the obligations laid upon them by the laws, which they so solemnly swear to observe, without rendering themselves detestable to God and man, and subject to the revenging hands of both, unless they can invalidate those oaths. Mr. Hobbes, I think, was the first who very ingeniously Lib. de cive.
 contrived a compendious way of justifying the most abominable perjuries, and all the mischiefs ensuing thereupon, by pretending, that as the king’s oath is made to the people, the people may absolve him from the obligation; and that the people having conferred upon him all the power they had, he can do all that they could: he can therefore absolve himself, and is actually free, since he is so when he pleases. This is not false in the minor: for the people not having conferred upon him all, but only a part of their power, that of absolving him remains in themselves, otherwise they would never have obliged him to take the oath. He cannot therefore absolve himself. The pope finds a help for this, and, as Christ’s vicar, pretends the power of absolution to be in him, and exercised it in absolving king John. But our author, despairing to impose either of these upon our age and nation, with more impudence, and less wit, would enervate all coronation-oaths by subjecting them to the discretion of the taker; * whereas all men have hitherto thought their force to consist in the declared sense of those who give them. This doctrine is so new, that it

* Verba jurantis obligare in sensu quo ea creditur accepisse cui juratum est—dictis ipsis testem adhibens Deum, debet dicta facere vera quomodo putat intelligi. Grotius de jure B. & P. l. ii.
 c. 13.

CHAP. III. surpasses the subtilty of the schoolmen, who, as an ingenious person said of them, had minced oaths so fine, that a million of them, as well as angels, may stand upon the point of a needle; and were never yet equalled but by the Jesuits, who have overthrown them by mental reservations, which is so clearly demonstrated from their books, that it cannot be denied; but so horrible, that even those of their own order who have the least spark of common honesty condemn the practice. And one of them, being a gentleman of a good family, told me, he would go the next day and take all the oaths that should be offered, if he could satisfy his conscience in using any manner of equivocation, or mental reservation; or that he might put any other sense upon them, than he knew to be intended by those who offered them. And if our author's conscience were not more corrupted than that of the Jesuit, who had lived fifty years under the worst discipline that I think ever was in the world, I would ask him seriously, if he truly believe, that the nobility, clergy, and commonalty of England, who have been always so zealous for their antient laws, and so resolute in defending them, did mean no more by the oaths they so solemnly imposed, and upon which they laid so much weight, than that the king should swear to keep them, so far only as he should think fit. But "he swears only to observe those that are upright," &c. How can that be understood otherwise, than that those who give the oath, do declare their laws and customs to be upright and good, and he by taking the oath affirms them to be so? Or, how can they be more precisely specified than by the ensuing clause, "Granted from God by just and devout kings by oath, especially those of the famous king Edward?" But, says he, by the same oath "Richard the Second was bound to abolish those that were evil." If any such had crept in through error, or been obtruded by malice, the evil being discovered and declared by the nobility and commons who were concerned, he was not to take advantage of them, or by his refusal to evade the abolition, but to join with his people in annulling them, according to the general clause of assenting to those "quas vulgus elegerit."

Magna Charta being only an abridgment of our antient laws and customs, the king that swears to it, swears to them all; and not being admitted to be the interpreter of it, or to determine what is good or evil, fit to be observed or annulled in it, can have no more power over the rest. This having been confirmed by more parliaments than we have had kings since that time, the same obligation must still lie upon them all, as upon John and Henry, in whose time that claim of right was compiled. The act was no less solemn than important; and the most dreadful curses that could be conceived in words, which were denounced against such as should any way infringe it, by the clergy in Westminster-hall, in the presence, and with the assent, of K. Henry the Third, many of the principal nobility, and all the estates of the kingdom, shew whether it was referred to the king's judgment or not; when it is evident they feared the violation from no other than himself, and such as he should employ. I confess the church (as they then called the clergy) was fallen into such corruption, that their arms were not much to be feared by one who had his conscience clear; but that could not be in the case of perjury:

jury: and our ancestors could do no better, than to employ the spiritual sword, reserving to themselves the use of the other, in case that should be despised. Tho' the pope's excommunications proved sometimes to be but "bruta fulmina," when a just cause was wanting, it may be easily judged what obedience a prince could expect from his subjects, when every man knew he had by perjury drawn the most heavy curses upon himself. King John was certainly wicked, but he durst not break these bonds till he had procured the pope's absolution for a cover; and when he had done so, he found himself unsafe under it, and could not make good what he had promised to the pope to obtain it, the parliament declaring, that his grants to the pope were unjust, illegal, contrary to his coronation-oath, and that they would not be held by them. This went so far in that king's time, that writs were issued out to men of all conditions to oblige themselves by oath to keep the great charter; and if other means failed, "* to compel the king to perform the conditions." It is expressly said in his charter, "† That the barons and commonalty of the land shall streighten and compel us by all means possible, as by seizing our towns, lands, and possessions, or any other way, till satisfaction be made according to their pleasure." And in the charter of his son Henry, it is, upon the same supposition of not performing the agreement, said, "‖ It shall be lawful for all men in our kingdom to rise up against us, and to do all things that may be grievous to us, as if they were absolutely free from any engagements to our person." These words seem to have been contrived to be so full and strong "propter duplicitem regis," which was with too much reason suspected. And it is not, as I suppose, "the language of slaves and villains begging something from their lord, but of noble and free men, who knew their lord was no more than what they made him, and had nothing but what they gave him:" nor the language of a lord treating with such as enjoyed their liberties by his favour, but with those whom he acknowledged to be the judges of his performing what had been stipulated; and equals the agreements made between the kings and people of Arragon, which I cited before from the relations of Antonio Perez. This is as far as men can go; and the experience of all ages manifests, that princes, performing their office, and observing these stipulations, have lived glorious, happy, and beloved: and I can hardly find an example of any who have notoriously broken these oaths, and been adjudged to have incurred the penalties, who have not lived miserably, died shamefully, and left an abominable memory to posterity.

"But," says our author, "kings cannot be more obliged by voluntary oaths than other men, and may be relieved from unjust and unreasonable promises, if they be induced by deceit, error, force, or fear, or the performance be grievous." Which is to say, that no oath is of any obligation:

* Et quod ipsum regem per captionem distringerent & gravarent ad præfata exequenda.

† Et ipsi barones cum communitate totius terræ distringent & gravabunt nos modis omnibus quibus poterunt, scilicet per captionem castrorum, terrarum, possessionum, & aliis modis quibus potuerint, donec emendatum fuerit secundum arbitrium eorum.

‖ Licet omnibus de regno nostro contra nos insurgere, & omnia facere quæ gravamen nostrum respiciant, ac si nobis in nullo tenerentur.

CHAP. III. for there is none that is not voluntary, or involuntary; and there never was any, upon which some such thing may not be pretended: which would be the same, if such as Filmer had the direction of their consciences who take the oaths, and of those who are to exact the performance. This would soon destroy all confidence between king and people, and not only unhinge the best established governments, but by a detestable practice of annihilating the force of oaths, and most solemn contracts, that can be made by men, overthrow all societies that subsist by them. I leave it to all reasonable men to judge how fit a work this would be for the supreme magistrate, who is advanced to the highest degree of human glory and happiness, that he may preserve them; and how that justice, for the obtaining of which governments are constituted, can be administered, if he who is to exact it from others, do in his own person utterly subvert it; and what they deserve, who by such base prevarications would teach them to pervert and abolish the most sacred of all contracts. A worthy person of our age was accustomed to say, that contracts in writing were invented only to bind villains, who having no law, justice, or truth, within themselves, would not keep their words, unless such testimonies were given as might compel them. But if our author's doctrine were received, no contract would be of more value than a cobweb*. Such as are not of a profligate conscience, so far reverence the religion of an oath, as to think, that even those which are most unjustly and violently imposed ought to be observed; and Julius Cæsar, who I think was not over-scrupulous, when he was taken by pirates, and set at liberty upon his word, caused the ransom he had promised to be paid to them. We see the like is practised every day by prisoners taken in unjust as well as just wars: and there is no honest man that would not abhor a person, who, being taken by the pirates of Algier, would not pay what he had promised for his liberty. It were in vain to say they had no right of exacting, or that the performance was grievous; he must return to the chains, or pay. And tho' the people of Artois, Alsatia, or Flanders, do perhaps, with reason, think the king of France has no right to impose oaths of allegiance upon them, no man doubts, that if they chuse rather to take those oaths, than to suffer what might ensue upon their refusal, they are as much bound to be faithful to him as his antient subjects.

Grotius l. ii. c. 13. 4. The like may be said of promises extorted by fraud; and no other example is necessary to prove they are to be performed than that of Joshua made to the Gibeonites. They were an accursed nation, which he was commanded to destroy: they came to him with lies, and by deceit induced him to make a league with them, which he ought not to have done; but being made, it was to be performed; and on that account he did not only spare but defend them, and the action was approved by God. When Saul by a preposterous zeal violated that league, the anger of God for that breach of faith could no otherwise be appeased than by the death of seven of his children. This case is so full, so precise, and of such undoubted authority, that I shall not trouble myself with any other. But if we believe our man of good morals, voluntary oaths and promises are of no more value than those gained by force or deceit, that is to say, none are of any. For voluntary signifying nothing but free, all human acts are either free or not free, that is, from the will of the person, or some impulse from without. If therefore there be no force in those that are free, nor in those that are not free, there is none in any.

* Qui juravit Deo, obligetur stare jurejurando—non enim persona sola respicitur cui juratur, sed is qui juratur, Deus—repudiandus ergo Cicero, cum ait perjurium nullum esse, si prædonibus pactum, &c. Grotius de jure B. & P. l. ii. c. 13. p. 14, 15. Ipse, qui juratus aliquid promissit nocenti, qua talis est, puta piratæ, non potest jus promisso quæsitum poenæ nomine ob id ipsum ei auferre: quia tunc verba nullum haberent effectum, quod omnino vitandum est. p. 20. 3. The arguments Puffendorf brings against Grotius see de jure nat. l. iv. c. 2.

No better use can be made of any "pretension of error," or that the "performance was grievous;" for no man ought to be grieved at the performance of his contract. David assures us, that a good man performs his agreement, tho' he lose by it; and the lord chancellor Egerton told a gentleman, who desired relief against his own deed, upon an allegation that he knew not what he did when he signed it, that he did not sit to relieve fools.

But tho' voluntary promises or oaths, when, to use the lawyers language, there is not a valuable consideration, were of no obligation; or that men brought by force, fear, or error, into such contracts as are grievous in the performance, might be relieved; this would not at all reach the cases of princes, in the contracts made between them and their subjects, and confirmed by their oaths, there being no colour of force or fraud, fear or error, for them to alledge; nor any thing to be pretended that can be grievous to perform, otherwise than as it may be grievous to an ill man not to do the mischiefs he had conceived.

Nations, according to their own will, frame the laws by which they resolve to be governed; and if they do it not wisely, the damage is only to themselves: but it is hard to find an example of any people that did by force oblige a man to take upon him the government of them. Gideon was indeed much pressed by the Israelites to be their king; and the army of Germanicus, in a mutiny, more fiercely urged him to be emperor; but both desisted when their offers were refused. If our kings have been more modest, and our ancestors more pertinacious in compelling them to accept the crowns they offered, I shall, upon proof of the matter, change my opinion. But till that do appear, I may be pardoned if I think there was no such thing. William the Norman was not by force brought into England, but came voluntarily, and desired to be king: the nobility, clergy, and commons, proposed the conditions upon which they would receive him. These conditions were to govern according to their antient laws, especially those that had been granted, or rather collected in the time of the famous king Edward. Here was neither force nor fraud; if he had disliked the terms, he might have retired as freely as he came.
 But he did like them; and tho' he was not perhaps so modest, to say with the brave Saxon king Offa, "Ad libertatis vestræ tuitionem, non meis meritis, sed Addit. Mat.
sola liberalitate vestra, unanimiter me convocastis," he accepted the crown Par.
 upon the conditions offered, and swore upon the evangelists to observe them.
 Not much valuing this, he pretended to govern according to his own will; but finding the people would not endure it, he renewed his oath upon the same

CHAP. III. same evangelists, and the reliques of St. Alban, which he needed not to have done, but might have departed to his dutchy of Normandy if he had not liked the conditions, or thought not fit to observe them. It is probable he examined the contents of Edward's laws before he * swore to them, and could not imagine, that a free nation, which never had any other kings than such as had been chosen by themselves for the preservation of their liberty, and from whose liberality the best of their kings acknowledged the crowns they wore, did intend to give up their persons, liberties, and estates, to him, who was a stranger, most especially when they would not receive him till he had sworn to the same laws by which the others had reigned, of which one was (as appears by the act of the Conventus Pananglicus) that "reges à sacerdotibus & senioribus populi eligantur, the kings should be elected by the clergy and elders of the people." By these means he was advanced to the crown, to which he could have no title, unless they had the right of conferring it upon him. Here was therefore no force, deceit, or error; and whatsoever equity there might be to relieve one that had been forced, frightened, or circumvented, it was nothing to this case. We do not find, that William II. or Henry, were forced to be kings; no sword was put to their throats; and for any thing we know, the English nation was not then so contemptible but men might have been found in the world, who would willingly have accepted the crown, and even their elder brother Robert would not have refused: but the nobility and commons, trusting to their oaths and promises, thought fit to prefer them before him; and when he endeavoured to impose himself upon the nation by force, they so severely punished him, that no better proof can be required to shew, that they were accustomed to have no other kings than such as they approved. And this was one of the customs that all their kings swore to maintain, it being as antient, just, and well-approved, as any other.

Having already proved, that all the kings we have had since that time, have come in upon the same title; that the Saxon laws to which all have sworn, continue to be of force amongst us, and that the words pronounced four times, on the four sides of the scaffold, by the archbishop, "Will ye have this man to reign?" do testify it; I may spare the pains of a repetition, and justly conclude, that if there was neither force nor fraud, fear nor error, to be pretended by the first, there could be none in those that followed.

But the "observation of this oath may be grievous." If I received money the last year upon bond, promise, or sale of a manor or farm, can it be thought grievous to me to be compelled to repay, or to make over the land according to my agreement? Or if I did not seal the bond till I had the money, must not I perform the condition, or at the least restore what I had received? If it be grievous to any king to preserve the liberties, lives, and estates, of his subjects, and to govern according to their laws, let him resign the crown, and the people to whom the oath was made, will probably release him. Others may possibly be found who will not think it grievous: or if none will accept a crown unless they may do what they please, the people must bear the misfortune of being obliged to govern themselves, or to institute some other sort of magistracy, that will be satisfied with a less exorbitant power. Perhaps they may succeed as well as some others have done, who, without being brought to that necessity, have voluntarily cast themselves into the misery of living without the majestic splendor of a monarch: or, if that fail, they may, as their last refuge, surrender up themselves to slavery. When that is done, we will acknowledge, that whatsoever we have is derived from the favour of our master. But no such thing yet appearing amongst us, we may be pardoned, if we think we are free-men governed by our own laws, and that no man has a power over us, which is not given and regulated by them; nor that any thing but a new law made by ourselves, can exempt our kings from the obligation of performing their oaths taken, to govern according to the old, in the true sense of the words, as they are understood in our language by those who give them, and conducing to the ends for which they are given, which can be no other, than to defend us from all manner of arbitrary power, and to fix a rule to which we are to conform our actions, and from which, according to our deserts, we may expect reward or punishment. And those who by prevarications, cavils, or equivocations, endeavour to dissolve these obligations, do either maliciously betray the cause of kings, by representing them to the world as men, who prefer the satisfaction of their irregular appetites before the performance of their duty, and trample under-foot the most sacred bonds of human society; or from the grossest ignorance do not see, that by teaching nations how little they can rely upon the oaths of their princes, they instruct them as little to observe their own; and that not only, because men are generally inclined to follow the examples of those in power, but from a most certain conclusion, that he, who breaks his part of a contract, cannot without the utmost impudence and folly expect the performance of the other; nothing being more known amongst men, than, that all contracts are of such mutual obligation, that he who fails of his part, discharges the other. If this be so between man and man, it must needs be so between one and many millions of men: if he were free, because he says he is, every man must be free also when he pleases: if a private man, who receives no benefit, or perhaps prejudice, from a contract, be obliged to perform the conditions, much more are kings, who receive the greatest advantages the world can give. As they are not by themselves, nor for themselves, so they are not different in specie from other men: they are born, live, and die, as we all do. The same law of truth and justice is given to all by God and nature; and perhaps I may say, the performance of it is most rigorously exacted from the greatest of men. The liberty of perjury cannot be a privilege annexed to crowns; and it is absurd to think, that the most venerable authority, that can be conferred upon a man, is increased by a liberty to commit, or impunity in committing, such crimes, as are the greatest aggravations of infamy to the basest villains in the world.

* Bonas & approbatas antiquas regni leges, quas sancti & pii reges ejus antecessores, & maxime Edvardus statuit, inviolabiliter observare.

S E C T. XVIII.

The next in blood to deceased kings cannot generally be said to be kings till they are crowned.

IT is hereupon usually objected, that kings do not come in by contract, nor by oath; but are kings by, or according to proximity of blood, before they are crowned. Tho' this be a bold proposition, I will not say, it is universally false. It is impossible, that in some places the rule of succession may be set down so precisely, that, in some cases, every man may be able to see and know the sense, as well as the person designed to be the successor: but before I acknowledge it to be universally true, I must desire to know what this rule of succession is, and from whence it draws its original.

I think I may be excused, if I make these scruples, because I find the thing in dispute to be variously adjudged in several places; and have observed five different manners of disposing crowns esteemed hereditary, besides an infinite number of collateral controversies arising from them, of which we have divers examples; and if there be one universal rule appointed, one of these only can be right, and all the others must be vicious. The first gives the inheritance to the eldest male of the eldest legitimate line, as in France, according to that which they call the salique law. The second, to the eldest legitimate male of the reigning family, as antiently in Spain, according to which the brother of the deceased king has been often, if not always, preferred before the son, if he were elder, as may appear by the dispute between Corbis and Orsua, cited before from Titus Livius; and in the same country, during the reign of the Goths, the eldest male succeeded, whether legitimate or illegitimate. The fourth receives females, or their descendents, without any other condition distinguishing them from males, except that the younger brother is preferred before the elder sister, but the daughter of the elder brother is preferred before the son of the younger. The fifth gives the inheritance to females under a condition, as in Sweden, where they inherit, unless they marry out of the country without the consent of the estates; according to which rule, Charles Gustavus was chosen, as any stranger might have been, tho' son to a sister of Gustavus Adolphus, who by marrying a German prince had forfeited her right. And by the same act of estates, by which her eldest son was chosen, and the crown entailed upon the heirs of his body, her second son, the prince Adolphus, was wholly excluded.

Till these questions are decided by a judge of such an undoubted authority, that all men may safely submit, it is hard for any man, who really seeks the satisfaction of his conscience, to know whether the law of God and nature (tho' he should believe, there is one general law) do justify the custom of the the antient * Medes and Sabeans, mentioned by the poet, who admitted females, or those of France, which totally exclude them as unfit to reign over men, and utterly unable to perform the duty of a supreme magistrate, as we see they are every where excluded from the exercise of all other offices in the commonwealth. If it be said, that we ought to follow the customs of our own country, I answer, that those of our own country deserve to be observed, because they are of our own country: but they are no more to be called the laws of God and nature than those of France or Germany; and tho' I do not believe, that any general law is appointed, I wish I were sure, that our customs in this point were not more repugnant to the light of nature, and prejudicial to ourselves, than those of some other nations. But if I should be so much an Englishman, to think the will of God to have been more particularly revealed to our ancestors, than to any other nation, and that all of them ought to learn from us; yet it would be difficult to decide many questions that may arise. For tho' the parliament, in the 36th of Henry the Sixth, made an act in favour of Richard duke of York, descended from a daughter of Mortimer, who married the daughter of the duke of Clarence, elder brother to John of Gaunt, they rather asserted their own power of giving the crown to whom they pleased, than determined the question. For if they had believed, that the crown had belonged to him by a general and eternal law, they must immediately have rejected Henry as a usurper, and put Richard into the possession of his right, which they did not. And tho' they did something like to this in the cases of Maud the empress, in relation to king Stephen, and her son Henry the Second; and of Henry the Seventh in relation to the house of York, both before he had married a daughter of it, and after her death; they did the contrary in the cases of William the First and Second, Henry the First, Stephen, John, Richard the Third, Henry the Seventh, Mary, Elizabeth, and others. So that, for any thing I can yet find, it is equally difficult to discover the true sense of the law of nature, that should be a guide to my conscience, whether I so far submit to the laws of my country, to think, that England alone has produced men that rightly understand it, or examine the laws and practices of other nations.

Whilst this remains undecided, it is impossible for me to know to whom I owe the obedience that is exacted from me. If I were a Frenchman, I could not tell whether I owed allegiance to the king of Spain, duke of Lorraine, duke of Savoy, or many others descended from daughters of the house of Valois, one of whom ought to inherit, if the inheritance belongs to females; or to the house of Bourbon, whose only title is founded upon the exclusion of them. The like controversies will be in all places; and he that would put mankind upon such inquiries, goes about to subvert all the governments of the world, and arms every man to the destruction of his neighbour.

* — Medis levibusque Sabæis
Imperat hic sexus, reginarumque sub armis
Barbaries pars magna jacet.—Lucan.

We ought to be informed when this right began : if we had the genealogy of every man from Noah, and the crowns of every nation had since his time continued in one line, we were only to inquire into how many kingdoms he appointed the world to be divided, and how well the division we see at this day agrees with the allotment made by him. But mankind having for many ages lain under such a vast confusion, that no man pretends to know his own original, except some Jews, and the princes of the house of Austria, we cannot so easily arrive at the end of our work ; and the Scriptures making no other mention of this part of the world, than what may induce us to think it was given to the sons of Japhet, we have nothing that can lead us to guess how it was to be subdivided, nor to whom the several parcels were given : so that the difficulties are absolutely inextricable ; and tho' it were true, that some one man had a right to every parcel that is known to us, it could be of no use ; for that right must necessarily perish, which no man can prove, nor indeed claim. But as all natural rights by inheritance must be by descent, this descent not being proved, there can be no natural right ; and all rights being either natural, created, or acquired, this right to crowns not being natural, must be created or acquired, or none at all.

There being no general law common to all nations, creating a right to crowns (as has been proved by the several methods used by several nations in the disposal of them, according to which all those that we know are enjoyed), we must seek the right, concerning which we dispute, from the particular constitutions of every nation, or we shall be able to find none.

Acquired rights are obtained, as men say, either by fair means or by foul, that is, by force or by consent : such as are gained by force, may be recovered by force ; and the extent of those that are enjoyed by consent, can only be known by the reasons for which, or the conditions upon which that consent was obtained, that is to say, by the laws of every people. According to these laws it cannot be said, that there is a king in every nation before he is crowned. John Sobietzki, now reigning in Poland, had no relation in blood to the former kings, nor any title till he was chosen. The last king of Sweden acknowledged he had none, but was freely elected ; and the crown being conferred upon him, and the heirs of his body, if the present king dies without issue, the right of electing a successor returns undoubtedly to the estates of the country. The crown of Denmark was elective till it was made hereditary by an act of the general diet, held at Copenhagen in the year 1660 ; and it is impossible, that a right should otherwise accrue to a younger brother of the house of Holstein, which is derived from a younger brother of the counts of Oldenburgh. The Roman empire having passed through the hands of many persons of different nations, no way relating to each other in blood, was by Constantine transferred to Constantinople ; and after many revolutions coming to Theodosius, by birth a Spaniard, was divided between his two sons Arcadius and Honorius. From thence passing to such as could gain most credit with the soldiers, the western empire being brought almost to nothing, was restored by Charles the Great of France ; and, continuing for some time in his descendents, came to the Germans; who, having created several em-perors of the houses of Suevia, Saxony, Bavaria, and others, as they pleased, SECT. 18.

about three hundred years past chose Rodolphus of Austria: and tho', since that time, they have not had any emperor who was not of that family; yet such as were chosen had nothing to recommend them, but the merits of their ancestors, their own personal virtues, or such political considerations as might arise from the power of their hereditary countries, which, being joined with those of the empire, might enable them to make the better defence against the Turks. But, in this line also, they have had little regard to inheritance according to blood; for the elder branch of the family is that which reigns in Spain; and the empire continues in the descendents of Ferdinand, younger brother to Charles the Fifth, tho' so unfixed even to this time, that the present emperor Leopold was in great danger of being rejected.

If it be said, that these are elective kingdoms, and our author speaks of such as are hereditary; I answer, that if what he says be true, there can be no elective kingdom, and every nation has a natural lord, to whom obedience is due. But if some are elective, all might have been so, if they had pleased, unless it can be proved, that God created some under a necessity of subjection, and left to others the enjoyment of their liberty. If this be so, the nations that are born under that necessity may be said to have a natural lord, who has all the power in himself, before he is crowned, or any part conferred on him by the consent of the people; but it cannot extend to others.
And he who pretends a right over any nation upon that account, stands obliged to shew, when and how that nation came to be discriminated by God from others, and deprived of that liberty, which he in goodness had granted to the rest of mankind. I confess, I think there is no such right, and need no better proof, than the various ways of disposing inheritances in several countries, which, not being naturally or universally better or worse one than another, cannot spring from any other root, than the consent of the several nations where they are in force, and their opinions, that such methods were best for them. But if God have made a discrimination of people, he that would thereupon ground a title to the dominion of any one, must prove that nation to be under the curse of slavery; which, for any thing I know, was only denounced against Cham; and it is as hard to determine whether the sense of it be temporal, spiritual, or both, as to tell precisely what nations, by being only descended from him, fall under the penalties threatened.

If these therefore be either intirely false, or impossible to be proved true, there is no discrimination, or not known to us; and every people has a right of disposing of their government, as well as the Polanders, Danes, Swedes, Germans, and such as are or were under the Roman empire. And if any nation has a natural lord before he be admitted by their consent, it must be by a peculiar act of their own; as the crown of France by an act of that nation, which they call the salique law, is made hereditary to males in a direct line, or the nearest to the direct; and others in other places are otherwise disposed.

CHAP. III. I might rest here with full assurance, that no disciple of Filmer can prove this of any people in the world, nor give so much as the shadow of a reason to persuade us there is any such thing in any nation, or at least in those where we are concerned; and presume little regard will be had to what he has said, since he cannot prove of any that which he so boldly affirms of all. But because good men ought to have no other object than truth, which in matters of this importance can never be made too evident, I will venture to go farther, and assert, that as the various ways by which several nations dispose of the succession to their respective crowns, shew they were subject to no other law than their own, which they might have made different, by the same right they made it to be what it is, even those who have the greatest veneration for the reigning families, and the highest regard for proximity of blood, have always preferred the safety of the commonwealth before the concerns of any person or family; and have not only laid aside the nearest in blood, when they were found to be notoriously vicious and wicked, but when they have thought it more convenient to take others: and to prove this I intend to make use of no other examples, than those I find in the histories of Spain, France, and England.

Whilst the Goths governed Spain, not above four persons in the space of three hundred years were the immediate successors of their fathers, but the brother, cousin-german, or some other man of the families of the Balthei or Amalthei, was preferred before the children of the deceased king: and if it be said, this was according to the law of that kingdom, I answer, that it was therefore in the power of that nation to make laws for themselves, and consequently others have the same right. One of their kings called Wamba was deposed, and made a monk, after he had reigned well many years; but falling into a swoon, and his friends thinking him past recovery, cut off his hair, and put a monk's frock upon him, that, according to the superstition of those times, he might die in it; and the cutting off the hair being a most disgraceful thing amongst the Goths, they would not restore him to his authority. Suintila, another of their kings, being deprived of the crown for his ill government, his children and brothers were excluded, and Sisinandus crowned in his room.

Saavedra cor-
ron. Goth.

Mar. hist.
l. vi.

Saaved. cor.
Goth.

This kingdom being not long after overthrown by the Moors, a new one arose from its ashes, in the person of Don Pelayo first king of the Asturias, which, increasing by degrees, at last came to comprehend all Spain, and so continues to this day: but, not troubling myself with all the deviations from the common rule in the collateral lines of Navarre, Arragon, and Portugal, I find that by fifteen several instances in that one series of kings in the Asturias and Leon (who afterwards came to be kings of Castile) it is fully proved, that what respect soever they shewed to the next in blood, who by the law were to succeed, they preferred some other person, as often as the supreme law of "taking care, that the nation might receive no detriment," persuaded them to it.

Don Pelayo enjoyed for his life the kingdom conferred upon him by the Spaniards, who with him retired into the mountains to defend themselves against the

the Moors, and was succeeded by his son Favila. But though Favila left many sons when he died, Alphonso surnamed the Chaste was advanced to the crown, and they all laid aside. Fruela, son to Alphonso the Catholic, was for his cruelty deposed, put to death, and his sons excluded. Aurelio Marian. l. his cousin-german succeeded him; and at his death Silo, who married his wife's sister, was preferred before the males of the blood royal. Alphonso, surnamed el Casto, was first violently dispossessed of the crown by a bastard of the royal family; but he being dead, the nobility and people, thinking Alphonso more fit to be a monk than a king, gave the crown to Bermudo called el Diacono; but Bermudo after several years resigning the kingdom, they conceived a better opinion of Alphonso, and made him king. Alphonso dying without issue, Don Ramiro son to Bermudo was preferred before the nephews of Alphonso. Don Ordonno, fourth from Ramiro, left four legitimate sons; but they being young, the estates laid them aside, and made his brother Fruela king. Fruela had many children; but the same estates gave the crown to Alphonso the Fourth, who was his nephew. Alphonso, turning monk, recommended his son Ordonno to the estates of the kingdom; but they refused him, and made his brother Ramiro king. Ordonno third son to Ramiro, dying, left a son called Bermudo; but the estates took his brother Sancho, and advanced him to the throne. Henry the First, being accidentally killed in his youth, left only two sisters, Blanche married to Lewis, son to Philip August king of France; and Berenguela married to Alphonso king of Leon. The estates made Ferdinand, son of Berenguela the youngest sister, king, excluding Blanche, with her husband and children, for being strangers, and Berenguela herself, because they thought not fit that her husband should have any part in the government. Alphonso el Savio seems to have been a very good prince; but, applying himself more to the study of astrology than to affairs of government, his eldest son Ferdinand de la Cerda dying, and leaving his sons Alphonso and Ferdinand very young, the nobility, clergy, and people, deposed him, excluded his grandchildren, and gave the crown to Don Sancho his younger son surnamed el Bravo, thinking him more fit to command them against the Moors, than an old astrologer, or a child. Alphonso and Sancho being dead, Alphonso el Desheredado laid claim to the crown; but it was given to Ferdinand the Fourth, and Alphonso, with his descendents the dukes de Medina Celi, remain excluded to this day. Peter surnamed the Cruel was twice driven out of the kingdom, and at last killed by Bertrand de Guesclin constable of France, or Henry count of Trastamara his bastard-brother, who was made king without any regard to the daughters of Peter, or to the house of la Cerda. Henry the Fourth left a daughter called Joan, whom he declared his heir; but the estates gave the kingdom to Isabel his sister, and crowned her with Ferdinand of Arragon her husband. Joan daughter to this Ferdinand and Isabel falling mad, the estates committed the care of the government to her father Ferdinand, and after his death to Charles her son.

But the French have taught us, that when a king dies, his next heir is really king before he take his oath, or be crowned. From them we learn, that "le mort

" saisit

CHAP. III. "faist le vif." And yet I know no history that proves more plainly than theirs, that there neither is nor can be in any man, a right to the government of a people, which does not receive its being, manner, and measure, from the law of that country; which I hope to justify by four reasons:

1. When a king of Pharamond's race died, the kingdom was divided into as many parcels as he had sons; which could not have been, if one certain heir had been assigned by nature; for he ought to have had the whole: and if the kingdom might be divided, they who inhabited the several parcels, could not know to whom they owed obedience, till the division was made, unless he who was to be king of Paris, Metz, Soissons, or Orleans, had worn the name of his kingdom upon his forehead. But, in truth, if there might be a division, the doctrine is false, and there was no lord of the whole. This wound will not be healed by saying, The father appointed the division, and that by the law of nature every man may dispose of his own as he thinks fit; for we shall soon prove, that the kingdom of France neither was, nor is, disposeable as a patrimony or chattel. Besides, if that act of kings had been then grounded upon the law of nature, they might do the like at this day. But the law, by which such divisions were made, having been abrogated by the assembly of estates in the time of Hugh Capet, and never practised since, it follows that they were grounded upon a temporary law, and not upon the law of nature, which is eternal. If this were not so, the pretended certainty could not be; for no man could know to whom the last king had bequeathed the whole kingdom, or parcels of it, till the will were opened; and that must be done before such witnesses as may deserve credit in a matter of this importance, and are able to judge whether the bequest be rightly made; for otherwise no man could know, whether the kingdom was to have one lord or many, nor who he or they were to be; which intermission must necessarily subvert their polity, and this doctrine. But the truth is, the most monarchical men among them are so far from acknowledging any such right to be in the king, of alienating, bequeathing, or dividing the kingdom, that they do not allow him the right of making a will; and that of the last king Lewis the Thirteenth touching the regency during the minority of his son was of no effect.
2. This matter was made more clear under the second race. If a lord had been assigned to them by nature, he must have been of the royal family; but Pepin had no other title to the crown except the merits of his father, and his own, approved by the nobility and people who made him king. He had three sons, the eldest was made king of Italy, and, dying before him, left a son called Bernard heir of that kingdom. The estates of France divided what remained between Charles the Great and Carloman. The last of these dying in few years, left many sons; but the nobility made Charles king of all France, and he dispossessed Bernard of the kingdom of Italy inherited from his father: so that he also was not king of the whole, before the expulsion of Bernard the son of his elder brother; nor of Aquitain, which by inheritance should have belonged to the children of his younger brother, any otherwise than by the will of the estates. Lewis the Debonair succeeded upon the same title, was deposed, and put into a monastery by his

Hist. de Fr. en la vie de Hugues Ca-
pet.

Mem. du duc de la Roche-focault.

Paul. Æmyl.
Hist. Franc.

his three sons Lothair, Pepin, and Lewis, whom he had by his first wife. But SECT. 18. though these left many sons, the kingdom came to Charles the Bald. The nobility and people, disliking the eldest son of Charles, gave the kingdom to Lewis le Begue, who had a legitimate son called Charles le Simple; and two bastards, Lewis and Carloman, who were made kings. Carloman had a son called Lewis le Faineant; he was made king, but afterwards deposed for his vicious life. Charles le Gros succeeded him, but for his ill government was also deposed; and Odo, who was a stranger to the royal blood, was made king. The same nobility that had made five kings since Lewis le Begue, now made Charles le Simple king, who, according to his name, was entrapped at Peronne by Ralph duke of Burgundy, and forced to resign his crown, leaving only a son called Lewis, who fled into England. Ralph being dead, they took Lewis surnamed Outremer, and placed him in the throne: he had two sons, Lothair and Charles. Lothair succeeded him, and died without issue. Charles had as fair a title as could be by birth, and the estates confessed it; but their ambassadors told him, that he having by an unworthy life rendered himself unworthy of the crown, they, whose principal care was to have a good prince at the head of them, had chosen Hugh Capet; and the crown continues in his race to this day, though not altogether without interruption. Robert, son to Hugh Capet, succeeded him. He left two sons Robert and Henry; but Henry the younger son appearing to the estates of the kingdom to be more fit to reign than his elder brother, they made him king; Robert, and his descendents, continuing dukes of Burgundy only for about ten generations, at which time his issue male failing, that duchy returned to the crown during the life of king John, who gave it to his second son Philip for an appanage still depending upon the crown. The same province of Burgundy was by the treaty of Madrid granted to the emperor Charles the Fifth, by Francis the First: but the people refused to be alienated, and the estates of the kingdom approved their refusal. By the same authority Charles the Sixth was removed from the government, when he appeared to be mad; and other examples of a like nature may be alledged. From which we may safely conclude, that if the death of one king do really invest the next heir with the right and power, or that he who is so invested, be subject to no law but his own will, all matters relating to that kingdom must have been horribly confused during the reigns of 22 kings of Pharamond's race; they can have had no rightful king from the death of Chilperic to king John: and the succession since that time is very liable to be questioned, if not utterly overthrown by the house of Austria and others, who by the counts of Hapsburg derive their descent from Pharamond, and by the house of Lorrain claiming from Charles, who was excluded by Capet; all which is most absurd, and they who pretend it, bring as much confusion into their own laws, and upon the polity of their own nation, as shame and guilt upon the memory of their ancestors, who, by the most extreme injustice, have rejected their natural lord, or dispossessed those who had been in the most solemn manner placed in the government, and to whom they had generally sworn allegiance.

3. If the next heir be actually king, seized of the power by the death of his predecessor, so that there is no intermission; then all the solemnities, and religious ceremonies, used at the coronations of their kings, with the oaths given and taken, are the most profane abuses of sacred things, in contempt of God and man, that can be imagined, most especially if the act be (as our author calls it) voluntary, and the king, receiving nothing by it, be bound to keep it no longer than he pleases. The prince who is to be sworn, might spare the pains of watching all night in the church, fasting, praying, confessing, communicating, and swearing, "that he will, to the utmost of his power, defend the clergy, maintain the union of the church, obviate all excess, rapine, extortion, and iniquity; take care, that in all judgments justice may be observed, with equity and mercy, &c. or of invoking the assistance of the Holy Ghost for the better performance of his oath;" and without ceremony tell the nobility and people, that he would do what he thought fit. It were to as little purpose for the archbishop of Rheims to take the trouble of saying mass, delivering to him the crown, sceptre, and other ensigns of royalty, explaining what is signified by them, anointing him with the oil which they say was delivered by an angel to St. Remigius, blessing him, and praying to God to bless him, if he rightly performed his oath to God and the people, and denouncing the contrary in case of failure on his part, if these things conferred nothing upon him but what he had before, and were of no obligation to him. Such ludifications of the most sacred things are too odious and impious to be imputed to nations that have any virtue, or profess christianity. This cannot fall upon the French and Spaniards, who had certainly a great zeal to religion, whatever it was; and were so eminent for moral virtues as to be a reproach to us, who live in an age of more knowledge. But their meaning is so well declared by their most solemn acts, that none but those who are wilfully ignorant can mistake. One of the councils held at Toledo declared by the clergy, nobility, and others assisting, "that no man should be placed in the royal seat till he had sworn to preserve the church," &c.

Concil. Tolet 6. Another held in the same place signified to Sisinandus, who was then newly crowned, "that if he, or any of his successors, should, contrary to their oaths, and the laws of their country, proudly and cruelly presume to exercise domination over them, he should be excommunicated, and separated from Christ and them to eternal judgment." The French laws, and their best writers, asserting the same things, are confirmed by perpetual practice. Henry of Navarre, tho' certainly, according to their rules, and in their esteem, a most accomplished prince, was by two general assemblies of the estates held at Blois, deprived of the succession for being a protestant; and notwithstanding the greatness of his reputation, valour, victories, and affability, could never be admitted till he had made himself capable of the ceremonies of his coronation, by conforming to the religion which by the oath he was to defend. Nay this present king, though haughty enough by nature, and elevated by many successes, has acknowledged, as he says, with joy, joy, that he can do nothing contrary to law, and calls it a happy impotence; SECT. 18.

HM. Thuan. let 4.

 in pursuance of which, he has annulled many acts of his father and grandfather, alienating the demesnes of the crowns, as things contrary to law, and not within their power.

These things being confirmed by all the good authors of that nation, Filmer finds only the worst to be fit for his turn; and neither minding law nor history, takes his maxims from a vile flattering discourse of Bellay, calculated for the personal interest of Henry the Fourth then king of Navarre, in which he says, "That the heir apparent, tho' furious, mad, a fool, vicious, and in all respects abominably wicked, must be admitted to the crown." But Bellay was so far from attaining the ends designed by his book, that by such doctrines, which filled all men with horror, he brought great prejudice to his master, and procured little favour from Henry, who desired rather to recommend himself to his people, as the best man they could set up, than to impose a necessity upon them of taking him, if he had been the worst. But our author, not contented with what this sycophant says, in relation to such princes as are placed in the government by a law establishing the succession by inheritance, with an impudence peculiar to himself, asserts the same right to be in any man, who by any means gets into power; and imposes the same necessity of obedience upon the subject where there is no law, as Bellay does by virtue of one that is established.

4. In the last place: As Bellay acknowledges, that the right belongs to princes only, where it is established by law, I deny that there is, was, or ever can be, any such. No people is known to have been so mad or wicked as by their own consent, for their own good, and for the obtaining of justice, to give the power to beasts, under whom it could never be obtained: or if we could believe, that any had been guilty of an act so full of folly, turpitude, and wickedness, it could not have the force of a law, and could never be put in execution; for though the rules, by which the proximity should be judged, be never so precise, it will still be doubted whose case suits best with them. Though the law in some places gives private inheritances to the next heir, and in others makes allotments according to several proportions, no one knows to whom, or how far, the benefit shall accrue to any man, till it be adjudged by a power to which the parties must submit. Contests will in the like manner arise concerning successions to crowns, how exactly soever they be disposed by law: for though every one will say, that the next ought to succeed, yet no man knows who is the next; which is too much verified by the bloody decisions of such disputes in many parts of the world: and he that says, the next in blood is actually king, makes all questions thereupon arising impossible to be otherwise determined, than by the sword; the pretender to the right being placed above the judgment of man, and the subjects (for any thing I know) obliged to believe, serve, and obey him, if he says he has it. For otherwise, if either every man in particular, or all together, have a right of judging his title, it can be of no value till it be adjudged.

CHAP. III. I confess, that the law of France, by the utter exclusion of females, and their descendents, does obviate many dangerous and inextricable difficulties; but others remain, which are sufficient to subvert all the polity of that kingdom, if there be not a power of judging them; and there can be none if it be true, that "le mort saisit le vif." Not to trouble myself with feigned cases, that of legitimation alone will suffice. It is not enough to say, that the children born under marriage are to be reputed legitimate; for not only several children born of Joan daughter to the king of Portugal, wife to Henry the Fourth of Castile, during the time of their marriage, were utterly rejected, as begotten in adultery, but also her daughter Joan, whom the king during his life, and at the hour of his death, acknowledged to have been begotten by him; and the only title that Isabel, who was married to Ferdinand of Arragon, had to the crown of Spain, was derived from their rejection. It would be tedious, and might give offence to many great persons, if I should relate all the dubious cases, that have been, or still remain in the world, touching matters of this nature: but the lawyers of all nations will testify, that hardly any one point comes before them, which affords a greater number of difficult cases, than that of marriages, and the legitimation of children upon them; and nations must be involved in the most inextricable difficulties, if there be not a power somewhere to decide them; which cannot be, if there be no intermission, and that the next in blood (that is, he who says he is the next) be immediately invested with the right and power. But surely no people has been so careless of their most important concerns, to leave them in such uncertainty, and simply to depend upon the humour of a man, or the faith of women, who, besides their other frailties, have been often accused of supposititious births: and mens passions are known to be so violent in relation to women they love or hate, that none can safely be trusted with those judgments. The virtue of the best would be exposed to a temptation, that flesh and blood can hardly resist; and such as are less perfect would follow no other rule than the blind impulse of the passion, that for the present reigns in them. There must therefore be a judge of such disputes as may in these cases arise in every kingdom; and though it is not my business to determine, who is that judge in all places, yet I may justly say, that in England it is the parliament. If no inferior authority could debar Ignotus son to the lady Rosse, born under the protection, from the inheritance of a private family, none can certainly assume a power of disposing of the crown upon any occasion. No authority, but that of the parliament, could legitimate the children of Catharine Swinford, with a proviso, not to extend to the inheritance of the crown. Others might say, if they were lawfully begotten, they ought to inherit every thing; and nothing, if they were not: but the parliament knew how to limit a particular favour, and prevent it from extending to a public mischief. Henry the Eighth took an expeditious way of obviating part of the controversies, that might arise from the multitude of his wives, by cutting off the heads of some, as soon as he was weary of them, or had a mind to take another; but having been hindered from dealing in the same manner with Catherine, by the greatness of her birth and kindred, he left left such as the parliament only could resolve. And no less power would SECT. 19.

 ever have thought of making Mary and Elizabeth capable of the succession, ~~~~~ when, according to ordinary rules, one of them must have been a bastard; and it had been absurd to say, that both of them were, immediately upon the death of their predecessors, possessed of the crown, if an act of parliament had not conferred the right upon them, which they could not have by birth. But the kings and princes of England have not been of a temper different from those of other nations: and many examples may be brought of the like occasions of dispute happening every-where; and the like will probably be for ever; which must necessarily introduce the most mischievous confusions, and expose the titles, which (as is pretended) are to be esteemed most sacred, to be overthrown by violence and fraud, if there be not in all places a power of deciding the controversies that arise from the uncertainty of titles, according to the respective laws of every nation, upon which they are grounded: no man can be thought to have a just title, till it be so adjudged by that power: this judgment is the first step to the throne: the oath taken by the king obliges him to observe the laws of his country; and that concerning the succession being one of the principal, he is obliged to keep that part as well as any other.

S E C T. XIX.

The greatest enemy of a just magistrate is he who endeavours to invalidate the contract between him and the people, or to corrupt their manners.

IT is not only from religion, but from the law of nature that we learn the necessity of standing to the agreements we make; and he who departs from the principle written in the hearts of men, "pactis standum," seems to degenerate into a beast. Such as had virtue, though without true religion, could tell us (as a brave and excellent Grecian did), that it was not necessary for him to live, but it was necessary to preserve his heart from deceit, and his tongue from falsehood. The Roman satirist carries the same notion to a great height, and affirms, that * "though the worst of tyrants should "command a man to be false and perjured, and back his injunction with "the utmost of torments, he ought to prefer his integrity before his life."
 And though Filmer may be excused if he often mistake in matters of theology;
 yet his inclinations to Rome, which he prefers before Geneva, might have led him to the principles in which the honest Romans lived, if he had not observed, that such principles as make men honest and generous, do also make them lovers of liberty, and constant in the defence of their country;

X x 2

* ——— Phalaris licet imperet, ut sis
 Falsus, & admoto dicet perjuriam tauro, Summum crede nefas animam præferre pudori. Juvenal.

CHAP. III. try; which favouring too much of a republican spirit, he prefers the morals of that city, since they are become more refined by the pious and charitable Jesuits, before those that were remarkable in them, as long as they retained any shadow of their antient integrity, which admitted of no equivocations, and detested prevarications; by that means preserving innocence in the hearts of private men, for their inward contentment, and in civil societies, for the public good; which if once extinguished, mankind must necessarily fall into the condition Hobbes rightly calls "bellum omnium contra omnes," wherein no man can promise to himself any other wife, children, or goods, than he can procure by his own sword.

Some may perhaps think, that the endeavours of our author to introduce such accursed principles, as tend to the ruin of mankind, proceed from his ignorance. But though he appears to have had a great measure of that quality, I fear the evil proceeds from a deeper root; and that he attempts to promote the interests of ill magistrates, who make it their business to destroy all good principles in the people, with as much industry as the good endeavour to preserve them where they are, and teach them where they are wanting. Reason and experience instruct us, that every man acts according to the end he proposes to himself. The good magistrate seeks the good of the people committed to his care, that he may perform the end of his institution: and knowing that chiefly to consist in justice and virtue, he endeavours to plant and propagate them; and by doing this he procures his own good as well as that of the public. He knows there is no safety where there is no strength, no strength without union, no union without justice; no justice where faith and truth, in accomplishing public and private contracts, is wanting. This he perpetually inculcates, and thinks it a great part of his duty, by precept and example, to educate the youth in a love of virtue and truth, that they may be seasoned with them, and filled with an abhorrence of vice and falsehood, before they attain that age which is exposed to the most violent temptations, and in which they may, by their crimes, bring the greatest mischiefs upon the public. He would do all this, though it were to his own prejudice. But as good actions always carry a reward with them, these contribute in a high measure to his advantage. By preferring the interest of the people before his own, he gains their affection, and all that is in their power comes with it; whilst he unites them to one another, he unites all to himself: in leading them to virtue, he increases their strength, and by that means provides for his own safety, glory, and power.

On the other side, such as seek different ends must take different ways. When a magistrate fancies he is not made for the people, but the people for him; that he does not govern for them, but for himself; and that the people live only to increase his glory, or furnish matter for his pleasures; he does not inquire what he may do for them, but what he may draw from them. By this means he sets up an interest of profit, pleasure, or pomp, in himself, repugnant to the good of the public, for which he is made to be what he is. These contrary ends certainly divide the nation into parties; and whilst every one endeavours to advance that to which he is addicted, occasions of hatred for injuries every day done, or thought to be done, and received, must necessarily arise. This creates a most fierce and irreconcilable enmity, because the occasions are frequent, important, and universal, and the causes thought to be most just. The people think it the greatest of all crimes, to convert that power to their hurt, which was instituted for their good; and that the injustice is aggravated by perjury and ingratitude, which comprehend all manner of ill; and the magistrate gives the name of sedition or rebellion to whatsoever they do for the preservation of themselves, and their own rights. When mens spirits are thus prepared, a small matter sets them on fire; but if no accident happen to blow them into a flame, the course of justice is certainly interrupted, the public affairs are neglected; and when any occasion, whether foreign or domestic, arises, in which the magistrate stands in need of the people's assistance, they, whose affections are alienated, not only shew an unwillingness to serve him with their persons and estates, but fear that by delivering him from his distress, they strengthen their enemy, and enable him to oppress them: and he, fancying his will to be unjustly opposed, or his due more unjustly denied, is filled with a dislike of what he sees, and a fear of worse for the future. Whilst he endeavours to ease himself of the one, and to provide against the other, he usually increases the evils of both, and jealousies are on both sides multiplied. Every man knows, that the governed are in a great measure under the power of the governor; but as no man, or number of men, is willingly subject to those who seek their ruin, such as fall into so great a misfortune, continue no longer under it than force, fear, or necessity, may be able to oblige them. But as such a necessity can hardly lie longer upon a great people, than till the evil be fully discovered and comprehended, and their virtue, strength, and power, be united to expel it; the ill magistrate looks upon all things, that may conduce to that end, as so many preparatives to his ruin; and by the help of those, who are of his party, will endeavour to prevent that union, and diminish that strength, virtue, power, and courage, which he knows to be bent against him. And as truth, faithful dealing, due performance of contracts, and integrity of manners, are bonds of union, and helps to good, he will always by tricks, artifices, cavils, and all means possible, endeavour to establish falshood and dishonesty; whilst other emissaries and instruments of iniquity, by corrupting the youth, and seducing such as can be brought to lewdness and debauchery, bring the people to such a pass, that they may neither care nor dare to vindicate their rights, and that those who would do it, may so far suspect each other, as not to confer upon, much less to join in, any action tending to the public deliverance.

This distinguishes the good from the bad magistrate, the faithful from the unfaithful; and those who adhere to either, living in the same principle, must walk in the same ways. They who uphold the rightful power of a just magistracy, encourage virtue and justice; teach men what they ought to do, suffer, or expect from others; fix them upon principles of honesty; and generally advance every thing that tends to the increase of the valour, strength, greatness,

CHAP. III. greatness, and happiness of the nation, creating a good union among them, and bringing every man to an exact understanding of his own and the public rights. On the other side, he that would introduce an ill magistrate, make one evil who was good, or preserve him in the exercise of injustice when he is corrupted, must always open the way for him by vitiating the people, corrupting their manners, destroying the validity of oaths and contracts, teaching such evasions, equivocations, and frauds, as are inconsistent with the thoughts, that become men of virtue and courage; and overthrowing the confidence they ought to have in each other, make it impossible for them to unite among themselves. The like arts must be used with the magistrate: he cannot be for their turn, till he is persuaded to believe he has no dependence upon, and owes no duty to the people; that he is of himself, and not by their institution; that no man ought to inquire into, nor be judge of his actions; that all obedience is due to him, whether he be good or bad, wise or foolish, a father or an enemy to his country. This being calculated for his personal interest, he must pursue the same designs, or his kingdom is divided within itself, and cannot subsist. By this means those who flatter his humour, come to be accounted his friends, and the only men that are thought worthy of great trusts, whilst such as are of another mind are exposed to all persecution. These are always such as excel in virtue, wisdom, and greatness of spirit: they have eyes, and they will always see the way they go; and, leaving fools to be guided by implicit faith, will distinguish between good and evil, and chuse that which is best; they will judge of men by their actions, and by them discovering whose servant every man is, know whether he is to be obeyed or not. Those who are ignorant of all good, careless, or enemies to it, take a more compendious way; their slavish, vitious, and base natures, inclining them to seek only private and present advantages, they easily slide into a blind dependence upon one, who has wealth and power; and, desiring only to know his will, care not what injustice they do, if they may be rewarded. They worship what they find in the temple, tho' it be the vilest of idols; and always like that best which is worst, because it agrees with their inclinations and principles. When a party comes to be erected upon such a foundation, debauchery, lewdness, and dishonesty, are the true badges of it. Such as wear them are cherished; but the principal marks of favour are reserved for those, who are the most industrious in mischief, either by seducing the people with the allurements of sensual pleasures, or corrupting their understandings by false and slavish doctrines. By this means, a man who calls himself a philosopher, or a divine, is often more useful than a great number of tapsters, cooks, buffoons, players, fiddlers, whores, or bawds. These are the devil's ministers of a lower order; they seduce single persons; and such as fall into their snares, are for the most part men of the simpler sort: but the principal supporters of his kingdom are they, who by false doctrines poison the springs of religion and virtue, and by preaching or writing (if their falshood and wickedness were not detected) would extinguish all principles of common honesty, and bring whole nations to be best satisfied tified with themselves, when their actions are most abominable. And as SECT. 20.

 the means must always be suitable to the end proposed, the governments that are to be established or supported by such ways must needs be the worst of all, and comprehend all manner of evil.

S E C T. XX.

Unjust commands are not to be obeyed; and no man is obliged to suffer for not obeying such as are against law.

IN the next place our author gravely proposes a question, "Whether it be " a sin to disobey the king, if he command any thing contrary to law?"
 and as gravely determines, "that not only in human laws, but even in di" vine, a thing may be commanded contrary to law, and yet obedience to " such a command is necessary. The sanctifying of the sabbath is a divine
 " law, yet if a master command his servant not to go to church upon a " sabbath-day, the best divines teach us, the servant must obey, &c. It is " not fit to tie the master to acquaint the servant with his secret counsel."
 Tho' he frequently contradicts in one line what he says in another, this whole clause is uniform, and suitable to the main design of his book. He sets up the authority of man in opposition to the command of God, gives it the preference, and says, the best divines instruct us so to do. St. Paul then must have been one of the worst, for he knew, that the powers under which he lived, had, under the severest penalties, forbidden the publication of the gospel; and yet he says, "Woe to me if I preach it not." St. Peter was no better than he, for he tells us, "That it is better to obey God than man:"
 and they could not speak otherwise, unless they had forgotten the words of their Master, who told them, "They should not fear them, that could only " kill the body, but him who could kill, and cast into hell." And if I must not fear him, that can only kill the body, not only the reason, but all excuse for obeying him, is taken away.

To prove what he says, he cites a pertinent example from St. Luke, and Chap. xiv.
 very logically concludes, that because Christ reprov'd the hypocrisy of the Pharisees (who generally adhered to the external and circumstantial part of the law, neglecting the essential, and taking upon themselves to be the interpreters of that which they did not understand) the law of God is not to be obeyed: and as strongly proves, that because Christ shewed them, that the same law, which, by their own confession, permitted them to pull an ass out of a pit on the sabbath-day, could not but give a liberty of healing the sick, therefore the commands of kings are to be obeyed, though they should be contrary to human and divine laws. But if perverseness had not blinded him, he might have seen, that this very text is wholly against his purpose; for the magistratical power was on the side of the Pharisees, otherwise they would not have sought an occasion to ensnare him; and that power having perverted

CHAP. III. perverted the law of God by false glosses, and a superinduction of human traditions, prohibited the most necessary acts of charity to be done on the sabbath-day, which Christ reproved, and restored the sick man to his health in their sight.

But I could wish our author had told us the names of those divines, who, he says, are the best, and who pretend to teach us these fine things. I know some who are thought good, that are of a contrary opinion, and say, that God having required that day to be set apart for his service and worship, man cannot dispense with the obligation, unless he can abrogate the law of God. Perhaps, for want of other arguments to prove the contrary, I may be told, that this favours too much of puritanism and calvinism. But I shall take the reproach, till some better patrons than Laud, and his creatures, may be found for the other opinion. By the advice and instigation of these men, from about the year 1630, to 1640, sports and revelings, which ended, for the most part, in drunkenness and lewdness, were not only permitted on that day, but enjoined. And tho' this did advance human authority in derogation to the divine, to a degree that may please such as are of our author's mind; yet others, resolving rather to obey the laws of God than the commands of men, could not be brought to pass the Lord's day in that manner. Since that time no man, except Filmer and Heylin, has been so wicked to conceive, or so impudent to assert, such brutal absurdities. But leaving the farther consideration of the original of this abuse, I desire to know, whether the authority given to masters to command things contrary to the law of God, be peculiar in relation to the sabbath, or to a few other points, or ought generally to extend to all God's laws; and whether he who may command his servant to act contrary to the law of God, have not a right in himself of doing the same. If peculiar, some authority or precept must be produced, by which it may appear, that God has slighted his ordinance concerning that day, and suffered it to be contemned, whilst he exacts obedience to all others. If we have a liberty left to us of slighting others also, more or less in number, we ought to know how many, what they are, and how it comes to pass, that some are of obligation, and others not. If the empire of the world is not only divided between God and Cæsar, but every man also who can give five pounds a year to a servant, has so great a part in it, that, in some cases, his commands are to be obeyed preferably to those of God, it were fit to know the limits of each kingdom, lest we happen preposterously to obey man, when we ought to obey God, or God, when we are to follow the commands of men. If it be general, the law of God is of no effect, and we may safely put an end to all thoughts and discourses of religion: the word of God is nothing to us: we are not to inquire what he has commanded, but what pleases our master, how insolent, foolish, vile, or wicked, soever he may be. The apostles and prophets, who died for preferring the commands of God before those of men, fell like fools, and perished in their sins. But if every particular man that has a servant, can exempt him from the commands of God, he may also exempt himself, and the laws of God are at once abrogated throughout the world.

It

It is a folly to say there is a passive, as well as an active obedience, and SECT. 20.
 that he who will not do what his master commands, ought to suffer the punishment he inflicts: for, if the master has a right of commanding, there is a duty incumbent on the servant of obeying. He that suffers for not doing that which he ought to do, draws upon himself both the guilt and the punishment. But no one can be obliged to suffer for that which he ought not to do, because he who pretends to command, has not so far an authority. However, our question is, whether the servant should forbear to do that which God commands, rather than whether the master should put away or beat him, if he do not: for if the servant ought to obey his master rather than God, as our author says the best divines assert, he sins in disobeying, and that guilt cannot be expiated by his suffering. If it be thought I carry this point to an undue extremity, the limits ought to be demonstrated, by which it may appear that I exceed them, tho' the nature of the case cannot be altered: for if the law of God may not be abrogated by the commands of men, a servant cannot be exempted from keeping the sabbath according to the ordinance of God, at the will of his master. But if a power be given to man at his pleasure to annul the laws of God, the apostles ought not to have preached, when they were forbidden by the powers to which they were subject: the tortures and deaths they suffered for not obeying that command were in their own wrong, and their blood was upon their own heads.

His second instance concerning wars, in which he says the subject is not to examine whether they are just or unjust, but must obey, is weak and frivolous, and very often false; whereas consequences can rightly be drawn from such things only as are certainly and universally true. Tho' God may be merciful to a soldier, who by the wickedness of a magistrate, whom he honestly trusts, is made a minister of injustice, it is nothing to this case. For, if our author say true, that the word of a king can justify him in going against the command of God, he must do what is commanded, tho' he think it evil: the christian soldiers under the pagan emperors were obliged to destroy their brethren, and the best men in the world, for being so: such as now live under the Turk have the same obligation upon them of defending their master, and slaughtering those he repotes his enemies for adhering to christianity: and the king of France may, when he pleases, arm one part of his protestant subjects to the destruction of the other; which is a godly doctrine, and worthy our author's invention.

But, if this be so, I know not how the Israelites can be said to have sinned in following the examples of Jeroboam, Omri, Ahab, or other wicked kings: they could not have sinned in obeying, if it had been a sin to disobey their commands; and God would not have punished them so severely, if they had not sinned. It is impertinent to say they were obliged to serve their kings in unjust wars, but not to serve idols; for tho' God be jealous of his glory, yet he forbids rapine and murder as well as idolatry. If there be a law that forbids the subject to examine the commands tending to the one, it cannot but injoin obedience to the other. The same authority which justifies murder, CHAP. III. murder, takes away the guilt of idolatry ; and the wretches, both judges and witnesses, who put Naboth to death, could as little alledge ignorance, as those that worshiped Jeroboam's calves ; the same light of nature by which they should have known, that a ridiculous image was not to be adored as God, instructing them also, that an innocent man ought not, under pretence of law, to be murdered by perjury.

S E C T. XXI.

It cannot be for the good of the people, that the magistrate have a power above the law : and he is not a magistrate, who has not his power by law.

THAT we may not be displeased, or think it dangerous and slavish to depend upon the will of a man, which perhaps may be irregular or extravagant in one who is subject to no law, our author very dexterously removes the scruples by telling us,

1. " That the prerogative of the king to be above the law, is only for the good of them that are under the law, and to preserve their liberties.
2. " That there can be no laws without a supreme power to command or make them : in aristocracies the noblemen are above the law ; in democracies the people : by the like reason, in a monarchy, the king must of necessity be above the law. There can be no sovereign majesty in him that is under the law : that which gives the very being to a king, is the power to give laws. Without this power he is but an equivocal king. It skills not how he comes by this power, whether by election, donation, succession, or any other means." I am contented in some degree to follow our author, and to acknowledge, that the king neither has, nor can have, any prerogative which is not for the good of the people, and the preservation of their liberties. This therefore is the foundation of magistratical power, and the only way of discerning whether the prerogative of making laws, of being above laws, or any other he may pretend, be justly due to him or not : and if it be doubted who is the fittest judge to determine that question, common sense will inform us, that if the magistrate receive his power by election or donation, they who elect, or give him that power, best know whether the good they sought be performed or not ; if by succession, they who instituted the succession ; if otherwise, that is, by fraud or violence, the point is decided ; for he has no right at all, and none can be created by those means. This might be said, tho' all the princes were of ripe age, sober, wise, just, and good ; for even the best are subject to mistakes and passions, and therefore unfit to be judges of their own concerns, in which they may by various means be misguided : but it would be extreme madness to attribute the same to children, fools, or madmen, who are not able to judge of the least things concerning themselves or others ; but most especially to those who, coming in by usurpation, declare their contempt of all human and divine laws, and are enemies to the people SECT. 21. they oppress. None therefore can be judges of such cases but the people, for whom and by whom the constitutions are made; or their representatives and delegates, to whom they give the power of doing it.

But nothing can be more absurd than to say, that one man has an absolute power above law to govern according to his will, "for the people's good, and the preservation of their liberty:" for no liberty can subsist where there is such a power; and we have no other way of distinguishing between free nations, and such as are not so, than that the free are governed by their own laws and magistrates, according to their own mind, and that the others either have willingly subjected themselves, or are by force brought under the power of one or more men, to be ruled according to his or their pleasure. The same distinction holds in relation to particular persons. He is a free man who lives as best pleases himself, under laws made by his own consent; and the name of slave can belong to no man, unless to him who is either born in the house of a master, bought, taken, subdued, or willingly gives his ear to be nailed to the post, and subjects himself to the will of another. Thus were the Grecians said to be free, in opposition to the Medes and Persians, as Artabanus acknowledged in his discourse to Themistocles. Plut. vit. Themist. In the same manner the Italians, Germans, and Spaniards, were distinguished from the eastern nations, who, for the most part, were under the power of tyrants. Rome was said to have recovered liberty by the expulsion of the Tarquins; or as Tacitus expresses it, "* Lucius Brutus established liberty and the consulate together," as if before that time they had never enjoyed any; and Julius Cæsar is said to have overthrown the liberty of that people. But if Filmer deserve credit, the Romans were free under Tarquin, enslaved when he was driven away, and his prerogative extinguished, that was so necessarily required for the defence of their liberty; and were never restored to it, till Cæsar assumed all the power to himself. By the same rule the Switzers, Grisons, Venetians, Hollanders, and some other nations, are now slaves; and Tuscany, the kingdom of Naples, the ecclesiastical state, with such as live under a more gentle master on the other side of the water, I mean the Turk, are free nations. Nay, the Florentines, who complain of slavery under the house of Medices, were made free by the power of a Spanish army, who set up a prerogative in that gentle family, which for their good has destroyed all that could justly be called so in that country, and almost wholly dispeopled it. I, who esteem myself free, because I depend upon the will of no man, and hope to die in the liberty I inherit from my ancestors, am a slave; and the Moors or Turks, who may be beaten and killed whenever it pleases their insolent masters, are free men. But surely the world is not so much mistaken in the signification of words and things. The weight of chains, number of stripes, hardness of labour, and other effects of a master's cruelty, may make one servitude more miserable than another: but he is a slave who serves the best and gentlest man in the world, as well as he who serves the worst; and he does serve him, if * Libertatem & consulatum L. Brutus instituit. An. l. i.

Y y 2

CHAP. III. if he must obey his commands, and depends upon his will. For this reason the poet ingeniously flattering a good emperor, said, that liberty was not more desirable, than to serve a gentle master; but still acknowledged, that it was a service, distinct from, and contrary to liberty: and it had not been a handsome compliment, unless the evil of servitude were so extreme, that nothing but the virtue and goodness of the master could any way compensate or alleviate it. Now, tho' it should be granted, that he had spoken more like to a philosopher than a poet; that we might take his words in the strictest sense, and think it possible to find such conveniences in a subjection to the will of a good and wise master, as may balance the loss of liberty, it would be nothing to the question; because that liberty is thereby acknowledged to be destroyed by the prerogative, which is only instituted to preserve it. If it were true, that no liberty were to be preferred before the service of a good master, it could be of no use to the perishing world, which Filmer, and his disciples, would, by such arguments, bring into a subjection to children, fools, mad, or vicious men. These are not cases feigned upon a distant imaginary possibility, but so frequently found amongst men, that there are few examples of the contrary. And as it is folly to suppose, that princes will always be wise, just, and good, when we know, that few have been able alone to bear the weight of a government, or to resist the temptations to ill, that accompany an unlimited power, it would be madness to presume they will for the future be free from infirmities and vices. And if they be not, the nations under them will not be in such a condition of servitude to a good master as the poet compares to liberty, but in a miserable and shameful subjection to the will of those who know not how to govern themselves, or to do good to others: Tho' Moses, Joshua, and Samuel, had been able to bear the weight of an unrestrained power; tho' David and Solomon had never abused that which they had; what effect could this have upon a general proposition? Where are the families that always produce such as they were? When did God promise to assist all those who should attain to the sovereign power, as he did them whom he chose for the works he designed? Or what testimony can Filmer give us, that he has been present with all those who have hitherto reigned in the world? But if we know, that no such thing either is, or has been; and can find no promise to assure us, nor reason to hope, that it ever will be, it is as foolish to found the hopes of preserving a people upon that which never was, or is so likely to fail, nay rather which in a short time most certainly will fail, as to root up vines and fig-trees, in expectation of gathering grapes and figs from thistles and briars. This would be no less than to extinguish the light of common sense, to neglect the means that God has given us to provide for our security, and to impute to him a disposition of things utterly inconsistent with his wisdom and goodness. If he has not therefore ordered, that thorns and thistles should produce figs and grapes, nor that the most important works in the world, which are not without the utmost difficulty, if at all, to be performed by the best and wisest of men, should be put into the hands of the weakest, most foolish, and worst, he cannot have ordained, that such men, women, or children, as happen to be born in reigning families, or get the power into their hands, by SECT. 21.

 fraud, treachery, or murder (as very many have done), should have a right of disposing all things according to their will. And if men cannot be guilty of so great an absurdity to trust the weakest and worst with a power which usually subverts the wisdom and virtue of the best; or to expect such effects of virtue and wisdom from those who come by chance, as can hardly, if at all, be hoped from the most excellent, our author's proposition can neither be grounded upon the ordinance of God, nor the institution of man. Nay, if any such thing had been established by our first parents in their simplicity, the utter impossibility of attaining what they expected from it, must wholly have abrogated the establishment: or rather, it had been void from the beginning, because it was not “* a just sanction, commanding “ things good, and forbidding the contrary,” but a foolish and perverse sanction, setting up the unruly appetite of one person to the subversion of all that is good in the world, by making the wisdom of the aged and experienced to depend upon the will of women, children, and fools; by sending the strong and the brave to seek protection from the most weak and cowardly, and subjecting the most virtuous and best of men to be destroyed by the most wicked and vicious. These being the effects of that unlimited prerogative, which, our author says, was only instituted for the good and defence of the people, it must necessarily fall to the ground, unless slavery, misery, infamy, destruction, and desolation, tend to the preservation of liberty, and are to be preferred before strength, glory, plenty, security, and happiness. The state of the Roman empire after the usurpation of Cæsar will set this matter in the clearest light; but having done it already in the former parts of this work, I content myself to refer to those places. And tho' the calamities they suffered were a little allayed and moderated by the virtues of Antoninus and M. Aurelius, with one or two more, yet “ we have no example” of the continuance of them in a family, nor “ of any nation, great or small, that has been under “ an absolute power, which does not too plainly manifest, that no man, or “ succession of men, is to be trusted with it.”

But, says our author, “ there can be no law where there is not a supreme “ power;” and from thence very strongly concludes it must be in the king; for “ otherwise there can be no sovereign majesty in him, and he is but an “ equivocal king.” This might have been of some force, if governments were established, and laws made, only to advance that sovereign majesty; but nothing at all to the purpose, if (as he confesses) the power which the prince has, be given for the good of the people, and for the defence of every private man's life, liberty, lands, and goods; for that which is instituted, cannot be abrogated for want of that which was never intended in the institution. If the public safety be provided, liberty and propriety secured, justice administered, virtue encouraged, vice suppressed, and the true interest of the nation advanced, the ends of government are accomplished; and the highest must be contented with such a proportion of glory and majesty as is consistent with the public; since the magistracy is not instituted, nor any person placed

* Sanctio recta, jubens honesta, prohibens contraria. Cicero.

CHAP. III. placed in it, for the increase of his majesty, but for the preservation of the whole people, and the defence of the liberty, life, and estate, of every private man, as our author himself is forced to acknowledge.

But what is this sovereign majesty, so inseparable from royalty, that one cannot subsist without the other? Caligula placed it in a power of * doing what he pleased to all men: Nimrod, Nabuchodonosor, and others, with an impious and barbarous insolence boasted of the greatness of their power. They thought it a glorious privilege to kill or spare whom they pleased. But such kings as by God's permission might have been set up over his people, were to have nothing of this. They were not to multiply gold, silver, wives, or horses; they were not to govern by their own will, but according to the law; from which they might not recede, nor raise their hearts above their brethren. Here were kings without that unlimited power, which makes up the sovereign majesty, that Filmer affirms to be so essential to kings, that without it they are only equivocal; which proving nothing but the incurable perverseness of his judgment, the malice of his heart, or malignity of his fate, always to oppose reason and truth, we are to esteem those to be kings who are described to be so by the Scriptures, and to give another name to those who endeavour to advance their own glory, contrary to the precept of God, and the interest of mankind.

But unless the light of reason had been extinguished in him, he might have seen, that tho' no law could be made without a supreme power, that supremacy may be in a body consisting of many men, and several orders of men. If it be true, which perhaps may be doubted, that there have been in the world simple monarchies, aristocracies, or democracies, legally established, it is certain, that the most part of the governments of the world (and I think all that are or have been good) were mixed. Part of the power has been conferred upon the king, or the magistrate that represented him, and part upon the senate and people, as has been proved in relation to the governments of the Hebrews, Spartans, Romans, Venetians, Germans, and all those who live under that which is usually called the Gothic polity. If the single person participating of this divided power dislike either the name he bears, or the authority he has, he may renounce it; but no reason can be from thence drawn to the prejudice of nations, who give so much as they think consistent with their own good, and reserve the rest to themselves, or to such other officers as they please to establish.

No man will deny, that several nations have had a right of giving power to consuls, dictators, archons, suffetes, dukes, and other magistrates, in such proportions as seemed most conducing to their own good; and there must be a right in every nation of allotting to kings so much as they please, as well as to the others, unless there be a charm in the word king, or in the letters that compose it. But this cannot be; for there is no similitude between "king," "rex," and "basileus:" they must therefore have a right of regulating the power of kings, as well as that of consuls or dictators; and it had not been more more ridiculous in Fabius, Scipio, Camillus, or Cincinnatus, to assert an absolute power in himself, under pretence of advancing his sovereign majesty against the law, than for any king to do the like. But as all nations give what form they please to their government, they are also judges of the name to be imposed upon each man who is to have a part in the power: and it is as lawful for us to call him king, who has a limited authority amongst us, as for the Medes or Arabs to give the same name to one who is more absolute. If this be not admitted, we are content to speak improperly; but utterly deny, that when we give the name, we give any thing more than we please; and had rather his majesty should change his name than to renounce our own rights and liberties, which he is to preserve, and which we have received from God and nature.

* Omnia mihi in omnes licere. Sueton.

But that the folly and wickedness of our author may not be capable of any farther aggravation, he says, "That it skills not how he come by the power." Violence therefore, or fraud, treachery or murder, are as good as election, donation, or legal succession. It is in vain to examine the laws of God or man; the rights of nature; whether children do inherit the dignities and magistracies of their fathers, as patrimonial lands and goods; whether regard ought to be had to the fitness of the person; whether all should go to one, or be divided amongst them; or by what rule we may know who is the right heir to the succession, and consequently, what we are in conscience obliged to do. Our author tells us in short, it matters not how he that has the power comes by it.

It has been hitherto thought, that to kill a king (especially a good king) was a most abominable action. They who did it, were thought to be incited by the worst of passions that can enter into the hearts of men; and the severest punishments have been invented to deter them from such attempts, or to avenge their death upon those who should accomplish it: but, if our author may be credited, it must be the most commendable and glorious act that can be performed by man: for, besides the outward advantages that men so earnestly desire, he that does it, is presently invested with the sovereign majesty, and at the same time becomes God's vicegerent, and the father of his country, possessed of that government, which, in exclusion to all other forms, is only favoured by the laws of God and nature. The only inconvenience is, that all depends upon success, and he that is to be the minister of God, and father of his country, if he succeed, is the worst of all villains, if he fail; and, at the best, may be deprived of all by the same means he employed to gain it. Tho' a prince should have the wisdom and virtues of Moses, the valour of Joshua, David, and the Maccabees, with the gentleness and integrity of Samuel, the most foolish, vitious, base, and detestable man in the world that kills him, and seizes the power, becomes his heir, and father of the people that he governed; it skills not how he did it, whether in open battle, or by secret treachery, in the field, or in the bed, by poison, or by the sword: the vilest slave in Israel had become the Lord's anointed, if he could have killed David or Solomon, and found villains to place him in the throne. If this be right, the world has to this day lived in darkness, and the

CHAP. III. the actions which have been thought to be the most detestable, are the most commendable and glorious. But not troubling myself at present to decide this question, I leave it to kings to consider how much they are beholden to Filmer, and his disciples, who set such a price upon their heads, as would render it hard to preserve their lives one day, if the doctrines were received which they endeavour to infuse into the minds of the people; and concluding this point, only say, that we in England know no other king than he who is so by law, nor any power in that king except that which he has by law: and tho' the Roman empire was held by the power of the sword; and Ulpian, a corrupt lawyer, undertakes to say, that "the prince is not obliged by the laws;" yet Theodosius confessed, that it was the glory of a good emperor to acknowledge himself bound by them.

S E C T. XXII.

The rigour of the law is to be tempered by men of known integrity and judgment, and not by the prince, who may be ignorant or vicious.

OUR author's next shift is to place the king above the law, that he may mitigate the rigour of it, without which, he says, "the case of the subject would be desperately miserable." But this cure would prove worse than the disease. Such pious fathers of the people as Caligula, Nero, or Domitian, were not like to mitigate the rigour; nor such as inherit crowns in their infancy (as the present kings of Spain, France, and Sweden) so well to understand the meaning of it as to decide extraordinary cases. The wisdom of nations has provided more assured helps; and none could have been so brutish and negligent of the public concerns, to suffer the succession to fall to women, children, &c. if they had not reserved a power in themselves to prefer others before the nearest in blood, if reason require; and prescribed such rules as might preserve the public from ruin, notwithstanding their infirmities and vices. These helps provided by our laws, are principally by grand and petit juries, who are not only judges of matters of fact, as whether a man be killed, but whether he be killed criminally. These men are upon their oaths, and may be indicted of perjury if they prevaricate: the judges are present, not only to be a check upon them, but to explain such points of the law as may seem difficult. And tho' these judges may be said in some sense to be chosen by the king, he is not understood to do it otherwise than by the advice of his council, who cannot perform their duty, unless they propose such as in their consciences they think most worthy of the office, and most capable of performing the duty rightly; nor he accomplish the oath of his coronation, unless he admit those, who upon deliberation seem to be the best. The judges being 18 Edw. III. thus chosen, are so far from depending upon the will of the king, that cap. 1. they swear faithfully to serve the people as well as the king, and to do justice to every

every man according to the law of the land, notwithstanding any writs, letters, or commands received from him; and in default thereof they are to forfeit their bodies, lands, and goods, as in cases of treason. These laws have been so often, and so severely executed, that it concerns all judges well to consider them; and the cases of Tresilian, Empson, Dudley, and others, shew, that neither the king's preceding command, nor subsequent pardon, could preserve them from the punishment they deserved. All men knew, that what they did was agreeable to the king's pleasure; for Tresilian advanced the prerogative of Edward the III, and Empson brought great treasures into the coffers of Henry the VIIth. Nevertheless they were charged with treason for subverting the laws of the land, and executed as traitors. Tho' England ought never to forget the happy reign of Q. Elizabeth, yet it must be acknowledged, that she as well as others had her failings. She was full of love to the people, just in her nature, sincere in her intentions; but could not so perfectly discover the snares that were laid for her, or resist the importunity of the persons she most trusted, as not sometimes to be brought to attempt things against law. She and her counsellors pressed the judges very hardly to obey the patent under her great seal, in the case of Cavendish: but they answered, "That both she and they had taken an oath to keep the law; and, if they should obey her commands, the law would not warrant them," &c. And besides the offence against God, their country, and the commonwealth, they alledged the example of Empson and Dudley, "whereby," they said, "they were deterred from obeying her illegal commands." They who had sworn to keep the law notwithstanding the king's writs, knew that the law depended not upon his will; and the same oath that obliged them not to regard any command they should receive from him, shewed that they were not to expect indemnity by it, and not only that the king had neither the power of making, altering, mitigating, or interpreting the law, but that he was not at all to be heard, in general or particular matters, otherwise than as he speaks in the common course of justice, by the courts legally established, which say the same thing, whether he be young or old, ignorant or wise, wicked or good: and nothing does better evidence the wisdom and care of our ancestors, in framing the laws and government we live under; than that the people did not suffer extremities by the vices or infirmities of kings, till an age more full of malice than those in which they lived, had found tricks to pervert the rule, and frustrate their honest intentions. It was not safe for the kings to violate their oaths by an undue interposition of their authority; but the ministers who served them in those violations, have seldom escaped punishment. This is to be understood when the deviations from justice are extreme and mischievous, for something must always be allowed to human frailty: the best have their defects, and none could stand, if a too exact scrutiny were made of all their actions. Edward the Third, about the twentieth year of his reign, acknowledged his own in parliament, and as well for the ease of his conscience, as the satisfaction of his people, promoted an act, "commanding all judges to do justice, notwithstanding any writs, letters, or commands from himself, and forbidding those that belonged to the king, queen, and prince, to intermeddle in those matters." But if the best and wisest

SECT. 22.

Anderson's
Rep. p. 155.

CHAP. III. wisest of our princes, in the strength and maturity of their years, had their failings, and every act proceeding from them, that tended to the interruption of justice, was a failing, how can it be said, that the king in his personal capacity, directly or indirectly, may enter into a discussion of these matters, much less to determine them according to his will?

“But,” says our author, “the law is no better than a tyrant; general pardons at the coronation, and in parliament, are but the bounty of the prerogative, &c. There may be hard cases;” and, citing some perverted pieces from Aristotle’s ethics and politics, adds, “That when something falls out besides the general rule, then it is fit, that what the lawmaker hath omitted, or where he hath erred by speaking generally, it should be corrected and supplied, as if the lawmaker were present that ordained it. The governor, whether he be one man or more, ought to be lord of these things, where of it was impossible that the law should speak exactly.” These things are in part true; but our author makes use of them as the devil does of Scripture, to subvert the truth. There may be something of rigour in the law, that in some cases may be mitigated; and the law itself (in relation to England) does so far acknowledge it, as to refer much to the consciences of juries, and those who are appointed to assist them; and the most difficult cases are referred to the parliament as the only judges that are able to determine them. Thus the statute of the 35th Edw. III. enumerating the crimes then declared to be treason, leaves to future parliaments to judge what other facts equivalent to them may deserve the same punishment: and it is a general rule in the law, which the judges are sworn to observe, that difficult cases should be reserved till the parliament meet, who are only able to decide them: and if there be any inconvenience in this, it is because they do not meet so frequently as the law requires or by sinister means are interrupted in their sitting. But nothing can be more absurd than to say, that because the king does not call parliaments as the law and his oath requires, that power should accrue to him, which the law and the consent of the nation has placed in them.

There is also such a thing in the law, as a general or particular pardon, and the king may in some degree be entrusted with the power of giving it, especially for such crimes as merely relate to himself, as every man may remit the injuries done to himself; but the confession of Edward the Third, “That the oath of the crown had not been kept by reason of the grant of pardons contrary to statutes,” and a new act made, “that all such charters of pardon from henceforth granted against the oath of the crown, and the said statutes, should be held for none,” demonstrate that this power was not in himself, but granted by the nation, and to be executed according to such rules as the law prescribed, and the parliament approved.

Moreover, there have been many, and sometimes bloody contests for the crown, upon which the nation was almost equally divided; and it being difficult for them to know, or even for us who have all the parties before us, to judge which was the better side, it was understood, that he who came to be crowned by the consent of the people, was acceptable to all: and the question being determined, it was no way fit that he should have a liberty to make use of the public authority then in his hands, to revenge such personal injuries as SECT. 22. he had, or might suppose to have received, which might raise new, and perhaps more dangerous troubles, if the authors of them were still kept in fear of being prosecuted; and nothing could be more unreasonable, than that he should employ his power to the destruction of those who had consented to make him king. This made it a matter of course for a king, as soon as he was crowned, to issue out a general pardon; which was no more than to declare, that being now what he was not before, he had no enemy upon any former account. For this reason Lewis the Twelfth of France, when he was incited to revenge himself against those, who, in the reign of his predecessor Charles the Eighth, had caused him to be imprisoned, with great danger of his life, made this answer, "That the king of France did not care to revenge the injuries done to the duke of Orleans:" and the last king of Sweden seemed no otherwise to remember who had opposed the queen's abdication, and his election, than by conferring honours upon them; because he knew they were the best men of the nation, and such as would be his friends, when they should see how he would govern, in which he was not deceived. But, lest all those who might come to the crown of England, should not have the same prudence and generosity, the kings were obliged by a custom of no less force than a law, immediately to put an end to all disputes, and the inconveniences that might arise from them. This did not proceed from the bounty of the prerogative (which I think is nonsense, for tho' he that enjoys the prerogative may have bounty, the prerogative can have none), but from common sense, from his obligation, and the care of his own safety; and could have no other effect in law, than what related to his person, as appears by the forementioned statute.

Pardons granted by act of parliament are of another nature: for as the king, who has no other power than by law, can no otherwise dispense with the crimes committed against the laws, than the law does enable him; the parliament, that has the power of making laws, may entirely abolish the crimes, and unquestionably remit the punishment as they please.

Tho' some words of Aristotle's ethics are without any coherence shuffled together by our author, with others taken out of his politics, I do not much except against them. No law made by man can be perfect, and there must be in every nation a power of correcting such defects as in time may arise or be discovered. This power can never be so rightly placed as "in the same hand that has the right of making laws, whether in one person or in many." If Filmer therefore can tell us of a place, where one man, woman, or child, however he or she be qualified, has the power of making laws, I will acknowledge, that not only the "hard cases," but as many others as he pleases, are referred to his or her judgment, and that they may give it, whether they have any understanding of what they do or not, whether they be drunk or sober, in their senses, or stark-mad. But as I know no such place, and should not be much concerned for the sufferings of a people that should bring such misery upon themselves, as must accompany an absolute dependence upon the unruly will of such a creature, I may leave him to seek it, and rest in a perfect assu-

CHAP. III. rance, that he does not speak of England, which acknowledges no other law than its own; and instead of receiving any from kings, does, to this day, obey none, but such as have been made by our ancestors, or ourselves, and never admitted any king that did not swear to observe them. And if Aristotle deserve credit, the power of altering, mitigating, explaining, or correcting, the laws of England, is only in the parliament, because none but the parliament can make them.

S E C T. XXIII.

Aristotle proves, that no man is to be entrusted with an absolute power, by shewing, that no one knows how to execute it, but such a man as is not to be found.

OUR author having falsely cited and perverted the sense of Aristotle, now brings him in saying, "That a perfect kingdom is that wherein the king rules all according to his own will." But tho' I have read his books of government with some attention, I can find no such thing in them, unless the word which signifies "mere" or "absolute" may be justly translated into "perfect;" which is so far from Aristotle's meaning, that he distinguishes the absolute or despotical kingdoms from the legitimate; and commending the latter, gives no better name than that of "barbarous" to the first, which he says can agree only with the nature of such nations as are base and stupid, little differing from beasts; and having no skill to govern, or courage to defend themselves, must resign all to the will of one that will take care of them. Yet even this cannot be done, unless he that should take that care be wholly exempted from the vices which oblige the others to stand in need of it; for otherwise it is no better than if a sheep should undertake to govern sheep, or a hog to command swine; Aristotle plainly saying, "That as men are by nature equal, if it were possible, all should be magistrates." But that being repugnant to the nature of government, he finds no other way of solving the difficulty, than by "obeying and commanding alternately;" that they may do by turns that which they cannot do all together, and to which no one man has more right than another, because they are all by nature equal. This might be composed by a more compendious way, if, according to our author's doctrine, possession could give a right. But Aristotle, speaking like a philosopher, and not like a public enemy of mankind, examines what is just, reasonable, and beneficial to men, that is, what ought to be done, and which being done, is to be accounted just, and therefore to be supported by good men. But as

Arist. pol.
l. ii. c. 1.

* Quod ab initio injustum est, nullum potest habere juris effectum. Grot. de jur. bel. & pac. l. iii.

"tice;

“ tice ;” and it being manifestly unjust for one, or a few men, to assume a SECT. 23.
 power over those who by nature are equal to them, no such power can be just or beneficial to mankind ; nor fit to be upheld by good men, if it be unjust and prejudicial. In the opinion of Aristotle, this natural equality continues till virtue makes the distinction, which must be either simply complete and perfect in itself, so that he who is endued with it, is a God among men, or relatively, as far as concerns civil society, and the ends for which it is constituted, that is, defence, and the obtaining of justice. This requires a mind unbiassed by passion, full of goodness and wisdom, firm against all the temptations to ill, that may arise from desire or fear ; tending to all manner of good, through a perfect knowledge and affection to it ; and this to such a degree, that he or they have more of these virtues and excellencies than all the rest of the society, tho’ computed together : where such a man is found, he is by nature a king, and it is best for the nation where he is that he govern. If a few Arist. pol. 1.
ii.
 men, tho’ equal and alike among themselves, have the same advantages above the rest of the people, nature, for the same reason, seems to establish an aristocracy in that place ; and the power is more safely committed to them, than left in the hands of the multitude. But if this excellency of virtue do not appear in one, nor in a few men, the right and power is by nature equally lodged in all ; and to assume or appropriate that power to one, or a few men, is unnatural and tyrannical, which in Aristotle’s language, comprehends all that is detestable and abominable.

If any man should think Aristotle a trifler, for speaking of such a man as can never be found, I answer, that he went as far as his way could be warranted by reason or nature, and was obliged to stop there by the defect of his subject. He could not say, that the government of one was simply good, when he knew so many qualifications were required in the person to make it Barbeyrac trad. de Puf.
liv. vii. 5.
not. 1.
 so ; nor, that it is good for a nation to be under the power of a fool, a coward, or a villain, because it was good to be under a man of admirable wisdom, valour, industry, and goodness ; or that the government of one should be continued in such as by chance succeed in a family, because it was given to the first who had all the virtues required, tho’ all the reasons for which the power was given fail in the successor ; much less could he say, that any government was good, which was not good for those whose good only it was constituted to promote.

Moreover, by shewing who only is fit to be a monarch, or may be made such, without violating the laws of nature and justice, he shews who cannot be one : and he who says, that no such man is to be found, as, according to the opinion of Aristotle, can be a monarch, does most ridiculously alledge his authority in favour of monarchs, or the power which some amongst us would attribute to them. If any thing therefore may be concluded from his words, it is this ; that since no power ought to be admitted which is not just ; that none can be just which is not good, profitable to the people, and conducing to the ends for which it is constituted ; that no man can know how to direct the power to those ends, can deserve, or administer it, unless he do so far excel all those that are under him in wisdom, justice, valour, and goodness, as CHAP. III. to possess more of those virtues than all of them; I say, if no such man, or succession of men, be found, no such power is to be granted to any man, or succession of men. But if such power be granted, the laws of nature and reason are overthrown, and the ends for which societies are constituted, utterly perverted, which necessarily implies an annihilation of the grant. And if a grant, so made by those who have a right of setting up a government among themselves, do perish through its own natural iniquity and perversity, I leave it to any man, whose understanding and manners are not so intirely corrupted as those of our author, to determine what name ought to be given to that person, who, not excelling all others in civil and moral virtues, in the proportion required by Aristotle, does usurp a power over a nation, and what obedience the people owe to such a one. But if his opinion deserve our regard, the king, by having those virtues, is "omnium optimus," and the best guide to the people, " * to lead them to happiness by the ways of virtue." And he who assumes the same power, without the qualifications required, is "tyrannus omnium pessimus," leading the people to all manner of ill, and, in consequence, to destruction.

S E C T. XXIV.

The power of Augustus Cæsar was not given, but usurped.

Annal. l. i.

OUR author's next instance is ingeniously taken from the Romans, "who," he says, "tho' they were a people greedy of liberty, freed Augustus from the necessity of laws." If it be true, as he affirms, that such a prerogative is instituted only for the preservation of liberty, they who are most greedy of it, ought to be most forward in establishing that which defends it best. But if the weight laid upon the words "greedy of liberty, &c." render his memory and judgment liable to censure, the unpardonable prevarication of citing any act done by the Romans in the time of Augustus, as done freely, shews him to be a man of no faith. "Omnium jura in se traxerat," says Tacitus of Augustus; nothing was conferred upon him, he took all to himself; there could be nothing of right in that which was wholly usurped. And neither the people or the senate could do any thing freely, whilst they were under the power of a mad corrupted soldiery, who first betrayed, and then subdued them. The greatest part of the senate had fallen at the battle of Pharsalia, others had been gleaned up in several places, the rest destroyed by the proscriptions; and that which then retained the name of a senate, was made up chiefly of those who had been his ministers, in bringing the most miserable slavery upon their own country. The Roman liberty, and that bravery of spirit by which it had been maintained, was not only abolished, but almost forgotten. All consideration of law and right was trampled under foot; and none could dispute with him, who by the power of the sword had SECT. 25. seized the authority both of the senate and people. Nothing was so extravagant, that might not be extorted by the insolent violence of a conqueror, who had thirty mercenary legions to execute his commands. The uncorrupted part of the people, that had escaped the sword of Julius, had either perished with Hirtius and Pansa, Brutus and Cassius, or been destroyed by the detestable triumvirate. Those that remained could lose nothing by a verbal resignation of their liberty, which they had neither strength nor courage to defend. The magistracies were possessed by the creatures of the tyrant; and the people was composed of such as were either born under slavery, and accustomed to obey, or remained under the terror of those arms that had consumed the assertors of their liberty. Our author, standing in need of some Roman example, was obliged to seek it in an age, when the laws were subverted, virtue extinguished, injustice placed in the throne, and such as would not be of the same spirit, exposed to the utmost cruelty. This was the time when the sovereign majesty shined in glory; and they who had raised it above the law, made it also the object of their religion, by adoring the statues of their oppressor. The corruption of this court spread itself over the best part of the world; and reduced the empire to that irrecoverable weakness in which it languished and perished. This is the state of things that pleases Filmer, and those that are like him, who, for the introduction of the same among us, recommend such an elevation of the sovereign majesty, as is most contrary to the laws of God and men, abhorred by all generous nations, and most especially by our ancestors, who thought nothing too dear to be hazarded in the defence of themselves and us from it.

* Ad summum bonum secundum virtutem. Arist. pol.

S E C T. XXV.

The regal power was not the first in this nation; nor necessarily to be continued, tho' it had been the first.

TRUTH being uniform in itself, those who desire to propagate it for the good of mankind, lay the foundations of their reasonings in such principles, as are either evident to common sense, or easily proved: but cheats and impostors, delighting in obscurity, suppose things that are dubious or false, and think to build one falshood upon another; and our author can find no better way to persuade us, that all our privileges and laws are from the king, than by saying, "that the first power was the kingly power, which was both
 " in this and all other nations in the world, long before any laws, or any " other kind of government, were thought of; from whence we must neces" sarily infer, that the common law, or common customs of this land, were " originally the laws and commands of the king." But denying both these points, I affirm,

I. First,

1. First, that there was a power to make kings before there was any king.
2. Tho' kings had been the first created magistrates in all places (as perhaps they were in some), it does not follow, that they must continue for ever, or that laws are from them.

To the first ; I think no man will deny, that there was a people at Babylon, before Nimrod was king of that place. This people had a power ; for no number of men can be without it : nay this people had a power of making Nimrod king, or he could never have been king. He could not be king by succession, for the Scripture shews him to have been the first. He was not king by the right of father, for he was not their father, Chush, Cham, with his elder brothers, and father Noah, being still living ; and, which is worst of all, were not kings : for if they who lived in Nimrod's time, or before him, neither were kings, nor had kings, he that ought to have been king over all by the right of nature (if there had been any such thing in nature), was not king. Those who immediately succeeded him, and must have inherited his right, if he had any, did not inherit, or pretend to it : and therefore he that shall now claim a right from nature, as father of a people, must ground it upon something more certain than Noah's right of reigning over his children, or it can have no strength in it.

Moreover, the nations who in and before the time of Nimrod had no kings, had power, or else they could have performed no act, nor constituted any other magistrate, to this day, which is absurd. There was therefore a power in nations before there were kings, or there could never have been any ; and Nimrod could never have been king, if the people of Babylon had not made him king, which they could not have done if they had not a power of making him so. It is ridiculous to say he made himself king, for tho' he might be strong and valiant, he could not be stronger than a multitude of men. That which forces must be stronger than that which is forced ; and if it be true, according to the antient saying, that Hercules himself is not sufficient to encounter two, it is sure more impossible for one man to force a multitude, for that must be stronger than he. If he came in by persuasion, they who were persuaded, were persuaded to consent, that he should be king. That consent therefore made him king. But, "qui dat esse, dat modum esse:" they who made him king, made him such a king as best pleased themselves. He had therefore nothing but what was given : his greatness and power must be from the multitude who gave it : and their laws and liberties could not be from him : but their liberties were naturally inherent in themselves, and their laws were the product of them.

There was a people that made Romulus king. He did not make or beget that people, nor, for any thing we know, one man of them. He could not come in by inheritance, for he was a bastard, the son of an unknown man ; and when he died, the right that had been conferred upon him reverted to the people, who, according to that right, chose Numa, Hostilius, Martius, Tarquinius Priscus, and Servius, all strangers, and without any other right than what was bestowed upon them ; and Tarquinius Superbus, who invaded the throne throne “* without the command of the people,” was ejected, and the government of kings abolished, by the same power that had created it. SECT. 25.

We know not certainly by what law Moses, and the judges, created by the advice of Jethro, governed the Israelites; but may probably conjecture it to have been by that law which God had written in the hearts of mankind; and the people submitted to the judgment of good and wise men, tho’ they were under no coercive power: but it is certain they had a law, and a regular magistracy, under which they lived, four hundred years before they had a king, for Saul was the first. This law was not therefore from the king, nor by the king; but the king was chosen and made by the people, according to the liberty they had by the law, tho’ they did not rightly follow the rules therein prescribed, and by that means brought destruction upon themselves.

The country in which we live lay long concealed under obscure barbarity, and we know nothing of the first inhabitants, but what is involved in fables, that leave us still in the dark. Julius Cæsar is the first who speaks distinctly of our affairs, and gives us no reason to believe there was any monarchy then established amongst us. Cassivellaunus was occasionally chosen by the nations Jul. Cæs. that were most exposed to the violence of the Romans, for the management Comment. of those wars against them. By others we hear of Boadicia, Arviragus, Gal- l. v. gacus, and many more set up afterwards, when need required; but we find no footsteps of a regular succession either by inheritance or election. And as they had then no kings, or any other general magistrate, that can be said to be equivalent to a king, they might have had none at all unless they had thought fit. Tacitus mentions a sort of kings, used by the Romans to keep † nations in servitude to them; and tho’ it were true, that there had been such a man as Lucius, and he one of this sort, he is to be accounted only as a Roman magistrate, and signifies no more to our dispute, than if he had been called proconsul, prætor, or by any other name. However there was no series of them: that which was temporary and occasional, depended upon the will of those, who, thinking there was occasion, created such a magistrate, and omitted to do so, when the occasion ceased, or was thought to cease; and might have had none at all, if they had so pleased. The magistracy therefore was from them, and depended upon their will.

We have already mentioned the histories of the Saxons, Danes, and Normans, from which nations, together with the Britains, we are descended, and, finding that they were severe assertors of their liberties, acknowledged no human laws but their own, received no kings, but such as swore to observe them, and deposed those who did not well perform their oaths and duty, it is evident, that their kings were made by the people according to the law, and that the law, by which they became what they were, could not be from themselves. Our ancestors were so fully convinced, that in the creation of kings they * Sine jussu p. puli. T. Liv. l. i.

† Inter instrumenta servitutis reges habuere. C. Tacit.

CHAP. III. exercised their own right, and were only to consider what was good for themselves, that without regard to the memory of those who had gone before, they were accustomed to take such as seemed most like, wisely, justly and gently to perform their office; refused those that were suspected of pride, cruelty, or any other vice that might bring prejudice upon the public, what title soever they pretended; and removed such as had been placed in the throne, if they did not answer the opinion conceived of their virtue; which I take to be a manner of proceeding that agrees better with the quality of masters, making laws and magistrates for themselves, than of slaves receiving such as were imposed upon them.

2. To the second. Tho' it should be granted, that all nations had at the first been governed by kings, it were nothing to the question; for no man, or number of men, was ever obliged to continue in the errors of his predecessors. The authority of custom, as well as of law (I mean in relation to the power that made it to be), consists only in its rectitude; and the same reason which may have induced one or more nations to create kings, when they knew no other form of government, may not only induce them to set up another, if that be found inconvenient to them, but proves, that they may as justly do so, as remove a man who performs not what was expected from him. If there had been a rule given by God, and written in the minds of men by nature, it must have been from the beginning, universal and perpetual; or at least must have been observed by the wisest and best instructed nations: which not being in any measure (as I have proved already), there can be no reason, why a polite people should not relinquish the errors committed by their ancestors in the time of their barbarism and ignorance, and why they should not do it in matters of government, as well as in any other thing relating to life. Men are subject to errors, and it is the work of the best and wisest to discover and amend such as their ancestors may have committed, or to add perfection to those things which by them have been well invented. This is so certain, that whatsoever we enjoy beyond the misery in which our barbarous ancestors lived, is due only to the liberty of correcting what was amiss in their practice, or inventing that which they did not know: and I doubt whether it be more brutish to say, we are obliged to continue in the idolatry of the druids, with all the miseries and follies that accompany the most savage barbarity, or to confess, that tho' we have a right to depart from these, yet we are for ever bound to continue the government they had established, whatever inconveniences might attend it. Tertullian, disputing with the pagans, who objected the novelty of the christian religion, troubled not himself with refuting that error; * but proving christianity to be good and true, he thought he had sufficiently proved it to be antient. A wise architect may shew his skill, and deserve commendation for building a poor house of vile materials, when he can procure no better, but he no way ought to hinder others from erecting more glorious fabrics if they are furnished with the means required. Besides, such is SECT. 25.

* Nullum tempus, nulla præscriptio, occurrit veritati. Tertul. Id antiquius quod verius. Ibid.

 the imperfection of all human constitutions, that they are subject to perpetual fluctuation, which never permits them to continue long in the same condition :
 corruptions slide in insensibly ; and the best orders are sometimes subverted by malice and violence ; so that he who only regards what was done in such an age, often takes the corruption of the state for the institution, follows the worst example, thinks that to be the first, that is the most antient he knows ; and if a brave people, seeing the original defects of their government, or the corruption into which it may be fallen, do either correct and reform what may be amended, or abolish that which was evil in the institution, or so perverted, that it cannot be restored to integrity, these men impute it to sedition, and blame those actions, which, of all that can be performed by men, are the most glorious. We are not therefore so much to inquire after that which is most antient, as that which is best, and most conducing to the good ends to which it was directed. As governments were instituted for the obtaining of justice, and (as our author says) the preservation of liberty, we are not to seek what government was the first, but what best provides for the obtaining of justice, and preservation of liberty. For whatsoever the institution be, and how long soever it may have lasted, it is void, if it thwarts, or do not provide for the ends of its establishment. If such a law or custom therefore as is not good in itself, had in the beginning prevailed in all parts of the world (which in relation to absolute, or any kind of monarch, is not true), it ought to be abolished ; and if any man should shew himself wiser than others by proposing a law or government, more beneficial to mankind than any that had been formerly known, providing better for justice and liberty than all others had done, he would merit the highest veneration. If any man ask, who shall be judge of that rectitude or pravity which either authorizes or destroys a law ? I answer, that as this consists not in formalities and niceties, but in evident and substantial truths, there is no need of any other tribunal than that of common sense, and the light of nature, to determine the matter : and he that travels through France, Italy, Turkey, Germany, and Switzerland, without consulting Barto-lus or Baldus, will easily understand whether the countries that are under the kings of France and Spain, the Pope and the great Turk, or such as are under the care of a well-regulated magistracy, do best enjoy the benefits of justice and liberty. It is as easily determined whether the Grecians, when Athens and Thebes flourished, were more free than the Medes ; whether justice was better administred by Agathocles, Dionysius, and Phalaris, than by the legal kings and regular magistrates of Sparta ; or whether more care was taken, that justice and liberty might be preserved by Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, and Vitellius, than by the senate and people of Rome, whilst the laws were more powerful than the commands of men. The like may be said of particular laws, as those of Nabuchodonosor and Caligula, for worshipping their statues ; our acts of parliament against heretics and Lollards, with the statutes and orders of the inquisition, which is called the holy office. And if that only be a law which is “ sanctio recta, jubens honesta, prohibens contraria,”

CHAP. III. the meanest understanding, if free from passion, may certainly know, that such as these cannot be laws, by what authority soever they were enacted, and that the use of them, and others like to them, ought to be abolished for their turpitude and iniquity. Infinite examples of the like nature might be alledged, as well concerning divine as human things. And if there be any laws which are evil, there cannot be an incontestable rectitude in all, and if not in all, it concerns us to examine where it is to be found. Laws and constitutions ought to be weighed, and whilst all due reverence is paid to such as are good, every nation may not only retain in itself a power of changing or abolishing all such as are not so, but ought to exercise that power according to the best of their understanding, and in the place of what was either at first mistaken, or afterwards corrupted, to constitute that which is most conducing to the establishment of justice and liberty.

Discors. di
Machiav.
lib. ii.

But such is the condition of mankind, that nothing can be so perfectly framed as not to give some testimony of human imbecillity, and frequently to stand in need of reparations and amendments. Many things are unknown to the wisest, and the best men can never wholly divest themselves of passions and affections. By this means the best and wisest are sometimes led into error, and stand in need of successors like to themselves, who may find remedies for the faults they have committed, and nothing can or ought to be permanent but that which is perfect. No natural body was ever so well tempered and organized, as not to be subject to diseases, wounds, or other accidents, and to need medicines, and other occasional helps, as well as nourishment and exercise, and he who, under the name of innovation, would deprive nations of the like, does, as much as lies in him, condemn them all to perish by the defects of their own foundations. Some men observing this, have proposed a necessity of reducing every state, once in an age or two, to the integrity of its first principle: but they ought to have examined, whether that principle be good or evil, or so good, that nothing can be added to it, which none ever was; and this being so, those who will admit of no change would render errors perpetual, and depriving mankind of the benefits of wisdom, industry, experience, and the right use of reason, oblige all to continue in the miserable barbarity of their ancestors, which suits better with the name of a wolf than that of a man.

Those who are of better understanding, weigh all things, and often find reason to abrogate that which their fathers, according to the measure of the knowledge they had, or the state of things among them, had rightly instituted, or to restore that which they had abrogated; and there can be no greater mark of a most brutish stupidity, than for men to continue in an evil way, because their fathers had brought them into it. But if we ought not too strictly to adhere to our own constitutions, those of other nations are less to be regarded by us; for the laws that may be good for one people are not for all, and that which agrees with the manners of one age, is utterly abhorrent from those of another. It were absurd to think of restoring the laws of Lycurgus to the present inhabitants of Peloponnesus, who are accustomed to the most abject slavery. It may easily be imagined, how the Romans,

Sabines, and Latins, now under the tyranny of the pope, would relish such SECT. 25.
 a discipline as flourished among them after the expulsion of the Tarquins; } and it had been no less preposterous to give a liberty to the Parthians of governing themselves, or for them to assume it, than to impose an absolute monarch upon the German nation. Titus Livius, having observed this says, that Hist. l. ii. c. i.
 if a popular government had been set up in Rome immediately upon the building of the city; and if that fierce people, which was composed of unruly shepherds, herdsmen, fugitive slaves, and out-lawed persons, who could not suffer the governments under which they were born, had come to be incited * tribuniciis by * turbulent orators, they would have brought all into confusion: whereas procellis.
 that boisterous humour being gradually tempered by discipline under Romulus, or taught to vent its fury against foreign enemies, and softened by the peaceable reign of Numa, a new race grew up, which, being all of one blood, contracted a love to their country, and became capable of liberty, which the madness of their last king, and the lewdness of his son, gave them occasion to resume. If this was commendable in them, it must be so in other nations. If the Germans might preserve their liberty, as well as the Parthians submit themselves to absolute monarchy, it is as lawful for the descendents of those Germans to continue in it, as for the eastern nations to be slaves. If one nation may justly chuse the government that seems best to them, and continue or alter it according to the changes of times and things, the same right must belong to others. The great variety of laws that are or have been in the world, proceeds from this; and nothing can better shew the wisdom and virtue, or the vices and folly of nations, than the use they make of this right: they have been glorious or infamous, powerful or despicable, happy or miserable, as they have well or ill executed it.

If it be said, that the law given by God to the Hebrews, proceeding from his wisdom and goodness, must needs be perfect and obligatory to all nations; I answer, that there is a simple and a relative perfection: the first is only in God, the other in the things he has created: "He saw that they were good;" Gen. i.
 which can signify no more than that they were good in their kind, and suited to the end for which he designed them. For if the perfection were absolute, there could be no difference between an angel and a worm, and nothing could be subject to change or death; for that is imperfection. This relative perfection is seen also by his law given to mankind in the persons of Adam and Noah. It was good in the kind, fit for those times; but could never have been enlarged or altered, if the perfection had been simple; and no better evidence can be given to shew, that it was not so, than that God did afterwards give one much more full and explicit to his people. This law also was peculiarly applicable to that people and season; for, if it had been otherwise, the apostles would have obliged christians to the intire observation of it, as well as to abstain from idolatry, fornication, and blood. But if all this be not so, then their judicial law, and the form of their commonwealth, must be received by all; no human law can be of any value; we are all brethren; no man has a prerogative above another; lands must be equally divided

CHAP. III. vided amongst all; inheritances cannot be alienated for above fifty years; no man can be raised above the rest, unless he be called by God, and enabled by his Spirit to conduct the people; when this man dies, he that has the same Spirit must succeed, as Joshua did to Moses, and his children can have no title to his office: when such a man appears, a sanhedrin of seventy men, chosen out of the whole people, are to judge such causes as relate to themselves, whilst those of greater extent and importance are referred to the general assemblies. Here is no mention of a king; and consequently, if we must take this law for our pattern, we cannot have one: if the point be driven to the utmost, and the precept of Deuteronomy, where God permitted them to have a king, if they thought fit, when they came into the promised land, be understood to extend to all nations, every one of them must have the same liberty of taking their own time, chusing him in their own way, dividing the kingdom, having no king, and setting up other governors when they please, as before the election of Saul, and after the return from the captivity: and even when they have a king, he must be such a one as is described in the same chapter, who no more resembles the sovereign majesty that our author adores, and agrees as little with his maxims, as a tribune of the Roman people.

We may therefore conclude, that if we are to follow the law of Moses, we must take it with all the appendages; a king can be no more, and no otherwise, than he makes him: for whatever we read of the kings they had, were extreme deviations from it. No nation can make any law; and our lawyers, burning their books, may betake themselves to the study of the pentateuch; in which tho' some of them may be well-versed, yet probably the profit arising from thence will not be very great.

But, if we are not obliged to live in a conformity to the law of Moses, every people may frame laws for themselves, and we cannot be denied the right that is common to all. Our laws were not sent from heaven, but made by our ancestors according to the light they had, and their present occasions. We inherit the same right from them, and, as we may without vanity say, that we know a little more than they did, if we find ourselves prejudiced by any law that they made, we may repeal it. The safety of the people was their supreme law, and is so to us: neither can we be thought less fit to judge what conduces to that end, than they were. If they in any age had been persuaded to put themselves under the power, or, in our author's phrase, under the sovereign majesty, of a child, a fool, a mad or desperately wicked person, and had annexed the right conferred upon him, to such as should succeed, it had not been a "just and right sanction;" and, having none of the qualities essentially belonging to a law, could not have the effect of a law. It cannot be for the good of a people to be governed by one, who by nature ought to be governed, or by age or accident is rendered unable to govern himself. The public interests, and the concerns of private men in their lands, goods, liberties, and lives (for the preservation of which, our author says, that regal prerogative is only constituted), cannot be preserved by one who is transported by his own passions or follies, a slave to his lusts and vices; or, which is sometimes worse, governed by the vilest of men and women, who flatter him in them, and push him on to do such things as even they would abhor, if they were in his place. The turpitude and impious madness of such an act must necessarily make it void, by overthrowing the ends for which it was made, since that justice which was sought cannot be obtained, nor the evils that were feared, prevented; and they for whose good it was intended must necessarily have a right of abolishing it. This might be sufficient for us, tho' our ancestors had enslaved themselves. But, God be thanked, we are not put to that trouble: we have no reason to believe we are descended from such fools and beasts, as would willingly cast themselves, and us, into such an excess of misery and shame, or that they were so tame and cowardly to be subjected by force or fear. We know the value they set upon their liberties, and the courage with which they defended them: and we can have no better example to encourage us never to suffer them to be violated or diminished.
and

S E C T. XXVI.

Tho' the king may be entrusted with the power of chusing judges, yet that by which they act is from the law.

I Confess, that no law can be so perfect, "to provide exactly for every case that may fall out, so as to leave nothing to the discretion of the judges," who in some measure are to interpret them: but "that laws or customs are ever few, or that the paucity is the reason that they cannot give special rules, or that judges do resort to those principles, or common-law axioms, whereupon former judgments, in cases something alike, have been given by former judges, who all receive their authority from the king in his right to give sentence," I utterly deny; and affirm,

1. That in many places, and particularly in England, the laws are so many, that the number of them has introduced an uncertainty and confusion, which is both dangerous and troublesome; and the infinite variety of adjudged cases, thwarting and contradicting each other, has rendered these difficulties inextricable. Tacitus imputes a great part of the miseries suffered by the Romans in his time to this abuse, and tells us, that "the laws grew to be innumerable in the worst and most corrupt state of things," and that justice was overthrown by them. By the same means in France, Italy, and other places, where the civil law is rendered municipal, judgments are in a manner arbitrary; and tho' the intention of our laws be just and good, they are so numerous, and the volumes of our statutes, with the interpretations, and adjudged cases, so vast, that hardly any thing is so clear and fixed, but men of wit and learning may find what will serve for a pretence to justify almost any judgments

* Et in corruptissima republica plurimæ leges.

CHAP. III. judgment they have a mind to give. Whereas the laws of Moses, as to the judicial part, being short and few, judgments were easy and certain; and in Switzerland, Sweden, and some parts of Denmark, the whole volume that contains them may be read in few hours, and by that means no injustice can be done which is not immediately made evident.

2. Axioms are not rightly grounded upon judged cases; but cases are to be judged according to axioms: the certain is not proved by the uncertain, but the uncertain by the certain; and every thing is to be esteemed uncertain, till it be proved to be certain. Axioms in law are, as in mathematics, evident to common sense; and nothing is to be taken for an axiom, that is not so. Euclid does not prove his axioms by his propositions, but his propositions, which are abstruse, by such axioms as are evident to all. The axioms of our law do not receive their authority from Coke or Hales, but Coke and Hales deserve praise for giving judgment according to such as are undeniably true.

3. The judges receive their commissions from the king; and perhaps it may be said, that the custom of naming them is grounded upon a right with which he is intrusted; but their power is from the law, as that of the king also is. For he who has none originally in himself, can give none, unless it be first conferred upon him. I know not how he can well perform his oath to govern according to law, unless he execute the power with which he is intrusted, in naming those men to be judges, whom in his conscience, and by the advice of his council, he thinks the best and ablest to perform that office: but both he and they are to learn their duty from that law, by which they are, and which allots to every one his proper work. As the law intends, that men should be made judges for their integrity and knowledge in the law, and that it ought not to be imagined, that the king will break his trust by chusing such as are not so, till the violation be evident, nothing is more reasonable than to intend, that the judges so qualified should instruct the king in matters of law. But that he who may be a child, over-aged, or otherwise ignorant and incapable, should instruct the judges, is equally absurd, as for a blind man to be a guide to those who have the best eyes, and so abhorrent from the meaning of the law, that the judges (as I said before) are sworn to do justice according to the laws, without any regard to the king's words, letters, or commands: if they are therefore to act according to a set rule, from which they may not depart, what command soever they receive, they do not act by a power from him, but by one that is above both. This is commonly confessed; and tho' some judges have been found in several ages, who, in hopes of reward and preferment, have made little account of their oath, yet the success that many of them have had, may reasonably deter others from following their example; and if there are not more instances in this kind, no better reason can be given, than that * nations do frequently fail, by being too remiss in asserting their own rights, or punishing offenders, and hardly ever err on the severer side.

* Jure igitur plestimur; nisi enim multorum impunita scelera tulissemus, nunquam ad unum tanta pervenisset licentia. Cicero.

4. Judgments are variously given in several states and kingdoms; but he SECT. 26.
 who would find one where they lie in the breast of the king, must go at least as far as Morocco. Nay, the ambassador who was lately here from that place, denied that they were absolutely in him. However, it is certain, that in England, according to the great charter, “* judgments are passed by equals:”
 no man can be imprisoned, disseised of his freehold, deprived of life or limb, “† unless by the sentence of his peers.” The kings of Judah did “|| judge
 “and were judged;” and the judgments they gave, were in and with the sanhedrim. In England the kings do not judge, but are judged: and Bracton says, “‡ that in receiving justice the king is equal to another man;”
 which could not be, if judgments were given by him, and he were exempted from the judgment of all by that law, which has put all judgments into the hands of the people. This power is executed by them in grand or petty juries, and the judges are assistants to them, in explaining the difficult points of the law, in which, it is presumed, they should be learned. The strength of every judgment consists in the verdict of these juries, which the judges do not give, but pronounce or declare: and the same law that makes good a verdict given contrary to the advice or direction of the judges, exposes them to the utmost penalties, if, upon their own heads, or a command from the king, they should presume to give a sentence, without or contrary to a verdict; and no pretensions to a power of interpreting the law can exempt them, if they break it. The power also, with which the judges are entrusted, is but of a moderate extent, and to be executed “bona fide.” Prevarications are capital, as they proved to Tresilian, Empson, Dudley, and many others.
 Nay, even in special verdicts, the judges are only assistants to the juries, who find it specially, and the verdict is from them, tho’ the judges, having heard the point argued, declare the sense of the law thereupon. Wherefore, if I should grant, that the king might personally assist in judgments, his work could only be to prevent frauds, and, by the advice of the judges, to see that the laws be duly executed, or perhaps to inspect their behaviour. If he has more than this, it must be by virtue of his politic capacity, in which, he is understood to be always present in the principal courts, where justice is always done, whether he who wears the crown, be young or old, wise or ignorant, good or bad, or whether he like or dislike what is done.

Moreover, as governments are instituted for the obtaining of justice, and the king is in a great measure entrusted with the power of executing it, it is probable that the law would have required his presence in the distribution, if there had been but one court; that at the same time he could be present in more than one; that it were certain he would be guilty of no miscarriages; that all miscarriages were to be punished in him, as well as in the judges; or that it were certain he should always be a man of such wisdom, industry, experience, * Judicia fiunt per pares. Mag. chart.

† Nisi per judicium parium suorum. Ibid.

|| Judicabant & judicabantur. Maimonid.

‡ In justitia recipienda rex cuilibet ex plebe æqualis est.

CHAP. III. and integrity, as to be an assistance to, and a watch over, those who are appointed for the administration of justice. But there being many courts sitting at the same time, of equal authority, in several places far distant from each other; impossible for the king to be present in all; no manner of assurance that the same, or greater miscarriages may not be committed in his presence than in his absence, by himself than others; no opportunity of punishing every delict in him, without bringing the nation into such disorder, as may be of more prejudice to the public, than an injury done to a private man; the law, which intends to obviate offences, or to punish such as cannot be obviated, has directed, that those men should be chosen, who are most knowing in it; imposes an oath upon them, not to be diverted from the due course of justice, by fear or favour, hopes or reward, particularly by any command from the king; and appoints the severest punishments for them, if they prove false to God, and their country.

If any man think, that the words cited from Bracton by our author upon the question, "Quis primo & principaliter possit et debeat judicare, &c. Sciendum est quod rex, & non alius, si solus ad hæc sufficere possit, cum ad hoc per virtutem sacramenti teneatur," are contrary to what I have said, I desire the context may be considered, that his opinion may be truly understood, tho' the words, taken simply and nakedly, may be enough for my purpose. For it is ridiculous to infer, that the king has a right of doing any thing, upon a supposition, that it is impossible for him to do it. He therefore, who says the king cannot do it, says it must be done by others or not at all. But, having already proved, that the king, merely as king, has none of the qualities required for judging all, or any cases; and that many kings have all the defects of age and person, that render men most unable and unfit to give any sentence; we may conclude, without contradicting Bracton, that no king, as king, has a power of judging, because some of them are utterly unable and unfit to do it; and if any one has such a power, it must be conferred upon him by those who think him able and fit to perform that work. When Filmer finds such a man, we must inquire into the extent of that power which is given to him: but this would be nothing to his general proposition; for he himself would hardly have inferred, that because a power of judging in some cases was conferred upon one prince, on account of his fitness and ability, therefore all of them, however unfit and unable, have a power of deciding all cases. Besides, if he believe Bracton, this power of judging is not inherent in the king, but incumbent upon him, by virtue of his oath, which our author endeavours to enervate and annul. But as that oath is grounded upon the law, and the law cannot presume impossibilities and absurdities, it cannot intend, and the oath cannot require, that a man should do that, which he is unable and unfit to do. Many kings are unfit to judge causes: the law cannot therefore intend they should do it. The context also shews, that this imagination of the king's judging all causes, if he could, is merely chimerical: for Bracton says, in the same chapter, that "the power of the king is the power of the law;" that is, that he has no power but by the law. And the law that aims at justice, cannot make it to depend upon the uncertain tain humour of a child, a woman, or a foolish man; for by that means it SECT. 26. would destroy itself. The law cannot therefore give any such power, and the king cannot have it.

If it be said, that all kings are not so; that some are of mature age, wise, just, and good; or, that the question is, not what is good for the subject, but what is glorious to the king; and that he must not lose his right, tho' the people perish; I answer, first, that whatsoever belongs to kings as kings, belongs to all kings: this power of judging cannot belong to all, for the reasons above-mentioned: it cannot therefore belong to any, as king, nor, without madness, be granted to any, till he has given testimony of such wisdom, experience, diligence, and goodness, as is required for so great a work. It imports not what his ancestors were; virtues are not intailed; and it were less improper for the heirs of Hales and Harvey to pretend, that the clients and patients of their ancestors should depend upon their advice, in matters of law and physic, than for the heirs of a great and wise prince, to pretend to powers given on account of virtue, if they have not the same talents for the performance of the works required.

Common sense declares, that governments are instituted, and judicatures erected, for the obtaining of justice. The king's bench was not established, that the chief justice should have a great office, but that the oppressed should be relieved, and right done. The honour and profit he receives, comes in as it were by accident, as the rewards of his service, if he rightly perform his duty: but he may as well pretend he is there for his own sake, as the king. God did not set up Moses or Joshua, that they might glory in having six hundred thousand men under their command, but that they might lead the people into the land they were to possess: that is, they were not for themselves, but for the people; and the glory they acquired, was, by rightly performing the end of their institution. Even our author is obliged to confess this, when he says, that the king's prerogative is instituted, for the good of those that are under it. It is therefore for them that he enjoys it, and it can no otherwise subsist, than in concurrence with that end. He also yields, that "the safety of the people is the supreme law." The right therefore that the king has, must be conformable and subordinate to it. If any one therefore set up an interest in himself, that is not so, he breaks this supreme law; he doth not live and reign for his people, but for himself, and, by departing from the end of his institution, destroys it: and, if Ari-Polit. l. i. stotle (to whom our author seems to have a great deference) deserves credit, such a one ceases to be a king, and becomes a tyrant; he who ought to have been the best of men, is turned into the worst; and he who is recommended to us under the name of a father, becomes a public enemy to the people. The question therefore is not, what is good for the king, but what is good for the people; and he can have no right repugnant to them.

Bracton is not more gentle. "The king," says he, "is obliged by his oath, to the utmost of his power, to preserve the church, and the christian world, in peace; to hinder rapine, and all manner of iniquity; to cause justice and mercy to be observed: he has no power but from the law:

“ that only is to be taken for law, quod recte fuerit definitum :” he is therefore to cause justice to be done according to that rule, and not to pervert it for his own pleasure, profit, or glory. He may choose judges also, not such as will be subservient to his will, but “ viros sapientes, timentes Deum, in quibus est veritas eloquiorum, & qui oderunt avaritiam.” Which proves that kings, and their officers, do not possess their places for themselves, but for the people, and must be such as are fit and able to perform the duties they undertake. The mischievous fury of those who assume a power above their abilities, is well represented by the known fable of Phaeton: they think they desire fine things for themselves, when they seek their own ruin. In conformity to this, the same Bracton says, that “ * If any man who is unskilful, assume the seat of justice, he falls as from a precipice, &c. and it is the same thing, as if a sword be put into the hand of a madman ;” which cannot but affect the king, as well as those who are chosen by him. If he neglect the functions of his office, “ he does unjustly, and becomes the vicerent of the devil ; for he is the minister of him whose works he does.” This is Bracton’s opinion : but desiring to be a more gentle interpreter of the law, I only wish, that princes would consider the end of their institution ; endeavour to perform it ; measure their own abilities ; content themselves with that power which the laws allow ; and abhor those wretches, who, by flattery and lyes, endeavour to work upon the frailest passions, by which means they draw upon them that hatred of the people, which frequently brings them to destruction.

Tho’ Ulpian’s words, “ Princeps legibus non tenetur,” be granted to have been true in fact, with relation to the Roman empire, in the time when he lived ; yet they can conclude nothing against us. The liberty of Rome had been overthrown long before, by the power of the sword, and the law rendered subservient to the will of the usurpers. They were not Englishmen, but Romans, who lost the battles of Pharsalia and Philippi : the carcases of their senators, not ours, were exposed to the wolves and vulturs : Pompeius, Scipio, Lentulus, Afranius, Petreius, Cato, Cassius, and Brutus, were defenders of the Roman, not the English liberty ; and that of their country, not ours, could only be lost by their defeat. Those who were destroyed by the proscriptions, left Rome, not England, to be enslaved. If the best had gained the victory, it could have been no advantage to us, and their overthrow can be no prejudice. Every nation is to take care of their own laws ; and whether any one has had the wisdom, virtue, fortune, and power, to defend them or not, concerns only themselves. The examples of great and good men, acting freely, deserve consideration ; but they only perish by the ill success of their designs ; and whatsoever is afterwards done by their subdued posterity, ought to have no other effect upon the rest of the world, than to admonish them so to join in the defence of their liberties, as never to be brought under the necessity of acting by the command of one, to the prejudice of themselves, and their country. If the Roman greatness persuade us to put an extraordinary value upon what passed among them, we ought rather rather to examine what they did, said, or thought, when they enjoyed that liberty, which was the mother and nurse of their virtue, than what they suffered, or were forced to say, when they were fallen under that slavery which produced all manner of corruption, and made them the most base and miserable people of the world. SECT. 26.

* Si quis minus sapiens & indoctus sedem judicandi & honestatem judicandi sibi præsumserit, ex alto corruit, &c. & perinde erit ac si gladium poneret in manu furentis. Ibid.

For what concerns us, the actions of our ancestors resemble those of the antient rather than the later Romans: tho' our government be not the same with theirs in form, yet it is in principle; and if we are not degenerated, we shall rather desire to imitate the Romans in the time of their virtue, glory, and felicity, than what they were, in that of their slavery, vice, shame, and misery. In the best times, when "the laws were more powerful than the commands of men," fraud was accounted a crime so detestable as not to be imputed to any but slaves; and he who had sought a power above the law under colour of interpreting it, would have been exposed to scorn or greater punishments, if any can be greater than the just scorn, of the best men. And as neither the Romans, nor any people of the world, have better defended their liberties than the English nation, when any attempt has been made to oppress them by force, they ought to be no less careful to preserve them from the more dangerous efforts of fraud and falshood.

Our ancestors were certainly in a low condition in the time of William the First; many of their best men had perished in the civil wars, or with Harold: their valour was great, but rough, and void of skill: the Normans by frequent expeditions into France, Italy, and Spain, had added subtilty to the boisterous violence of their native climate: William had engaged his faith, but broke it, and turned the power with which he was intrusted to the ruin of those that had trusted him. He destroyed many worthy men, carried others into Normandy, and thought himself master of all. He was crafty, bold, and elated with victory; but the resolution of a brave people was invincible. When their laws and liberties were in danger, they resolved to die, or to defend them; and made him see he could no otherwise preserve his crown and life, than by the performance of his oath, and accomplishing the ends of his election. They neither took him to be the giver or interpreter of their laws, and would not suffer him to violate those of their ancestors. In this way they always continued; and though perhaps they might want skill to fall upon the surest and easiest means of restraining the lusts of princes, yet they maintained their rights so well, that the wisest princes seldom invaded them; and the success of those who were so foolish to attempt it was such, as may justly deter others from following their unprosperous examples. We have had no king since William the First more hardy than Henry the VIIIth, and yet he so intirely acknowledged the power of making, changing, and repealing laws, to be in the parliament, as never to attempt any extraordinary thing otherwise than by their authority. It was not he, but the parliament, that dissolved the abbies: he did not take their lands to himself, but received what the parliament thought fit to give him: he did not reject the supremacy of the pope, nor assume any other power in spiritual matters than the parliament conferred upon

CHAP. III. upon him. The intricacies of his marriages, and the legitimation of his children, were settled by the same power: at least one of his daughters could not inherit the crown upon any other title: they who gave him a power to dispose of the crown by will might have given it to his groom; and he was too haughty to ask it from them, if he had it in himself; which he must have had, if the laws and judicatures had been in his hand.

Hebert's
Henry VIII. This is farther evidenced by what passed in the Tower between Sir Thomas More, and Rich the king's solicitor; who asking, if it would not be treason to oppose Richard Rich, if the parliament should make him king, More said that was "casus levis;" for the parliament could make and depose kings as they thought fit; and then (as more conducing to his own case) asked Rich, if the parliament should enact, "that God should not be God," whether such as did not submit should be esteemed traitors? It is evident, that a man of the acuteness and learning of Sir Tho. More would not have made use of such an argument to avoid the necessity of obeying what the parliament had ordained, by shewing his case to be of a nature far above the power of man, unless it had been confessed by all men, that the parliament could do whatsoever lay within the reach of human power. This may be enough to prove, that the king cannot have a power over the law; and, if he has it not, the power of interpreting laws is absurdly attributed to him, since it is founded upon a supposition, that he can make them, which is false.

S E C T. XXVII.

Magna charta was not the original, but a declaration, of the English liberties. The king's power is not restrained, but created, by that and other laws; and the nation that made them can only correct the defects of them.

I Agree with our author, that "magna charta was not made to restrain the absolute authority;" for no such thing was in being or pretended (the folly of such visions seeming to have been reserved to complete the misfortunes and ignominy of our age;) but it was to assert the native and original liberties of our nation by the confession of the king then being, that neither he nor his successors should any way encroach upon them: and, it cannot be said that the power of kings is diminished by that or any other law; for as they are kings only by law, the law may confer power upon one in particular, or upon him and his successors; but can take nothing from them, because they have nothing except what is given to them. But as that which the law gives, is given by those who make the law, they only are capable of judging whether he to whom they gave it, do well or ill employ that power, and consequently are only fit to correct the defects that may be found in it. Therefore, though I should confess, that faults may be found in many statutes, and that the whole body of them is greatly defective,
it

it will not follow, that the compendious way of referring all to the will of the king should be taken. But what defects soever may be in our law, the disease is not so great to require extreme remedies, and we may hope for a cheaper cure. Our law may possibly have given away too much from the people, and provided only insufficient defences of our liberties against the encroachments of bad princes; but none who are not in judgment and honesty like to our author, can propose for a remedy to the evils that proceed from the error of giving too much, the resignation of all the rest to them. Whatsoever he says, it is evident, that he knows this to be true, when, tho' he denies, that the power of kings can be restrained by acts of parliament, he endeavours to take advantage of such clauses as were either fraudulently inserted by the king's officers, who till the days of Henry the Fifth, for the most part, had the penning of the public acts, or through negligence did not fully explain the intentions of the legislators; which would be to no purpose, if all were put into the hands of the king by a general law from God, that no human power could diminish or enlarge; and as his last shift would obliquely put all into the power of the king, by giving him a right of interpreting the law, and judging such cases as are not clearly decided; which would be equally impertinent, if he had openly and plainly a right of determining all things according to his will.

But what defects soever may be in any statutes, no great inconveniences could probably ensue, if that for annual parliaments was observed, as of right it ought to be. Nothing is more unlikely, than that a great assembly of eminent and chosen men should make a law evidently destructive to their own designs; and no mischief, that might emerge upon the discovery of a mistake, could be so extreme, that the cure might not be deferred till the meeting of the parliament, or at least forty days (in which time the king may call one) if that which the law has fixed seem to be too long. If he fail of this, he performs not his trust; and he that would reward such a breach of it, with a vast and uncontrollable power, may be justly thought equal in madness to our author, who, by forbidding us to examine the titles of kings, and injoining an entire veneration of the power, by what means soever obtained, encourages the worst of men to murder the best of princes, with an assurance, that, if they prosper, they shall enjoy all the honours and advantages that this world can afford.

Princes are not much more beholden to him for the haughty language he puts into their mouths, it having been observed, that the worst are always most ready to use it; and their extravagances having been often chastised by law, sufficiently proves, that their power is not derived from a higher original, than the law of their own countries.

If it were true, that the answer sometimes given by kings to bills presented for their assent, did, as our author says, amount to a denial, it could only shew, that they have a negative voice upon that which is agreed by the parliament, and is far from a power of acting by themselves, being only a check upon the other parts of the government. But indeed it is more than an elusion; and he that does by art obliquely elude, confesses he has not a right absolutely

CHAP. III. absolutely to refuse. It is natural to kings, especially to the worst, to scrue up their authority to the height; and nothing can more evidently prove the defect of it, than the necessity of having recourse to such pitiful evasions, when they are unwilling to do that which is required. But if I should grant, that the words import a denial, and that (notwithstanding those of the coronation oath, "quas vulgus elegerit") they might deny; no more could be inferred from thence, that they are entrusted with a power equal, in that point, to that of either house, and cannot be supreme in our author's sense, unless there were in the same state at the same time three distinct supreme and absolute powers; which is absurd.

His cases, relating to the proceedings of the star-chamber and council-table, do only prove, that some kings have encroached upon the rights of the nation, and been suffered till their excesses growing to be extreme, they turned to the ruin of the ministers that advised them, and sometimes of the kings themselves. But the jurisdiction of the council having been regulated by the statute of the 17 Car. I. and the star-chamber more lately abolished, they are nothing to our dispute.

Such as our author usually impute to treason and rebellion the changes that upon such occasions have ensued; but all impartial men do not only justify them, but acknowledge, that all the crowns of Europe are at this day enjoyed by no other title than such acts solemnly performed by the respective nations, who, either disliking the person that pretended to the crown (tho' next in blood), or the government of the present possessor, have thought fit to prefer another person or family. They also say, that as no government can be so perfect but some defect may be originally in it, or afterwards introduced, none can subsist, unless they be from time to time reduced to their first integrity, by such an exertion of the power of those for whose sake they were instituted, as may plainly shew them to be subject to no power under heaven, but may do whatever appears to be for their own good. And as the safety of all nations consists in rightly placing and measuring this power, such have been found always to prosper, who have given it to those from whom usurpations were least to be feared; who have been least subject to be awed, cheated, or corrupted; and who, having the greatest interest in the nation, were most concerned to preserve its power, liberty, and welfare. This is the greatest trust that can be reposed in men. This power was by the Spartans given to the ephori, and the senate of twenty-eight; in Venice to that which they call "concilio de pregadi;" in Germany, Spain, France, Swedeland, Denmark, Poland, Hungary, Bohemia, Scotland, England, and generally all the nations that have lived under the Gothic polity, it has been in their general assemblies, under the names of diets, cortez, parliaments, senates, and the like. But in what hands soever it is, the power of making, abrogating, changing, correcting, and interpreting laws, has been in the same; kings have been rejected or deposed; the succession of the crown settled, regulated, or changed: and I defy any man to shew me one king amongst all the nations above-mentioned, that has any right to the crown he wears, unless such acts are good.

If this power be not well placed, or rightly proportioned to that which is SECT. 28. given to other magistrates, the state must necessarily fall into great disorders, or the most violent and dangerous means must be frequently used to preserve their liberty. Sparta and Venice have rarely been put to that trouble, because the senates were so much above the kings and dukes in power, that they could without difficulty bring them to reason. The Gothic kings in Spain never ventured to dispute with the nobility; and Witza and Rodrigo exposed the kingdom as a prey to the Moors, rather by weakening it through the neglect of military discipline, joined to their own ignorance and cowardice, and by evil example bringing the youth to resemble them in lewdness and baseness, than by establishing in themselves a power above the law. But in England our ancestors, who seem to have had some such thing in their eye, as balancing the powers, by a fatal mistake placed usually so much in the hands of the king, that whensoever he happened to be bad, his extravagances could not be repressed without great danger. And as this has in several ages cost the nation a vast proportion of generous blood, so it is the cause of our present difficulties, and threatens us with more, but can never deprive us of the rights we inherit from our fathers.

S E C T. XXVIII.

The English nation has always been governed by itself, or its representatives.

HAVING proved, that the people of England have never acknowledged any other human law than their own, and that our parliaments having the power of making and abrogating laws, they only can interpret them, and decide hard cases, it plainly appears there can be no truth in our author's assertion, that "the king is the author, corrector and moderator of both statute and common law:" and nothing can be more frivolous than what he adds, that "neither of them can be a diminution of that natural power which kings have over their people as fathers;" inasmuch as the differences between paternal and monarchical power (as he asserts it) are vast and irreconcilable in principle and practice, as I have proved at large in the former parts of this work.

But lest we should be too proud of the honour he is pleased to do to our parliaments by making use of their authority, he says, "We are first to remember, that till the conquest" (which name, for the glory of our nation, he gives to the coming in of the Normans) "there could be no parliament assembled of the general states, because we cannot learn, that until those days it was intirely united in one." Secondly, he doubts, "Whether the parliament, in the time of the Saxons, were composed of the nobility and clergy, or whether the commons were also called;" but concludes, "there could be no knights of any shires, because there were no shires." Thirdly, "That Henry the First caused the commons first to assemble knights

CHAP. III. "and burgesſes of their own chuſing;" and would make this to be an act of grace and favour from that king: but adds, that "it had been more for the honour of parliaments, if a king whose title to the crown had been better, had been the author of the form of it."

In answer to the first, I do not think myself obliged to insist upon the name or form of the parliament; for the authority of a magistracy proceeds not from the number of years that it has continued, but the rectitude of the institution, and the authority of those that instituted it. The power of Saul, David, and Jeroboam, was the same with that which belonged to the last kings of Israel and Judah. The authority of the Roman consuls, dictators, prætors, and tribunes, was the same as soon as it was established; was as legal and just as that of the kings of Denmark, which is said to have continued above three thousand years. For as time can make nothing lawful or just, that is not so of itself (tho' men are unwilling to change that which has pleased their ancestors, unless they discover great inconveniences in it) that which a people does rightly establish for their own good, is of as much force the first day, as continuance can ever give to it: and therefore in matters of the greatest importance, wise and good men do not so much inquire what has been, as what is good, and ought to be; for that which of itself is evil, by continuance is made worse, and, upon the first opportunity, is justly to be abolished. But if that liberty in which God created man, can receive any strength from continuance, and the rights of Englishmen can be rendered more unquestionable by prescription, I say, that the nations, whose rights we inherit, have ever enjoyed the liberties we claim, and always exercised them in governing themselves popularly, or by such representatives as have been instituted by themselves, from the time they were first known in the world.

The Britons and Saxons lay so long hid in the obscurity that accompanies barbarism, that it is in vain to seek what was done by either in any writers more antient than Cæsar and Tacitus. The first describes the Britons to have been a fierce people, zealous for liberty, and so obstinately valiant in the defence of it, that tho' they wanted skill, and were overpowered by the Romans, their country could no otherwise be subdued, than by the slaughter of all the inhabitants that were able to bear arms. He calls them a free people, inasmuch as they were not like the Gauls, governed by laws made by the great men, but by the people. In his time they chose Cassivellaunus, and afterwards Caractacus, Arviragus, Galgacus, and others, to command them in their wars, but they retained the government in themselves. That no force might be put upon them, they met armed in their general assemblies; and tho' the smaller matters were left to the determination of the chief men, chosen by themselves for that purpose, they reserved the most important (amongst which the chuſing of those men was one) to themselves. When the Romans had brought them low, * they set up certain kings to govern such as were within their territories: but those who defended themselves by the natural strength of their situation, or retired into the North, or the islands, were still still governed by their own customs, and were never acquainted with domestic or foreign slavery. The Saxons, from whom we chiefly derive our original and manners, were no less lovers of liberty, and better understood the ways of defending it. They were certainly the most powerful and valiant people of Germany; and what the Germans performed under Ariovistus, Arminius, and Maroboduus, shews both their force, and their temper. If ever fear entered into the heart of Cæsar, it seems to have been when he had to deal with Ariovistus. The advantages that the brave Germanicus obtained against Arminius, were at least thought equal to the greatest victories that had been gained by any Roman captain, because these nations fought not for riches, or any instruments of luxury and pleasure, which they despised, but for liberty. This was the principle in which they lived, as appears by their words and actions; so that Arminius, when his brother Flavius, who served the Romans, boasted of the increase of his pay, and the marks of honour he had received, in scorn called them the “* rewards of the vilest servitude;” but when he himself endeavoured to usurp a power over the liberty of his country, which he had so bravely defended, he was killed by those he would have oppressed. Tacitus, farther describing the nature of the Germans, shews that the Romans had run greater hazards from them than from the Samnites, Carthaginians, and Parthians; and attributes their bravery to the † liberty they enjoyed; for they are, says he, neither || exhausted by tributes, nor vexed by publicans; and lest this liberty should be violated, “||| the chief men consulted about things of lesser moment; but the most important matters are determined by all.” Whoever would know the opinion of that wise author concerning the German liberty, may read his excellent treatise concerning their manners and customs; but I presume this may be enough to prove, that they lived free under such magistrates as they chose, regulated by such laws as they made, and retained the principal powers of the government in their general or particular councils. Their kings and princes had no other power than was conferred upon them by these ‡ assemblies, who, having all in themselves, could receive nothing from them, who had nothing to give.

* Inter instrumenta servitutis reges habuere. C. Tacit. Agric. vit. c. 14.

It is as easily proved, that the Saxons or Angli, from whom we descend, were eminent among those, whose power, virtue, and love to liberty, the above-mentioned historian so highly extols, inasmuch as, besides what he says in general of the Saxons, he names the Angli; describes their habitation near the Elb, and their religious worship of the goddess Erthum, or the Earth, celebrated in an island lying in the mouth of that river, thought to be Heyligland: in resemblance of which a small one lying over-against Berwick, is

* Vilis servitii præmia. Tac. t. ann. l. ii. 9.

† Quippe gravior est Arfacis regno Germanorum libertas. Tac. mor. Germ. c. 37.

|| Exempti oneribus & collationibus, & tantum in usum præliorum sepositi, velut tela & arma bellis reservantur.

||| De minoribus principes consultant, de majoribus omnes. C. Tacit. de mor. Germ.

‡ Ut turbæ placuit, confidunt armati: silentium per sacerdotes, quibus tum coercendi jus est, imperatur. Mox rex vel princeps, prout ætas cuique, prout nobilitas, prout decus bellorum, prout facundia est, audiuntur, autoritate suadendi, magis quam jubendi potestate. Si displicuit sententia, fremitu aspernantur; si placuit, frameas concutunt, &c. Ibid.

CHAP. III. called Holy island. If they were free in their own country, they must be so when they came hither. The manner of their coming shews they were more likely to impose, than submit to slavery; and if they had not the name of parliament, it was because they did not speak French; or, not being yet joined with the Normans, they had not thought fit to put their affairs into that method: but, having the root of power and liberty in themselves, they could not but have a right of establishing the one in such form as best pleased them, for the preservation of the other.

This being, as I suppose, undeniable, it imports not whether the assemblies, in which the supreme power of each nation did reside, were frequent or rare; composed of many or few persons; sitting all together in one place, or in more; what name they had; or whether every free man did meet and vote in his own person, or a few were delegated by many. For they who have a right inherent in themselves, may resign it to others; and they who can give a power to others, may exercise it themselves, unless they recede from it by their own act; for it is only matter of convenience, of which they alone can be the judges, because it is for themselves only that they judge. If this were not so, it would be very prejudicial to kings: for it is certain, that Cassivellaunus, Caractacus, Arviragus, Galgacus, Hengist, Horfa, and others amongst the Britons and Saxons, what name soever may have been abusively given to them, were only temporary magistrates chosen upon occasion of present wars; but we know of no time in which the Britons had not their great council to determine their most important affairs: and the Saxons in their own country had their councils, where all were present, and in which Tacitus assures us they dispatched their greatest business. These were the same with the mickle-gemots which they afterwards held here, and might have been called by the same name, if Tacitus had spoken Dutch.

If a people therefore have not a power to create at any time a magistracy which they had not before, none could be created at all; for no magistracy is eternal: and if for the validity of the constitution it be necessary, that the beginning must be unknown, or that no other could have been before it, the monarchy amongst us cannot be established upon any right; for, tho' our ancestors had their councils and magistrates, as well here as in Germany, they had no monarchs. This appears plainly by the testimony of Cæsar and Tacitus; and our later histories shew, that as soon as the Saxons came into this country, they had their mickle-gemots, which were general assemblies of the noble and free-men, who had in themselves the power of the nation: and tho', when they increased in numbers, they erected seven kingdoms, yet every one retained the same usage within itself. These assemblies were evidently the same in power with our parliaments; and tho' they differed in name or form, it matters not; for they who could act in the one, could not but have a power of instituting the other; that is, the same people that could meet together in their own persons, and according to their own pleasure order all matters relating to themselves, whilst three or four countries only were under one government, and their numbers were not so great, great, or their habitation so far distant, that they might not meet all together SECT. 28. without inconvenience, with the same right might depute others to represent them, when, being joined in one, no place was capable of receiving so great a multitude, and that the frontiers would have been exposed to the danger of foreign invasions, if any such thing had been practised.

But if the authority of parliaments, for many ages representing the whole nation, were less to be valued (as our author insinuates), because they could not represent the whole, when it was not joined in one body, that of kings must come to nothing; for there could be no one king over all, when the nation was divided into seven distinct governments: and it is most absurd to think, that the nation, which had seven great councils, or micklegemots, at the same time they had seven kingdoms, could not as well unite the seven councils as the seven kingdoms into one. It is to as little purpose to say, that the nation did not unite itself, but the several parcels came to be inherited by one; for that one could inherit no more from the others than what they had; and the seven being only magistrates set up by the micklegemots, &c. the one must be so also. And it is neither reasonable to imagine, nor possible to prove, that a fierce nation, jealous of liberty, and who had obstinately defended it in Germany, against all invaders, should conquer this country to enslave themselves, and purchase nothing by their valour but that servitude which they abhorred; or be less free when they were united into one state, than they had been when they were divided into seven; and least of all, that one man could first subdue his own people, and then all the rest, when, by endeavouring to subdue his own, he had broken the trust reposed in him, and lost the right conferred upon him, and without them had not power to subdue any. But as it is my fate almost ever to dissent from our author, I affirm, that the variety of government, which is observed to have been amongst the Saxons, who in some ages were divided, in others united; sometimes under captains, in other times under kings; sometimes meeting personally in the micklegemots, sometimes by their delegates in the wittenagemots; does evidently testify, that they ordered all things according to their own pleasure; which being the utmost act of liberty, it remained inviolable under all those changes, as we have already proved by the confession of Offa, Ina, Alfred, Canutus, Edward, and other particular, as well as universal kings: and we may be sure those of the Norman race can have no more power, since they came in by the same way, and swore to govern by the same laws.

2. I am no way concerned in our author's doubt, "whether parliaments did, in those days, consist of nobility and clergy; or whether the commons were also called." For if it were true, as he asserts, that, according to the eternal law of God and nature, there can be no government in the world but that of an absolute monarch, whose sovereign majesty can be diminished by no law or custom, there could be no parliaments, or other magistracies, that did not derive their power and being from his will. But having proved, that the Saxons had their general councils and assemblies, when they had no kings; that by them kings were made, and the greatest affairs determined,

CHAP. III. terminated, whether they had kings or not; it can be of no importance, whether in one or more ages the commons had a part in the government, or not. For the same power that instituted a parliament without them, might, when they thought fit, receive them into it: or rather, if they who had the government in their hands, did, for reasons known to themselves, recede from the exercise of it, they might resume it when they pleased.

Nevertheless it may be worth our pains to inquire, what our author means by nobility. If such, as at this day, by means of patents obtained for money, or by favour, without any regard to merit in the persons, or their ancestors, are called dukes, marquises, &c. I give him leave to impute as late and base an original to them as he pleases, without fearing, that the rights of our nation can thereby be impaired; and am content, that if the king do not think fit to support the dignity of his own creatures, they may fall to the ground. But if by noblemen we are to understand such as have been ennobled by the virtues of their ancestors, manifested in services done to their country, I say, that all nations, amongst whom virtue has been esteemed, have had a great regard to them and their posterity: and tho' kings, when they were made, have been intrusted by the Saxons, and other nations, with a power of ennobling those, who, by services rendered to their country, might deserve that honour; yet the body of the nobility was more antient than such; for it had been equally impossible to take * kings (according to Tacitus) out of the nobility, if there had been no nobility, as to take captains for their virtue, if there had been no virtue; and princes could not, without breach of that trust, confer honours upon those that did not deserve them; which is so true, that this practice was objected as the greatest crime against † Vortigern, the last and the worst of the British kings: and tho' he might pretend (according to such cavils as are usual in our time) that the judgment of those matters was referred to him; yet the world judged of his crimes, and when he had rendered himself odious to God and men by them, he perished in them, and brought destruction upon his country, that had suffered them too long.

As among the Turks, and most of the eastern tyrannies, there is no nobility, and no man has any considerable advantage above the common people, unless by the immediate favour of the prince; so in all the legal kingdoms of the north, the strength of the government has always been placed in the nobility; and no better defence has been found against the encroachments of ill kings, than by setting up an order of men, who, by holding large territories, and having great numbers of tenants and dependents, might be able to restrain the exorbitances, that either the kings, or the commons, might run into. For this end Spain, Germany, France, Poland, Denmark, Sweden, Scotland, and England, were almost wholly divided into lordships under feveral names, by which every particular possessor owed allegiance (that is, SECT. 28. such an obedience as the law requires) to the king, and he reciprocally swore to perform that which the same law exacted from him.

* Reges ex nobilitate, duces ex virtute sumere. Tac. mor. Germ. c. 7.

† Sublimato eo cœpit lues omnium scelerum crescere: sæviebat scurrilis nequitia, odium veritatis, &c. ut vas omnium scelerum solus videretur Vortigernus; &, quod maxime regiæ honestati contrarium est, nobiles deprimens, & moribus & sanguine ignobiles extollens, Deo & hominibus efficitur odiosus. Mat. Westm. An. 446.

When these nations were converted to the christian religion, they had a great veneration for the clergy; and, not doubting that the men whom they esteemed holy, would be just, thought their liberties could not be better secured, than by joining those who had the direction of their consciences, to the noblemen who had the command of their forces. This succeeded so well (in relation to the defence of the public rights) that in all the forementioned states, the bishops, abbots, &c. were no less zealous or bold in defending the public liberty, than the best and greatest of the lords: and if it were true, that things being thus established, the commons did neither personally, nor by their representatives, enter into the general assemblies, it could be of no advantage to kings; for such a power as is above-mentioned, is equally inconsistent with the absolute sovereignty of kings, if placed in the nobility and clergy, as if the commons had a part. If the king has all, no other man, nor number of men, can have any. If the nobility and clergy have the power, the commons may have their share also. But I affirm, that those whom we now call commons, have always had a part in the government, and their place in the councils that managed it; for if there was a distinction, it must have been by patent, birth, or tenure.

As for patents, we know they began long after the coming of the Normans, and those that now have them cannot pretend to any advantage on account of birth or tenure, beyond many of those who have them not. Nay, besides the several branches of the families that now enjoy the most antient honours, which consequently are as noble as they, and some of them of the elder houses, we know many that are now called commoners, who in antiquity and eminency are no way inferior to the chief of the titular nobility: and nothing can be more absurd, than to give a prerogative of birth to Craven, Tufton, Hyde, Bennet, Osborn, and others, before the Cliftons, Hampdens, Courtenays, Pelhams, St. Johns, Baintons, Wilbrahams, Hungerfords, and many others. And if the tenures of their estates be considered, they have the same, and as antient as any of those who go under the names of duke, or marquis. I forbear to mention the sordid ways of attaining to titles in our days; but whoever will take the pains to examine them, shall find, that they rather defile than ennoble the possessors. And whereas men are truly ennobled only by virtue, and respect is due to such as are descended from those who have bravely served their country, because it is presumed (till they shew the contrary), that they will resemble their ancestors, these modern courtiers, by their names and titles, frequently oblige us to call to mind such things as are not to be mentioned without blushing. Whatever the antient noblemen of England were, we are sure they were not such as these. And tho' it should be confessed, that no others than dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons, had their places in the councils mentioned by Cæsar and Tacitus, or in the great assemblies of the Saxons, it could be of no advantage to such as
now

CHAP. III. now are called by those names. They were the titles of offices conferred upon those, who did and could best conduct the people in time of war, give counsel to the king, administer justice, and perform other public duties; but were never made hereditary except by abuse; much less were they sold for money, or given as recompences of the vilest services. If the antient order be totally inverted, and the ends of its institution perverted, they who from thence pretend to be distinguished from other men, must build their claim upon something very different from antiquity.

This being sufficient (if I mistake not) to make it appear, that the antient councils of our nation did not consist of such as we now call noblemen, it may be worth our pains to examine, of what sort of men they did consist: and tho' I cannot much rely upon the credit of Camden, which he has forfeited by a great number of untruths, I will begin with him, because he is cited by our author. If we will believe him, "(a) that which the Saxons called wittenagemot, we may justly name parliament, which has the supreme and most sacred authority of making, abrogating, and interpreting laws, and generally of all things relating to the safety of the commonwealth." This wittenagemot was, according to William of Malmshbury, "(b) the general meeting of the senate and people;" and Sir Harry Spelman calls it, "(c) the general council of the clergy and people." In the assembly at Calcuth it was decreed by the archbishops, bishops, abbots, dukes, senators, and the people of the land "(populo terræ)," that "(d) kings should be elected by the priests and elders of the people." By these Offa, Ina, and others, were made kings; and Alfred, in his will, acknowledged his (e) crown from them. Edgar was elected by all the people, and not long after deposed by them, and again restored in a (f) general assembly. These things being sometimes said to be done by the assent of the barons of the kingdom, Camden says, that "under the name of the (g) baronage, all the orders of the kingdom are in a manner comprehended;" and it cannot be otherwise understood, if we consider, that those called noblemen, or the nobility of England, are often, by the historians, said to be "(infinita multitudo)" an infinite multitude.

If any man ask how the nobility came to be so numerous; I answer, that the northern nations, who were perpetually in arms, put a high esteem upon military valour; fought by conquest to acquire better countries than their own; valued themselves according to the numbers of men they could bring into the field; and to distinguish them from villains, called those noblemen,

(a) Quod Saxones olim wittenagemot, parliamentum & pananglicum recte dici possit, summamque & sacrosanctam habet auctoritatem in legibus ferendis, antiquandis, conformandis, interpretandis, & in omnibus quæ ad reipublicæ salutem spectant. Brit. fol. 63.

(b) Generalis senatus & populi conventus. Malmf.

(c) Commune concilium tam cleri quam populi. Spelm.

(d) Ut reges à sacerdotibus & senioribus populi eligantur.

(e) Quam Deus & principes cum senioribus populi misericorditer & benigne dederunt.

(f) Coram omni multitudine populi Anglorum.

(g) Nomine baronagii omnes quodammodo regni ordines continentur. Camd.

who

who nobly defended and enlarged their dominions by war; and for a reward of their services, in the division of lands gained by conquest, they distributed to them freeholds, under the obligation of continuing the same service to their country. This appears by the name of knights service, a knight being no more than a soldier, and a knight's fee no more than was sufficient to maintain one. It is plain, that knighthood was always esteemed nobility; so that no man, of what quality soever, thought a knight inferior to him, and those of the highest birth could not act as noblemen till they were knighted. Among the Goths in Spain, the cutting off the hair (which being long, was the mark of knighthood) was accounted a degrading, and looked upon to be so great a mark of infamy, that he who had suffered it, could never bear any honour or office in the commonwealth; and there was no dignity so high, but every knight was capable of it. There was no distinction of men above it, and even to this day "baron," or "varon," in their language, signifies no more than "vir" in Latin, which is not properly given to any man, unless he be free. The like was in France, till the coming in of the third race of kings, in which time the 12 peers (of whom 6 only were laymen) were raised to a higher dignity, and the commands annexed made hereditary; but the honour of knighthood was thereby no-way diminished. Tho' there were dukes, earls, marquises, and barons, in the time of Froissart, yet he usually calls them knights: and Philip de Commines, speaking of the most eminent men of his time, calls them good, wise, or valiant knights. Even to this day the name of gentleman comprehends all that is raised above the common people; Henry the fourth usually called himself the first gentleman in France, and it is an ordinary phrase among them, when they speak of a gentleman of good birth, to say, "Il est noble comme le roy; he is as noble as the king." In their general assembly of estates, "the chamber of the noblesse," which is one of three, is composed of the deputies sent by the gentry of every province; and in the enquiry, made about the year 1668. concerning nobility, no notice was taken of such as had assumed the titles of earl, marquis, viscount, or baron, but only of those who called themselves gentlemen; and if they could prove that name to belong to them, they were left to use the other titles as they pleased. When duels were in fashion (as all know they were lately) no man, except the princes of the blood, and marshals of France, could with honour refuse a challenge from any gentleman: the first, because it was thought unfit, that he who might be king, should fight with a subject to the danger of the commonwealth, which might, by that means, be deprived of its head: the others being by their office commanders of the nobility, and judges of all the controversies relating to honour, that happen amongst them, cannot reasonably be brought into private contests with any. In Denmark, nobleman and gentleman is the same thing; and till the year 1660. they had the principal part of the government in their hands. When Charles Gustavus, king of Sweden, invaded Poland in the year 1655. it is said, that there were above three hundred thousand gentlemen in arms to resist him. This is the nobility of that country, kings are chosen by them: every one of them will say, as in France, "he is noble as CHAP. III. "the king." The last king was a private man among them, not thought to have had more than four hundred pounds a year. He who now reigns was not at all above him in birth or estate, till he had raised himself by great services done for his country in many wars; and there was not one gentleman in the nation who might not have been chosen as well as he, if it had pleased the assembly that did it.

Selden's tit.
of hon. p. 2.
c. 5.

This being the nobility of the northern nations, and the true baronage of England, it is no wonder that they were called "nobiles;" the most eminent among them "magnates, principes, procures;" and so numerous, that they were esteemed to be "multitudo infinita." One place was hardly able to contain them; and the inconveniences of calling them all together appeared to be so great, that they in time chose rather to meet by representatives, than every one in his own person. The power therefore remaining in them, it matters not what method they observed in the execution. They who had the substance in their hands, might give it what form they pleased. Our author sufficiently manifests his ignorance, in saying, there could be no knights of the shires in the time of the Saxons, because there were no shires; for the very word is Saxon, and we find the names of Berkshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, and others, most frequently in the writings of those times; and dukes, earls, thanes, or aldermen, appointed to command the forces, and look to the distribution of justice in them. Selden cites Ingulphus for saying, that "Alfred was the first that changed the provinces, &c. into counties:" but refutes him, and proves, that the distinction of the land into shires or counties (for shire signified no more than the share or part committed to the care of the earl or comes) was far more antient. Whether the first divisions by the Saxons were greater or lesser than the shires or counties now are, is nothing to the question: they who made them to be as they were, could have made them greater or lesser, as they pleased. And whether they did immediately, or some ages after that distinction, cease to come to their great assemblies, and rather chuse to send their deputies; or whether such deputies were chosen by counties, cities, and boroughs, as in our days, or in any other manner; can be of no advantage or prejudice to the cause that I maintain. If the power of the nation, when it was divided into seven kingdoms, or united under one, did reside in the micklegemots or wittenagemots; if these consisted of the nobility and people, who were sometimes so numerous, that no one place could well contain them; and if the preference given to the chief among them was on account of the offices they executed, either in relation to war or justice, which no man can deny; I have as much as serves for my purpose. It is indifferent to me, whether they were called earls, dukes, aldermen, heretogs, or thanes; for it is certain, that the titular nobility, now in mode amongst us, has no resemblance to this antient nobility of England. The novelty therefore is on the other side, and that of the worst sort; because, by giving the name of noblemen (which antiently belonged to such as had the greatest interests in nations, and were the supporters of their liberty) to court-creatures, who often have none, and either acquire their honours by money, or are preferred for servile, and sometimes impure services ren-

rendered to the person that reigns, or else for mischiefs done to their country, the constitution has been wholly inverted, and the trust reposed in the kings (who in some measure had the disposal of offices and honours) mis-employed. This is farther aggravated by appropriating the name of noblemen solely to them; whereas the nation having been anciently divided only into freemen or noblemen (who were the same) and villains; the first were, as Tacitus says of their ancestors the Germans, “* exempted from burdens “ and contributions, and reserved like arms for the uses of war,” whilst the others were little better than slaves, appointed to cultivate the lands, or to other servile offices. And I leave any reasonable man to judge, whether the latter condition be that of those we now call commoners. Nevertheless, he that will believe the title of noblemen still to belong to those only who are so by patent, may guess how well our wars would be managed, if they were left solely to such as are so by that title. If this be approved, his majesty may do well with his hundred and fifty noblemen, eminent in valour and military experience as they are known to be, to make such wars as may fall upon him, and leave the despised commons, under the name of villains, to provide for themselves, if the success do not answer his expectations. But if the commons are as free as the nobles, many of them in birth equal to the patentees, in estate superior to most of them; and that it is not only expected they should assist him in wars with their persons and purses, but acknowledged by all, that the strength and virtue of the nation is in them; it must be confessed, that they are true noblemen of England, and that all the privileges, antiently enjoyed by such, must necessarily belong to them, since they perform the offices to which they were annexed. This shews how the nobility were justly said to be almost infinite in number, so that no one place was able to contain them. The Saxon armies, that came over into this country to a wholesome and generative climate, might well increase in four or five ages to those vast numbers, as the Franks, Goths, and others, had done in Spain, France, Italy, and other parts; and when they were grown so numerous, they found themselves necessarily obliged to put the power into the hands of representatives chosen by themselves, which they had before exercised in their own persons. But these two ways differing rather in form than essentially, the one tending to democracy, the other to aristocracy, they are equally opposite to the absolute dominion of one man reigning for himself, and governing the nation as his patrimony; and equally assert the rights of the people to put the government into such a form as best pleases themselves.
This was suitable to what they had practised in their own country: “De “ minoribus consultant principes, de majoribus omnes.” Nay, even these “ smaller matters” cannot be said properly to relate to the king; for he is but one, and the word “principes” is in the plural number, and can only signify such principal men, as the same author says were chosen by the general

* Exempti oneribus & collationibus, & tantum in usum præliorum repositi, veluti tela & arma bellis reservantur. Corn. Tacit. de morib. Germ.

CHAP. III. assemblies to do justice, &c. and to each of them one hundred comites joined, not only to give advice, but authority to their actions.

The word "omnes," spoken by a Roman, must likewise be understood as it was used by them, and imports all the citizens, or such as made up the body of the commonwealth. If he had spoken of Rome or Athens whilst they remained free, he must have used the same word (because all those, of whom the city consisted, had votes), how great soever the number of slaves or strangers might have been. The Spartans are rightly said to have gained, lost, and recovered, the lordship or principality of Greece. They were all lords in relation to their helots, and so were the Dorians in relation to that sort of men, which under several names they kept, as the Saxons did their villains, for the performance of the offices which they thought too mean for those, who were ennobled by liberty, and the use of arms, by which the commonwealth was defended and enlarged. Tho' the Romans scorned to give the title of lord to those, who had usurped a power over their lives and fortunes; yet every one of them was a lord in relation to his own servants, and all together are often called "\ lords of the world:*" the like is seen almost every-where. The government of Venice, having continued for many ages in the same families, has ennobled them all. No phrase is more common in Switzerland, than "the lords of Bern," or "the lords of Zurich," and other places, tho' perhaps there is not a man amongst them, who pretends to be a gentleman, according to the modern sense put upon that word. The states of the United Provinces are called high and mighty lords, and the same title is given to each of them in particular. Nay, the word heer, which signifies lord both in high and low Dutch, is as common as monsieur in France, signor in Italy, or sennor in Spain; and is given to every one, who is not of a sordid condition, but especially to soldiers: and tho' a common soldier be now a much meaner thing than it was antiently, no man speaking to a company of soldiers in Italian, uses any other style than "signori soldati;" and the like is done in other languages. It is not therefore to be thought strange, if the Saxons, who in their own country had scorned any other employment than that of the sword, should think themselves farther ennobled, when by their arms they had acquired a great and rich country, and driven out or subdued the former inhabitants. They might well distinguish themselves from the villains they brought with them, or the Britons they had enslaved. They might well be called "magnates, procures regni, nobiles, Angliæ nobilitas, barones;" and the assemblies of them justly called "concilium regni generale, universitas totius Angliæ nobilium, universitas baronagii," according to the variety of times, and other occurrences. We have such footsteps remaining of the name of baron, as plainly shew the signification of it. The barons of London and the Cinque Ports are known to be only the freemen of those places. In the petty court-barons, every man who may be of a jury is a baron. These are noblemen; for there are noble nations as well as noble men in nations. The Mammalukes accounted themselves to be all noble, tho' born slaves; and when they had ennobled themselves by by the use of arms, they looked upon the noblest of the Egyptians, as their slaves. Tertullian writing, not to some eminent men, but to the whole people of Carthage, calls them, "antiquitate nobiles, nobilitate felices." Such were the Saxons, ennobled by a perpetual application to those exercises that belong to noblemen, and an abhorrence to any thing that is vile and fordid.

\ Romanos rerum dominos. Virg.*

Lest this should seem far fetched, to those who please themselves with cavilling, they are to know, that the same general councils are expressed, by other authors, in other words. They are called " * The general council of " the bishops, noblemen, counts, all the wise men, elders, and people, of " the whole kingdom," in the time of Ina. In that of Edward the elder, " † The great council of the bishops, abbots, noblemen, and people." William of Malmſbury calls them, " ‡ The general senate and assembly of " the people." Sometimes they are in short, called " clergy and people ;" but all express the same power, neither received from, nor limitable by kings, who are always said to be chosen, or made, and sometimes deposed by them. William the Norman found and left the nation in this condition : Henry the second, John, and Henry the third, who had nothing but what was conferred upon them by the same clergy and people, did so too. Magna charta could give nothing to the people, who, in themselves, had all ; and only reduced into a small volume, the rights which the nation was resolved to maintain ; brought the king to confess, they were perpetually inherent, and time out of mind enjoyed, and to swear that he would no way violate them : if he did, he was, " ipso facto," excommunicated ; and, being thereby declared to be an execrable perjured person, they knew how to deal with him. This act has been confirmed by thirty parliaments ; and the proceedings with kings, who have violated their oaths, as well before as after the time of Henry the third, which have been already mentioned, are sufficient to shew, that England has always been governed by itself, and never acknowledged any other lord, than such as they thought fit to set up.

S E C T. XXIX.

The king was never master of the foil.

THOSE who, without regard to truth, resolve to insist upon such points, as they think may serve their designs, when they find it cannot be denied, that the powers before-mentioned have been exercised by the English, and other nations, say, that they were the concessions of kings, who, being masters of the foil, might bestow parcels upon some persons, with such conditions as they pleased, retaining to themselves the supreme dominion of the whole : and, having * Commune concilium episcoporum, procerum, comitum, & omnium sapientum, seniorum & populorum totius regni. Bed. Eccl. hist.

† Magnum concilium episcoporum, abbatum, fidelium, procerum, & populorum.

‡ Senatum generalem & populi conventum,

CHAP. III. having already, as they think, made them the fountains of honour, they proceed to make them also the fountains of property; and, for proof of this, alledge, that all lands, though held of mean lords, do by their tenures at last result upon the king, as the head from whom they are enjoyed. This might be of force, if it were true: but matters of the highest importance requiring a most evident proof, we are to examine, first, if it be possible; and in the next place, if it be true.

1. For the first; no man can give what he has not. Whoever therefore will pretend, that the king has bestowed this propriety, must prove, that he had it in himself. I confess, that the kings of Spain and Portugal obtained from the pope grants of the territories they possessed in the West-Indies; and this might be of some strength, if the pope, as vicar of Christ, had an absolute dominion over the whole earth; but if that fail, the whole falls to the ground, and he is ridiculously liberal of that, which no way belongs to him. My business is not to dispute that point; but, before it can have any influence upon our affairs, our kings are to prove, that they are lords of England upon the same title, or some other equivalent to it. When that is done, we shall know upon whom they have a dependence, and may at leisure consider, whether we ought to acknowledge, and submit to, such a power, or give reasons for our refusal. But, there being no such thing in our present case, their property must be grounded upon something else, or, we may justly conclude, they have none.

In order to this, it is hardly worth the pains, to search into the obscure remains of the British histories: for when the Romans deserted our island, they did not confer the right they had (whether more or less) upon any man, but left the enjoyment of it to the poor remainders of the nation, and their own established colonies, who were grown to be one people with the natives. The Saxons came under the conduct of Hengist and Horfa, who seem to have been sturdy pirates; but did not (that I can learn) bear any characters in their persons, of the so much admired sovereign majesty, that should give them an absolute dominion or propriety, either in their own country, or any other they should set their feet upon. They came with about a hundred men; and, chusing rather to serve Vortigern, than to depend upon what they could get by rapine at sea, lived upon a small proportion of land, by him allotted to them. Tho' this seems to be but a slender encouragement, yet it was enough to invite many others to follow their example and fortune; so that their number increasing, the county of Kent was given to them, under the obligation of serving the Britons in their wars. Not long after, lands in Northumberland were bestowed upon another company of them, with the same condition. This was all the title they had to what they enjoyed, till they treacherously killed four hundred and sixty, or, as William of Malmshury says, three hundred principal men of the British nobility, and made Vortigern prisoner, who had been so much their benefactor, that he seems never to have deserved well, but from them, and to have incensed the Britons by the favour he shewed them, as much as by the worst of his vices. And, certainly, actions of this kind, composed of falshood and cruelty, can never create a right, in the opinion of any better men, than Filmer and his disciples, who think

Mat. West.
Flor. hist.

Ibid.

think that the power only is to be regarded, and not the means by which it is obtained. But, tho' it should be granted, that a right had been thus acquired, it must accrue to the nation, not to Hengist and Horfa. If such an acquisition be called a conquest, the benefit must belong to those that conquered. This was not the work of two men; and those who had been free at home, can never be thought to have left their own country, to fight as slaves, for the glory and profit of two men in another. It cannot be said, that their wants compelled them; for their leaders suffered the same, and could not be relieved, but by their assistance; and whether their enterprize was good or bad, just or unjust, it was the same to all: no one man could have any right, peculiar to himself, unless they who gained it, did confer it upon him: and it is no way probable, that they, who in their own country had kept their princes within very narrow limits, as has been proved, should resign themselves, and all they had, as soon as they came hither. But we have already shewn, that they always continued most obstinate defenders of their liberty, and the government to which they had been accustomed; that they managed it by themselves, and acknowledged no other laws than their own. Nay, if they had made such a resignation of their right, as was necessary to create one in their leaders, it would be enough to overthrow the proposition; for it is not then the leader that gives to the people, but the people to the leader. If the people had not a right to give what they did give, none was conferred upon the receiver; if they had a right, he that should pretend to derive a benefit from thence, must prove the grant, that the nature and intention of it may appear.

To the second: if it be said, that records testify all grants to have been originally from the king; I answer, that though it were confessed (which I absolutely deny, and affirm that our rights and liberties are innate, inherent, and enjoyed time out of mind, before we had kings), it could be nothing to the question, which is, concerning reason and justice; and, if they are wanting, the defect can never be supplied by any matter of fact, tho' never so clearly proved. Or, if a right be pretended to be grounded upon a matter of fact, the thing to be proved is, that the people did really confer such a right upon the first, or some other kings: and, if no such thing do appear, the proceedings of one or more kings, as if they had it, can be of no value. But, in the present case, no such grant is pretended to have been made, either to the first, or to any of the following kings: the right they had not, their successors could not inherit, and consequently cannot have it, or, at most, no better title to it, than that of usurpation.

But, as they who inquire for truth, ought not to deny or conceal any thing, I may grant that manors, &c. were enjoyed by tenure from kings; but that will no-way prejudice the cause I defend, nor signify more, than that the countries which the Saxons had acquired, were to be divided among them; and, to avoid the quarrels that might arise, if every man took upon him to seize what he could, a certain method of making the distribution was necessarily to be fixed; and it was fit, that every man should have something in
his

CHAP. III. his own hands, to justify his title to what he possessed, according to which controversies should be determined. This must be testified by somebody, and no man could be so fit, or of so much credit, as he who was chief among them; and this is no more than is usual in all the societies of the world. The mayor of every corporation, the speaker or clerk of the house of peers, or house of commons, the first president of every parliament, or presidial in France; the consul, burgermaster, advoyer, or bailiff, in every free town of Holland, Germany, or Switzerland; sign the public acts, that pass in those places. The dukes of Venice and Genoa do the like, tho' they have no other power, than what is conferred upon them, and, of themselves, can do little or nothing. The grants of our kings are of the same nature, tho' the words "mero motu nostro" seem to imply the contrary; for kings speak always in the plural number, to shew that they do not act for themselves, but for the societies over which they are placed; and all the veneration that is, or can be, given to their acts, does not exalt them, but those from whom their authority is derived, and for whom they are to execute. The tyrants of the East, and other barbarians, whose power is most absolute, speak in the single number, as appears by the decrees of Nabuchodonosor, Cyrus, Darius, and Ahasuerus, recited in Scripture, with others that we hear of daily from those parts: but, wheresoever there is any-thing of civility or regularity in government, the prince uses the plural, to shew that he acts in a public capacity. From hence, De jur. bell. says Grotius, the rights of kings to send ambassadors, make leagues, &c. do arise: the confederacies made by them do not terminate with their lives, because they are not for themselves; they speak not in their own persons, but as representing their people: and " * a king who is deprived of his kingdom, loses the right of sending ambassadors," because he can no longer speak for those, who, by their own consent, or by a foreign force, are cut off from him. The question is, not whether such a one be justly or unjustly deprived (for that concerns only those who did it; or suffer it), but whether he can oblige the people; and it is ridiculous for any nation to treat with a man, that cannot perform what shall be agreed, or for him to stipulate that which can oblige, and, will be made good, only by himself.

But, tho' much may be left to the discretion of kings, in the distribution of lands, and the like, yet it no-way diminishes the right of the people, nor confers any upon them, otherwise to dispose of what belongs to the public, than may tend to the common good, and the accomplishment of those ends, for which they are entrusted. Nay, if it were true, that a conquered country did belong to the crown, the king could not dispose of it, because it is annexed to the office, and not alienable by the person. This is not only found in regular mixed monarchies (as in Sweden, where the grants made by the last kings have been lately rescinded by the general assembly of estates, as contrary to law), but even in the most absolute, as in France, where the present king, who has stretched his power to the utmost, has lately acknowledged, that he cannot do it; and, according to the known maxim of the state,

* Rex regno exutus, jus legandi amittit. Grot.

state, that the demesnes of the crown, which are designed for the defraying of public charges, cannot be alienated, all the grants made within the last fifteen years have been annulled; even those who had bought lands of the crown have been called to account, and the sums given being compared with the profits received, and a moderate interest allowed to the purchasers, so much of the principal as remained due to them has been repaid, and the lands resumed.

SECT. 30.

*****

S E C T. XXX.

Henry the First was king of England by as good a title as any of his predecessors or successors.

HAVING made it appear, as I suppose, that the antient nobility of England was composed of such men as had been ennobled by bearing arms in the defence or enlargement of the commonwealth; that the dukes, earls, &c. were those who commanded them; that they and their dependents received lands for such services, under an obligation of continuing to render the like, and according to their several degrees and proportions, to provide and maintain horses, arms, and men, for the same uses; it cannot be denied, that they were such gentlemen, and lords of manors, as we now call commoners, together with the freeholders, and such as in war were found most able to be their leaders. Of these the micklelegemots, wittenagemots, and other public assemblies, did consist; and nothing can be more absurd than to assign the names and rights of duke, earl, and viscount, which were names of offices, to those who have not the offices, and are no-way fit for them. If our author therefore had said, that such as these, who had always composed the great councils of our nation, had, in favour of Henry the First, bestowed the crown upon him, as they had done upon his father and brother, I should agree with him: but it is the utmost extravagance to say, that he who had neither title nor possession, should give the power to those who had always been in the possession of it, and exercised it in giving to him whatsoever he had. But I most wonder he should so far forget himself, to call this Henry a usurper, and detract from the validity of his acts, because he had no title; whereas there neither is, was, or can be, a usurper, if there be any truth in his doctrine: for he plainly tells us, we are only to look to the power, and not at all to the means and ways by which it is obtained; and making no difference between a king and a tyrant, enjoins an equal submission to the commands of both. If this were only a slip of his pen, and he did really take this Henry to be a usurper, because he had not a good title, I should desire to know the marks by which a lawful king is distinguished from a usurper, and in what a just title does consist. If he place it in an hereditary succession, we ought to be informed, whether this right must be deduced

E e e

CHAP. III. deduced from one universal lord of mankind, or from a particular lord of every people: if from the universal lord, the same descent that gives him a right to the dominion of any one country, enslaves the whole world to him: if from the particular lord of one place, proof must be given how he came to be so: for if there was a defect in the first, it can never be repaired, and the possession is no more than a continued usurpation. But having already proved the absurdity of any pretence to either, I shall forbear the repetition, and only say, that if the course of succession may never be justly interrupted, the family of Meroveus could not have had any right to the crown of France; Pepin was a usurper, if it must for ever have continued in the descendents of Meroveus; and Hugh Capet could have no title, if the race of Pepin might not be dispossessed. I leave our author to dispute this point with the king of France; and when he has so far convinced him that he is a usurper, as to persuade him to resign his crown to the house of Austria, claiming from Pharamond, or to that of Lorrain, as descended from Pepin, I can give him half a dozen more knots, which will not be with less difficulty untied, and which, instead of establishing the titles of such kings as are known to us, will overthrow them all, unless a right be given to usurpation, or the consent of a people do confer it.

But if there be such a thing as a usurper, and a rule by which men may judge of usurpation, it is not only lawful, but necessary, for us to examine the titles of such as go under the name of kings, that we may know whether they are truly so or not, lest through ignorance we chance to give the veneration and obedience that is due to a king, to one who is not a king, and deny it to him, who by an unintermittible line of descent is our natural lord, and thereby prefer the worst of men, and our most bitter enemy, before the person we ought to look upon as our father: and if this prove dangerous to one or more kings, it is our author's fault, not mine.

If there be no usurper, nor rule of distinguishing him from a lawful prince, Filmer is the worst of all triflers and impostors, who grounds his arguments in the most serious matters upon what he esteems to be false; but the truth is, he seems to have set himself against humanity and common sense, as much as against law and virtue: and if he who so frequently contradicts himself, can be said to mean any thing, he would authorize rapine and murder, and persuade us to account those to be rightful kings, who, by treachery, and other unjust means, overthrow the right of descent, which he pretends to esteem sacred, as well as the liberties of nations, which by better judges are thought to be so, and gives the odious name of usurpation to the advancement of one who is made king by the consent of a willing people.

But if Henry the First were a usurper, I desire to know whether the same name belongs to all our kings, or which of them deserves a better, that we may understand whose acts ought to be reputed legal, and to whose descent we owe veneration, or whether we are wholly exempted from all: for I cannot see a possibility of fixing the guilt of usurpation upon Henry the First, without involving many, if not all our kings, in the same.

If his title was not good, because his brother Robert was still living, that of Rufus is by the same reason overthrown; and William their father, being a bastard, could have none. This fundamental defect could never be repaired; for the successors could inherit no more than the right of the first, which was nothing. Stephen could deduce no title either from Norman or Saxon; whatsoever Henry the Second pretended must be from his mother Maud, and any other might have been preferred before her as well as he. If her title was from the Normans, it must be void, since they had none, and the story of Edgar Atheling is too impertinent to deserve mention. But, however, it could be of no advantage to her; for David king of Scotland, brother to her mother, from whom only her title could be derived, was then alive with his son Henry, who, dying not long after, left three sons, and three daughters, whose posterity, being distributed into many families of Scotland, remains to this day; and, if proximity of blood is to be considered, ought always to have been preferred before her, and her descendents, unless there be a law, that gives the preference to daughters before sons. What right soever Henry the Second had, it must necessarily have perished with him, all his children having been begotten in manifest adultery, on Eleanor of Gascony, during the life of Lewis king of France her first husband: and nothing could be alledged to colour the business, but a dispensation from the pope directly against the law of God, and the words of our Saviour, who says, "That a wife cannot be put away unless for adultery; and he that marrieth her that is put away, committeth adultery." The pollution of this spring is not to be cured; but, tho' it should pass unregarded, no one part of the succession since that time has remained intire. John was preferred before Arthur his elder brother's son: Edward the Third was made king by the deposition of his father: Henry the Fourth by that of Richard the II<sup>d</sup>. If the house of Mortimer or York had the right, Henry the IVth, Vth, and VIth, were not kings, and all who claim under them have no title. However, Richard the Third could have none; for the children of his elder brother the duke of Clarence were then living. The children of Edward the Fourth may be suspected of bastardy; and tho' it may have been otherwise, yet that matter is not so clear as things of such importance ought to be, and the consequence may reach very far. But, tho' that scruple were removed, it is certain, that Henry the VIIth was not king in the right of his wife Elizabeth; for he reigned before and after her; and for his other titles, we may believe Phililip de Commines, who says, "He had neither cross nor pile.*" If Henry the Eighth had a right in himself, or from his mother, he should have reigned immediately after her death, which he never pretended, nor to succeed till his father was dead, thereby acknowledging he had no right but from him, unless the parliament and people can give it. The like may be said of his children. Mary could have no title, if she was a bastard, begotten in incest; but if her mother's marriage was good, and she legitimate, Elizabeth could have none.

Yet all these were lawful kings and queens; their acts continue in force

* Qui n'avoit ni croix, ne pille, ni nul droict, comme je croi, à la couronne d'Angleterre. Memoires livre vi. c. 9.

CHAP. III. to this day to all intents and purposes: the parliament and people made them to be so, when they had no other title. The parliament and people therefore have the power of making kings: those who are so made are not usurpers: we have had none but such for more than seven hundred years. They were therefore lawful kings, or this nation has had none in all that time; and if our author like this conclusion, the account from whence it is drawn may without difficulty be carried as high as our English histories do reach.

This being built upon the steady foundation of law, history, and reason, is not to be removed by any man's opinion; especially by one, accompanied with such circumstances as Sir Walter Raleigh was in, during the last years of his life: and there is something of baseness, as well as prevarication, in turning the words of an eminent person, reduced to great difficulties, to a sense no-way agreeing with his former actions or writings, and no less tending to impair his reputation than to deceive others. Our author is highly guilty of both, in citing Sir Walter Raleigh to invalidate the great charter of our liberties, as "begun by usurpation, and shewed to the world by rebellion;" whereas no such thing, nor any thing like it in word or principle, can be found in the works that deserve to go under his name. The dialogue in question, with some other small pieces published after his death, deserve to be esteemed spurious: or if, from a desire of life, when he knew his head lay under the ax, he was brought to say things no-way agreeing with what he had formerly professed, they ought rather to be buried in oblivion, than produced to blemish his memory. But, that the public cause may not suffer by his fault, it is convenient the world should be informed, that tho' he was a well qualified gentleman, yet his morals were no-way exact, as appears by his dealings with the brave earl of Essex. And he was so well assisted in his "history of the world," that an ordinary man, with the same helps, might have performed the same things. Neither ought it to be accounted strange, if that which he writ by himself had the tincture of another spirit, when he was deprived of that assistance, tho' his life had not depended upon the will of the prince, and he had never said, That "the bonds of subjects to their kings should always be wrought out of iron, and those of kings to their subjects out of cobwebs."

* See Sir W. Raleigh's epistle to king James.

S E C T.

S E C T. XXXI.

Free nations have a right of meeting, when and where they please, unless they deprive themselves of it.

A Perverted judgment always leads men into a wrong way, and persuades them to believe, that those things favour their cause, that utterly overthrow it. For a proof of this, I desire our author's words may be considered. "In the former parliaments," says he, "instituted and continued since Henry the First's time, is not to be found the usage of any natural liberty of the people: for all those liberties that are claimed in parliament, are liberties of grace from the king, and not the liberties of nature to the people: for if the liberty were natural, it would give power unto the multitude to assemble themselves, when and where they pleased, to bestow the sovereignty, and by pactions to limit and direct the exercise of it." And I say, that nations, being naturally free, may meet, when and where they please; may dispose of the sovereignty, and may direct or limit the exercise of it, unless by their own act they have deprived themselves of that right: and there could never have been a lawful assembly of any people in the world, if they had not had that power in themselves. It was proved in the preceding section, that all our kings, having no title, were no more than what the nobility and people made them to be; that they could have no power but what was given to them, and could confer none except what they had received. If they can therefore call parliaments, the power of calling them must have been given to them, and could not be given by any who had it not in themselves. The Israelites met together, and chose Ehud, Gideon, Samson, Jephtha, and others, to be their leaders, whom they judged fit to deliver them from their enemies. By the same right they assembled at Mispeth to make war against the tribe of Benjamin, when justice was denied to be done against those who had villainously abused the Levite's concubine. In the like manner, they would have made Gideon king, but he refused. In the same place they met, and chose Saul to be their king. He being dead, the men of Judah assembled themselves, and anointed David: not long after, all the tribes met at Hebron, made a contract with him, and received him as their king. In the same manner, tho' by worse counsel, they made Absalom king. And the like was attempted in favour of Sheba the son of Bichri, tho' they then had a king chosen by themselves. When they found themselves oppressed by the tributes that had been laid upon them by Solomon they met at Shechem; and being displeased with Rehoboam's answer to their complaints, ten of the tribes made Jeroboam king. Jehu, and all the other kings of Israel, whether good or bad, had no other title than was conferred upon them by the prevailing part of the people; which could not have given them any, unless they had met together; nor meet together without the consent, and against

CHAP. III. against the will of those that reigned, unless the power had been in themselves.

Where governments are more exactly regulated, the power of judging when it is fit to call the senate or people together, is referred to one or more magistrates; as in Rome to the consuls or tribunes, in Athens to the archons, and in Thebes to the Bæotarches: but none of them could have these powers, unless they had been given by those who advanced them to the magistracies to which they were annexed; nor could they have been so annexed, if those who created them had not had the right in themselves. If these officers neglected their duty of calling such assemblies when the public affairs required, people met by their own authority, and punished the person, or abrogated the magistracy, as appears in the case of the decemviri, and many others that might be alledged, if the thing were not so plain as to need no further proof. The reason of this is, that they who institute a magistracy, best know whether the end of the institution be rightly pursued or not: and all just magistracies being the same in essence, tho' differing in form, the same right must perpetually belong to those who put the sovereign power into the hands of one, a few, or many men, which is what our author calls the disposal of the sovereignty. Thus the Romans did when they created kings consuls, military tribunes, dictators, or decemviri: and it had been most ridiculous to say, that those officers gave authority to the people to meet and chuse them; for they who are chosen are the creatures of those who chuse, and are nothing more than others till they are chosen. The last king of Sweden, Charles Gustavus told a gentleman who was ambassador there, that the Swedes having made him king, when he was poor, and had nothing in the world, he had but one work to do, which was so to reign, that they might never repent the good opinion they had conceived of him. They might therefore meet, and did meet to confer the sovereignty upon him, or he could never have had it: for tho' the kingdom be hereditary to males or females, and his mother was sister to the great Gustavus; yet having married a stranger without the consent of the estates, she performed not the condition upon which women are admitted to the succession; and thereby falling from her right, he pretended not to any. The act of his election declares he had none, and gives the crown to him, and the heirs of his body, with this farther declaration, that the benefit of his election should no-way extend to his brother prince Adolphus; and it is confessed by all the Swedish nation, that if the king now reigning should die without children, the estates would proceed to a new election.

It is rightly observed by our author, that if the people might meet, and give the sovereign power, they might also direct and limit it; for they did meet in this and other countries, they did confer the sovereign power, they did limit and direct the exercise; and the laws of each people shew in what manner and measure it is every-where done. This is as certain in relation to kings, as any other magistrates. The commission of the Roman dictators was, to take care “* that the commonwealth might receive no detriment.”

The

* Ne quid detrimenti respublica accipiat. T. Liv.

The same was sometimes given to the consuls: king Offa's confession, that he SECT. 31.
 was made king “* to preserve the public liberty,” expresses the same thing: and Charles Gustavus, who said he had no other work, than to govern in such a manner, that they who had made him king might not repent, shewed there was a rule which he stood obliged to follow, and an end which he was to procure, that he might merit and preserve their good opinion. This power of conferring the sovereignty was exercised in France by those who made Meroveus king, in the prejudice of the two grandchildren of Pharamond sons to Clodion; by those who excluded his race, and gave the crown to Pepin; by those who deposed Lewis le Debonair, and Charles le Gros; by those who brought in five kings, that were either bastards or strangers, between him and Charles le Simple; by those who rejected his race, and advanced Hugh Capet; by those who made Henry the First king, to the prejudice of Robert his elder brother, and continued the crown in the race of Henry for ten generations, whilst the descendents of Robert were only dukes of Burgundy. The like was done in Castile and Arragon, by frequently preferring the younger before the elder brother; the descendents of females before those of the male line in the same degree; the more remote in blood before the nearest; and sometimes bastards before the legitimate issue. The same was done in England in relation to every king, since the coming in of the Normans, as I shewed in the last section, and other places of this work.

That they who gave the sovereignty, might also circumscribe and direct it, is manifest by the several ways of providing for the succession instituted by several nations. Some are merely elective, as the empire of Germany, and the kingdom of Poland, to this day; the kingdom of Denmark till the year 1660; that of Sweden till the time of Gustavus Ericson, who delivered that nation from the oppression of Christiern the Second, the cruel king of the Danes. In others the election was confined to one or more families, as the kingdom of the Goths in Spain to the Balthei and Amalthei. In some, the eldest man of the reigning family was preferred before the nearest, as in Scotland before the time of Kennethus. In other places the nearest in blood is preferred before the elder, if more remote. In some, no regard is had to females, or their descendents, as in France and Turkey. In others, they or their descendents are admitted, either simply, as well as males; or under a condition of marrying in the country, or with the consent of the estates, as in Sweden. And no other reason can be given for this almost infinite variety of constitutions, than that they who made them would have it so; which could not be, if God and nature had appointed one general rule for all nations. For in that case, the kingdom of France must be elective, as well as that of Poland and the empire; or the empire and Poland hereditary, as that of France: daughters must succeed in France, as well as in England, or be excluded in England, as in France; and he that would establish one as the ordinance of God and nature, must necessarily overthrow all the rest.

* In vestrae libertatis tuitionem. Mat. Par.

CHAP. III.

De jur. bell.
& pac.

A farther exercise of natural liberty of nations is discovered in the several limitations put upon the sovereign power. Some kings, says Grotius, have the "summum imperium summo modo;" others, "modo non summo:" and amongst those that are under limitations, the degrees, as to more or less, are almost infinite, as I have proved already by the example of Arragon, ancient Germany, the Saxon kings, the Normans, the kings of Castile, the present empire, with divers others. And I may safely say, that the ancient government of France was much of the same nature to the time of Charles the VIIth, and Lewis the XIth; but the work of emancipating themselves, as they call it, begun by them, is now brought to perfection in a boundless elevation of the king's greatness and riches, to the unspeakable misery of the people.

It were a folly to think this variety proceeds from the concessions of kings, who naturally delight in power, and hate that which crosses their will. It might with more reason be imagined, that the Roman consuls, who were brought up in liberty, who had contracted a love to their country, and were contented to live upon an equal foot with their fellow-citizens, should confine the power of their magistracy to a year; or that the dukes of Venice should be graciously pleased to give power to the "council of ten" to punish them capitally, if they transgressed the laws, than that kings should put such fetters upon their power, which they so much abhor; or that they would suffer them, if they could be easily broken. If any one of them should prove so moderate, like Trajan, to command the prefect of the Prætorian guard to use the sword for him, if he governed well; and against him if he did not; it would soon be rescinded by his successor: the law which has no other strength than the act of one man, may be annulled by another. So that nothing does more certainly prove, that the laws made in several countries to restrain the power of kings, and variously to dispose of the succession, are not from them, than the frequent examples of their fury, who have exposed themselves to the greatest dangers, and brought infinite miseries upon the people, through the desire of breaking them. It must therefore be concluded, that nations have power of meeting together, and of conferring, limiting, and directing the sovereignty; or all must be grounded upon most manifest injustice and usurpation.

No man can have a power over a nation otherwise than "de jure," or "de facto." He who pretends to have a power "de jure," must prove that it is originally inherent in him, or his predecessor, from whom he inherits; or that it was justly acquired by him. The vanity of any pretence to an original right appears sufficiently, I hope, from the proofs already given, that the first fathers of mankind had it not; or if they had, no man could now inherit the same, there being no man able to make good the genealogy that should give him a right to the succession. Besides, the facility we have of proving the beginnings of all the families that reign among us, makes it as absurd for any of them to pretend a perpetual right to dominion, as for any citizen of London, whose parents and birth we know, to say he is the very man Noah, who lived in the time of the flood, and is now four or five thousand years old.

If

If the power were conferred on him or his predecessors, it is what we SECT. 31.
ask; for the collation can be of no value, unless it be made by those who had a right to do it; and the original right by descent failing, no one can have any over a free people but themselves, or those to whom they have given it.

If acquisition be pretended, it is the same thing; for there can be no right to that which is acquired, unless the right of invading be proved; and that being done, nothing can be acquired except what belonged to the person that was invaded, and that only by him who had the right of invading. No man ever did or could conquer a nation by his own strength; no man therefore could ever acquire a personal right over any; and if it was conferred upon him by those who made the conquest with him, they were the people that did it. He can no more be said to have the right originally in and from himself, than a magistrate of Rome or Athens immediately after his creation; and having no other at the beginning, he can have none to eternity; for the nature of it must refer to the original, and cannot be changed by time.

Whatsoever therefore proceeds not from the consent of the people, must be "de facto" only, that is, void of all right; and it is impossible there should not be a right of destroying that which is grounded upon none; and by the same rule that one man enjoys what he gained by violence, another may take it from him. Cyrus overthrew the Assyrians and Babylonians, Alexander the Medes and Persians; and if they had no right of making war upon those nations, the nations could not but have a right of recovering all that had been unjustly taken from them, and avenging the evils they had suffered. If the cause of the war was originally just, and not corrupted by an intemperate use of the victory, the conquered people was perhaps obliged to be quiet; but the conquering armies, that had conferred upon their generals what they had taken from their enemies, might as justly expect an account of what they had given, and that it should be employed according to the intention of the givers, as the people of any city might do from their regularly created magistrates; because it was as impossible for Cyrus, Alexander, or Cæsar, to gain a power over the armies they led, without their consent, as for Pericles, Valerius, or any other disarmed citizen, to gain more power in their respective cities than was voluntarily conferred upon them. And I know no other difference between kingdoms so constituted by conquering armies, and such as are established in the most orderly manner, than that the first usually incline more to war and violence, the latter to justice and peace. But there have not been wanting many of the first sort (especially the nations coming from the north) who were no less exact in ordaining that which tended to the preservation of liberty, nor less severe in seeing it punctually performed, than the most regular commonwealths that ever were in the world. And it can with no more reason be pretended, that the Goths received their privileges from Alan or Theodoric, the Franks from Pharamond or Meroveus, and the English from Ina or Ethelred, than that the liberty of Athens was the gift of Themistocles or Pericles, that the empire of Rome proceeded from the liberality of Brutus or Valerius, and that the commonwealth of Venice, at this F f f day,

CHAP. III. day, subsists by the favour of the Contarini or Moresini : which must reduce us to matter of right, since that of fact, void of right, can signify nothing.

S E C T. XXXII.

The powers of kings are so various, according to the constitutions of several states, that no consequence can be drawn to the prejudice or advantage of any one, merely from the name.

IN opposition to what is above said, some alledge the name of king, as if there were a charm in the word; and our author seems to put more weight upon it, than the reasons he brings to support his cause. But that we may see there is no efficacy in it, and that it conveys no other right than what particular nations may annex to it, we are to consider,

1. That the most absolute princes that are or have been in the world, never had the name of king; whereas it has been frequently given to those whose powers have been very much restrained. The Cæsars were never called kings, till the sixth age of christianity: the califs and foldan of Egypt and Babylon, the Great Turk, the cham of Tartary, or the Great Mogol, never took that name, or any other of the same signification. The czar of Moscow has it not, tho' he is as absolute a monarch, and his people as miserable slaves, as any in the world. On the other side, the chief magistrates of Rome and Athens for some time, those of Sparta, Arragon, Sweden, Denmark, and England, "who could do nothing but by law," have been called kings. This may be enough to shew, that a name being no way essential, what title soever is given to the chief magistrate, he can have no other power than the laws and customs of his country do give, or the people confer upon him.

C. Tacit.

2. The names of magistrates are often changed, tho' the power continue to be the same; and the powers are sometimes altered tho' the name remain. When Octavius Cæsar, by the force of a mad corrupted soldiery, had overthrown all law and right, he took no other title in relation to military affairs than that of "imperator," which in the time of liberty was by the armies often given to prætors and consuls: in civil matters he was, as he pretended, * content with the power of tribune; and the like was observed in his successor, who to new-invented usurpations "gave old and approved names." On the other side, those titles which have been rendered odious and execrable by the violent exercise of an absolute power, are sometimes made popular by moderate limitations; as in Germany, where, tho' the monarchy seem to be as well tempered as any, the princes retain the same names of "imperator, Cæsar," and "Augustus," as those had done, who by the excess of their rage and fury had desolated and corrupted the best part of the world. SECT. 32.
 of * Tribunitia potestate contentus. C. Tacit.

Sometimes the name is changed, tho' the power in all respects continue to be the same. The lords of Castile had for many ages no other title than that of count; and when the nobility and people thought good, they changed it to that of king, without any addition to the power. Saavedra, Mariana,
Zurita.

The sovereign magistrate in Poland was called duke till within the last two hundred years, when they gave the title of king to one of the Jagellan family; which title has continued to this day, tho' without any change in the nature of the magistracy. And I presume, no wise man will think, that if the Venetians should give the name of king to their duke, it could confer any other power upon him, than he has already, unless more should be conferred by the authority of the great council.

3. The same names which in some places denote the supreme magistracy, in others are subordinate, or merely titular. In England, France, and Spain, dukes and earls are subjects: in Germany, the electors and princes who are called by those names are little less than sovereigns; and the dukes of Savoy, Tuscany, Muscovy, and others, acknowledge no superior, as well as those of Poland and Castile had none, when they went under those titles. The same may be said of kings. Some are subject to a foreign power, as divers of them were subject to the Persian and Babylonian monarchs, who for that reason were called the kings of kings. Some also are tributaries; and when the Spaniards first landed in America, the great kings of Mexico and Peru had many others under them. Threescore and ten kings gathered up meat under the table of Adonibezek. The Romans had many kings depending upon them. Herod and those of his race were of this number; and the dispute between him and his sons Aristobulus and Alexander, was to be determined by them; neither durst he decide the matter till it was referred to him. But a right of appeal did still remain, as appears by the case of St. Paul, when Agrippa was king. The kings of Mauritania from the time of Masinissa, were under the like dependence: Jugurtha went to Rome to justify himself for the death of Micipsa: Juba was commanded by the Roman magistrates, Scipio, Petreius, and Afranius: another Juba was made king of the same country by Augustus, and Tiridates of Armenia by Nero; and infinite examples of this nature may be alledged. Moreover, their powers are variously regulated, according to the variety of tempers in nations and ages. Some have restrained the powers that by experience were found to be exorbitant; others have dissolved the bonds that were laid upon them: and laws relating to the institution, abrogation, enlargement, or restriction of the regal power, would be utterly insignificant, if this could not be done. But such laws are of no effect in any other country than where they are made. The lives of the Spartans did not depend upon the will of Agesilaus or Leonidas, because Nabuchodonosor could kill or save whom he pleased: and tho' the king of Morocco may stab his subjects, throw them to the lions, or hang them upon tenterhooks; yet a king of Poland would probably be called to a severe account, if he should unjustly kill a single man.

S E C T. XXXIII.

The liberty of a people is the gift of God and nature.

IF any man ask, how nations come to have the power of doing these things, I answer, that liberty being only an exemption from the dominion of another, the question ought not to be, how a nation can come to be free, but how a man comes to have a dominion over it; for till the right of dominion be proved and justified, liberty subsists, as arising from the nature and being of a man. Tertullian, speaking of the emperors, says, “ab eo imperium, a quo spiritus;” and we, taking man in his first condition, may justly say, “ab eo libertas, a quo spiritus;” for no man can owe more than he has received. The creature having nothing, and being nothing but what the Creator makes him, must owe all to him, and nothing to any one from whom he has received nothing. Man therefore must be naturally free, unless he be created by another power than we have yet heard of. The obedience due to parents arises from hence, in that they are the instruments of our generation; and we are instructed by the light of reason, that we ought to make great returns to those from whom under God we have received all. When they die, we are their heirs, we enjoy the same rights, and devolve the same to our posterity. God only, who confers this right upon us, can deprive us of it: and we can no way understand that he does so, unless he had so declared by express revelation, or had set some distinguishing marks of dominion and subjection upon men; and, as an ingenious person not long since said, caused some to be born with crowns upon their heads, and all others with saddles upon their backs. This liberty therefore must continue, till it be either forfeited, or willingly resigned. The forfeiture is hardly comprehensible in a multitude, that is not entered into any society; for as they are all equal, and “* equals can have no right over each other,” no man can forfeit any thing to one, who can justly demand nothing, unless it may be by a personal injury, which is nothing to this case; because where there is no society, one man is not bound by the actions of another. All cannot join in the same act, because they are joined in none; or if they should, no man could recover, much less transmit the forfeiture; and not being transmitted, it perishes, as if it had never been, and no man can claim any thing from it.

It will be no less difficult to bring resignation to be subservient to our author's purpose; for men could not resign their liberty, unless they naturally had it in themselves. Resignation is a public declaration of their assent to be governed by the person to whom they resign; that is, they do by that act constitute him to be their governor. This necessarily puts us upon the inquiry, why they do resign, how they will be governed, and proves the governor to be their creature; and the right of disposing the government must be in SECT. 33.

* Par in parem non habet imperium.

 them, or they who receive it can have none. This is so evident to common sense, that it were impertinent to ask who made Carthage, Athens, Rome, or Venice, to be free cities. Their charters were not from men, but from God and nature. When a number of Phenicians had found a port on the coast of Africa, they might perhaps agree with the inhabitants for a parcel of ground; but they brought their liberty with them. When a company of Latins, Sabines, and Tuscans, met together upon the banks of the Tiber, and chose rather to build a city for themselves, than to live in such as were adjacent, they carried their liberty in their own breasts, and had hands and swords to defend it. This was their charter; and Romulus could confer no more upon them, than Dido upon the Carthaginians. When a multitude of barbarous nations infested Italy, and no protection could be expected from the corrupted and perishing empire, such as agreed to seek a place of refuge in the scattered islands of the Adriatic gulf, had no need of any man's authority, to ratify the institution of their government. They who were the formal part of the city, and had built the material, could not but have a right of governing it as they pleased, since, if they did amiss, the hurt was only to themselves. It is probable enough, that some of the Roman emperors, as lords of the soil, might have pretended to a dominion over them, if there had been any colour for it: but nothing of that kind appearing in thirteen hundred years, we are not like to hear of any such cavils. It is agreed by mankind, that subjection and protection are relative; and that he who cannot protect those that are under him, in vain pretends to a dominion over them. The only ends for which governments are constituted, and obedience rendered to them, are the obtaining of justice and protection; and they who cannot provide for both, give the people a right of taking such ways as best please themselves, in order to their own safety.

The matter is yet more clear in relation to those who never were in any society, as at the beginning, or renovation of the world after the flood; or who, upon the dissolution of the societies to which they did once belong, or by some other accident, have been obliged to seek new habitations. Such were those who went from Babylon upon the confusion of tongues; those who escaped from Troy when it was burnt by the Grecians; almost all the nations of Europe, with many of Asia and Africa, upon the dissolution of the Roman empire. To which may be added, a multitude of Northern nations, who, when they had increased to such numbers, that their countries could no longer nourish them, or because they wanted skill to improve their lands, were sent out to provide for themselves; and having done so, did erect many kingdoms and states, either by themselves, or in union and coalition with the antient inhabitants.

It is in vain to say, that wheresoever they came, the land did belong to somebody; and that they who came to dwell there, must be subject to the laws of those who were lords of the soil; for that is not always true in fact. Some come into desert countries that have no lord, others into such as are thinly peopled, by men who, knowing not how to improve their land,

CHAP. III. land, do either grant part of it upon easy terms to the new comers, or grow into a union with them in the enjoyment of the whole; and histories furnish us with infinite examples of this nature.

If we look into our own original, without troubling ourselves with the senseless stories of Samoths the son of Japhet, and his magicians, or the giants begotten by spirits upon the thirty daughters of Danaus sent from Phœnicia in a boat without sail, oars, or rudder, we shall find, that when the Romans abandoned this island, the inhabitants were left to a full liberty of providing for themselves: and whether we deduce our original from them, or the Saxons, or from both, our ancestors were perfectly free; and the Normans having inherited the same right when they came to be one nation with the former, we cannot but continue so still, unless we have enslaved ourselves.

Nothing is more contrary to reason, than to imagine this. When the fierce barbarity of the Saxons came to be softened by a more gentle climate, the arts and religion they learnt, taught them to reform their manners, and better enabled them to frame laws for the preservation of their liberty, but no-way diminished their love to it: and tho' the Normans might desire to get the lands of those who had joined with Harold, and of others, into their hands; yet when they were settled in the country, and by marriages united to the antient inhabitants, they became true Englishmen, and no less lovers of liberty, and resolute defenders of it, than the Saxons had been. There was then neither conquering Norman, nor conquered Saxon, but a great and brave people composed of both, united in blood and interest in the defence of their common rights, which they so well maintained, that no prince since that time has too violently encroached upon them, who, as the reward of his folly, has not lived miserably, and died shamefully.

Such actions of our ancestors do not, as I suppose, favour much of the submission which patrimonial slaves do usually render to the will of their lord. On the contrary, whatsoever they did was by a power inherent in themselves to defend that liberty in which they were born. All their kings were created upon the same condition, and for the same ends. Alfred acknowledged he found and left them perfectly free; and the confession of Offa, that they had not made him king for his own merits, but for the defence of their liberty, comprehends all that were before and after him. They well knew how great the honour was, to be made head of a great people; and rigorously exacted the performance of the ends for which such a one was elevated, severely punishing those who basely and wickedly betrayed the trust reposed in them, and violated all that is most sacred among men; which could not have been, unless they were naturally free; for the liberty that has no being, cannot be defended.

S E C T. XXXIV.

No veneration paid, or honour conferred upon a just and lawful magistrate, can diminish the liberty of a nation.

SOME have supposed, that tho' the people be naturally free, and magistrates created by them, they do by such creations deprive themselves of that natural liberty; and that the names of "king, sovereign lord," and "dread sovereign," being no way consistent with liberty, they who give such titles do renounce it. Our author carries this very far, and lays great weight upon the submissive language used by the people, when they "humbly crave, that his majesty would be pleased to grant their accustomed freedom of speech, and access to his person;" and "give the name of supplications and petitions to the addressees made to him:" whereas he answers in the haughty language of "Le roy le veut, Le roy s'avisera," and the like. But they who talk at this rate, shew, that they neither understand the nature of magistracy, nor the practice of nations. Those who have lived in the highest exercise of their liberty, and have been most tenacious of it, have thought no honour too great for such magistrates as were eminent in the defence of their rights, and were set up for that end. The name of dread sovereign might justly have been given to a Roman dictator, or consul; for they had the sovereign authority in their hands, and power sufficient for its execution. Whilst their magistracy continued, they were a terror to the same men, whose axes and rods had been a terror to them the year or month before, and might be so again the next. The Romans thought they could not be guilty of excess in carrying the power and veneration due to their dictator to the highest: and Livy tells us, that his "edicts were esteemed sacred." I have already shewn, that this haughty people, who might have commanded, condescended to join with their tribunes in a petition to the dictator Papirius for the life of Quintus Fabius, who had fought a battle in his absence, and without his order, though he had gained a great and memorable victory. The same Fabius, when consul, was commended by his father Q. Fabius Maximus, for obliging him, by his lictors, to dismount from his horse, and to pay him the same respect that was due from others. The tribunes of the people, who were instituted for the preservation of liberty, were also esteemed sacred and inviolable, as appears by that phrase, "sacrosancta tribunorum potestas," so common in their antient writers. No man, I presume, thinks any monarchy more limited, or more clearly derived from a delegated power, than that of the German emperors; and yet "sacra Cæsarea majestas" is the public stile. Nay, the Hollanders at this day call their burgermasters, though they see

3

* Edictum dictatoris pro numine observatum. Hist. l. 8.

CHAP. III. see them selling herring or tar, "high and mighty lords," as soon as they are advanced to be of the 36, 42, or 48 magistrates of a small town. It is no wonder therefore, if a great nation should think it conducing to their own glory, to give magnificent titles, and use submissive language, to that one man, whom they set up to be their head; most especially, if we consider, that they came from a country where such titles and language were principally invented.

Among the Romans and Grecians we hear nothing of majesty, highness, serenity, and excellence, appropriated to a single person; but receive them from Germany, and other Northern countries. We find "majestas populi Romani," and "majestas imperii," in their best authors; but no man, speaking to Julius or Augustus, or even to the vainest of their successors, ever used those empty titles, nor took upon themselves the name of servants, as we do to every fellow we meet in the streets. When such ways of speaking are once introduced, they must needs swell to a more than ordinary height in all transactions with princes. Most of them naturally delight in vanity, and courtiers never speak more truth, than when they most extol their masters, and assume to themselves the names that best express the most abject slavery. These, being brought into mode, like all ill customs, increase by use; and then no man can omit them without bringing that hatred and danger upon himself, which few will undergo, except for something that is evidently of great importance. Matters of ceremony and title, at the first, seem not to be so; and, being for some time neglected, they acquire such strength as not to be easily removed. From private usage they pass into public acts; and those flatterers who gave a beginning to them, proposing them in public councils, where too many of that sort have always insinuated themselves, gain credit enough to make them pass. This work was farther advanced by the church of Rome, according to their custom of favouring that most, which is most vain and corrupt; and it has been usual with the popes, and their adherents, liberally to gratify princes for services rendered to the church, with titles that tended only to the prejudice of the people. These poisonous plants, having taken root, grew up so fast, that the titles which, within the space of a hundred years, were thought sufficient for the kings and queens of England, have of late been given to Monk, and his honourable dutchess. New phrases have been invented to please princes, or the sense of the old perverted, as has happened to that of "Le roy s'avisera:" and that which was no more than a liberty to consult with the lords upon a bill presented by the commons, is by some men now taken for a right inherent in the king, of denying such bills as may be offered to him by the lords and commons; though the coronation-oath oblige him to hold, keep, and defend the just laws and customs, "quas vulgus elegerit." And, if a stop be not put to this exorbitant abuse, the words still remaining in acts of parliament, which shew that their acts are our laws, may perhaps be also abolished.

But

But tho' this should come to pass, by the slackness of the lords and commons, it could neither create a new right in the king nor diminish that of the people: But it might give a better colour to those who are enemies to their country, to render the power of the crown arbitrary, than any-thing that is yet among us. SECT. 35.

S E C T. XXXV.

The authority given by our law to the acts performed by a king de facto, detract nothing from the people's right of creating whom they please.

THEY who have more regard to the prevailing power than to right, and lay great weight upon the statute of Henry the seventh, which authorizes the acts of a king "de facto," seem not to consider, that thereby they destroy all right of inheritance; that he only is king "de facto," who is received by the people; and that this reception could neither be of any value in itself, nor be made valid by a statute, unless the people, and their representatives, who make the statute, had in themselves the power of receiving, authorizing, and creating, whom they please. For he is not king "de facto" who calls himself so, as Perkin or Simnel, but he who, by the consent of the nation, is possessed of the regal power. If there were such a thing in nature, as a natural lord over every country, and that the right must go by descent, it would be impossible for any other man to acquire it, or for the people to confer it upon him, and to give the authority to the acts of one, who neither is, nor can be, a king, which belongs only to him, who has the right inherent in himself, and inseparable from him. Neither can it be denied, that the same power which gives the validity to such acts as are performed by one who is not a king, that belongs to those of a true king, may also make him king; for the essence of a king consists in the validity of his acts. And it is equally absurd for one to pretend to be a king, whose acts as king are not valid, as that his own can be valid, if those of another are; for then the same indivisible right which our author, and those of his principles, assert to be inseparable from the person, would be at the same time exercised and enjoyed by two distinct and contrary powers.

Moreover, it may be observed, that this statute was made, after frequent and bloody wars concerning titles to the crown; and whether the cause were good or bad, those who were overcome, were not only subject to be killed in the field, but afterwards to be prosecuted as traitors under the colour of law. He who gained the victory, was always set up to be king by those of his party; and he never failed to proceed against his enemies as rebels. This introduced a horrid series of the most destructive mischiefs. The fortune of war varied often; and I think it may be said, that there were few, if any, great families in England, that were not either destroyed, or at least so far

CHAP. III. shaken, as to lose their chiefs, and many considerable branches of them: and experience taught, that instead of gaining any advantage to the public, in point of government, he for whom they fought, seldom proved better than his enemy. They saw that the like might again happen, tho' the title of the reigning king should be as clear, as descent of blood could make it. This brought things into an uneasy posture; and it is not strange, that both the nobility and commonalty should be weary of it. No law could prevent the dangers of battle; for he that had followers, and would venture himself, might bring them to such a decision, as was only in the hand of God. But thinking no more could justly be required to the full performance of their duty to the king, than to expose themselves to the hazard of battle for him, and not being answerable for the success, they would not have that law, which they endeavoured to support, turned to their destruction by their enemies, who might come to be the interpreters of it. But as they could be exempted from this danger, only by their own laws, which could authorize the acts of a king without a title, and justify them for acting under him, it is evident, that the power of the law was in their hands, and that the acts of the person who enjoyed the crown, were of no value in themselves. The law had been impertinent, if it could have been done without law; and the intervention of the parliament useless, if the kings "de facto" could have given authority to their own acts. But if the parliament could make that to have the effect of law, which was not law, and exempt those that acted according to it from the penalties of the law, and give the same force to the acts of one who is not king, as of one who is, they cannot but have a power of making him to be king, who is not so; that is to say, all depends intirely upon their authority.

Besides, he is not king who assumes the title to himself, or is set up by a corrupt party; but he who, according to the usages required in the case, is made king. If these are wanting, he is neither "de facto," nor "de jure," but "tyrannus sine titulo." Nevertheless, this very man, if he comes to be received by the people, and placed in the throne, he is thereby made king "de facto." His acts are valid in law; the same service is due to him as to any other; they who render it are in the same manner protected by the law; that is to say, he is truly king. If our author therefore do allow such to be kings, he must confess that power to be good, which makes them so, when they have no right in themselves. If he deny it, he must not only deny, that there is any such thing as a king "de facto," which the statute acknowledges, but that we ever had any king in England; for we never had any other than such, as I have proved before.

By the same means he will so unravel all the law, that no man shall know what he has, or what he ought to do or avoid; and will find no remedy for this, unless he allow, that laws made without kings are as good as those made with them, which returns to my purpose: for they who have the power of making laws, may by law make a king as well as any other magistrate. And indeed the intention of this statute could be no other than to secure

secure mens persons and possessions, and so far to declare the power of SECT. 36.
giving and taking away the crown to be in the parliament, as to remove all disputes concerning titles, and to make him to be a legal king, whom they acknowledge to be king.

S E C T. XXXVI.

The general revolt of a nation cannot be called a rebellion.

AS impostors seldom make lies to pass in the world, without putting false names upon things, such as our author endeavour to persuade the people they ought not to defend their liberties, by giving the name of rebellion, to the most just and honourable actions that have been performed for the preservation of them; and, to aggravate the matter, fear not to tell us, that rebellion is like the sin of witchcraft. But those who seek after truth, will easily find, that there can be no such thing in the world as the rebellion of a nation against its own magistrates, and that rebellion is not always evil. That this may appear, it will not be amiss to consider the word, as well as the thing understood by it, as it is used in an evil sense.

The word is taken from the Latin "rebellare," which signifies no more than to renew a war. When a town or province had been subdued by the Romans, and brought under their dominion, if they violated their faith after the settlement of peace, and invaded their masters, who had spared them, they were said to rebel. But it had been more absurd to apply that word to the people that rose against the decemviri, kings, or other magistrates, than to the Parthians, or any of those nations who had no dependence upon them; for all the circumstances that should make a rebellion were wanting, the word implying a superiority in them against whom it is, as well as the breach of an established peace. But tho' every private man, singly taken, be subject to the commands of the magistrate, the whole body of the people is not so; for he is by and for the people, and the people is neither by nor for him. The obedience due to him from private men, is grounded upon, and measured by, the general law; and that law, regarding the welfare of the people, cannot set up the interest of one or a few men against the public. The whole body therefore of a nation cannot be tied to any other obedience than is consistent with the common good, according to their own judgment: and having never been subdued, or brought to terms of peace with their magistrates, they cannot be said to revolt or rebel against them, to whom they owe no more than seems good to themselves, and who are nothing of or by themselves, more than other men.

Again, the thing signified by rebellion is not always evil: for, tho' every subdued nation must acknowledge a superiority in those who have subdued them, and rebellion do imply a breach of the peace; yet that superiority is not in-

CHAP. III. finite: the peace may be broken upon just grounds, and it may be neither a crime nor infamy to do it. The Privernates had been more than once subdued by the Romans, and had as often rebelled. Their city was at last taken T. Liv. l. 8. by Plautius the consul, after their leader Vitruvius, and great numbers of their senate and people, had been killed: being reduced to a low condition, they sent ambassadors to Rome to desire peace; where, when a senator asked them what punishment they deserved, one of them answered, "The same which they deserve, who think themselves worthy of liberty." The consul then demanded, "what kind of peace might be expected from them, if the punishment should be remitted." The ambassador answered, "* If the terms you give be good, the peace will be observed by us faithfully and perpetually; if bad, it will soon be broken." And tho' some were offended with the ferocity of the answer; yet the best part of the senate approved it, as "† worthy of a man and a freeman;" and, confessing that no man or nation would continue under an uneasy condition, longer than they were compelled by force, said, "‡ They only were fit to be made Romans, who thought nothing valuable but liberty." Upon which they were all made citizens of Rome, and obtained whatsoever they had desired.

I know not how this matter can be carried to a greater height; for if it were possible, that a people resisting oppression, and vindicating their own liberty, could commit a crime, and incur either guilt or infamy, the Privernates did, who had been often subdued, and often pardoned; but, even in the judgment of their conquerors, whom they had offended, the resolution they professed of standing to no agreement imposed upon them by necessity, was accounted the highest testimony of such a virtue as rendered them worthy to be admitted into a society and equality with themselves, who were the most brave and virtuous people of the world.

But if the patience of a conquered people may have limits, and they who will not bear oppression from those who had spared their lives, may deserve praise and reward from their conquerors, it would be madness to think, that any nation can be obliged to bear whatsoever their own magistrates think fit to do against them. This may seem strange to those who talk so much of conquests made by kings; immunities, liberties, and privileges, granted to nations; oaths of allegiance taken, and wonderful benefits conferred upon them. But, having already said as much as is needful concerning conquests, and that the magistrate, who has nothing except what is given to him, can only dispense out of the public stock such franchises and privileges as he has received for the reward of services done to the country, and encouragement of virtue, I shall at present keep myself to the two last points.

Allegiance signifies no more (as the words "ad legem" declare) than such an obedience as the law requires. But as the law can require nothing from the whole people, who are masters of it, allegiance can only relate to * Si bonam dederitis, fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam. Liv.

† Viri & liberi vocem auditam. Ibid.

‡ Eos demum, qui nihil præterquam de libertate cogitant, dignos esse, qui Romani fiant. Ibid.

particulars, and not to the whole. No oath can bind any other than those SECT. 36.
 who take it, and that only in the true sense and meaning of it: but single men only take this oath, and therefore single men are only obliged to keep it: the body of a people neither does, nor can perform any such act: agreements and contracts have been made; as the tribe of Judah, and the rest of Israel afterward, made a covenant with David, upon which they made him king; but no wise man can think, that the nation did thereby make themselves the creature of their own creature.

The sense also of an oath ought be considered. No man can by an oath be obliged to any thing beyond, or contrary to, the true meaning of it: private men, who swear obedience "ad legem," swear no obedience "extra" or "contra legem:" whatsoever they promise or swear, can detract nothing from the public liberty, which the law principally intends to preserve. Though many of them may be obliged, in their several stations and capacities, to render peculiar services to a prince, the people continue as free as the internal thoughts of a man, and cannot but have a right to preserve their liberty, or avenge the violation.

If matters are well examined, perhaps not many magistrates can pretend to much upon the title of merit, most especially if they or their progenitors have continued long in office. The conveniences annexed to the exercise of the sovereign power, may be thought sufficient to pay such scores as they grow due, even to the best: and as things of that nature are handled, I think it will hardly be found, that all princes can pretend to an irresistible power upon the account of beneficence to their people. When the family of Medices came to be masters of Tuscany, that country was, without dispute, in men, money, and arms, one of the most flourishing provinces in the world, as appears by Machiavel's account, and the relation of what happened between Charles the Eighth, and the magistrates of Florence, which I have mentioned already from Guicciardin. Now, whoever shall consider the strength of that country in those days, together with what it might have been in the space of a hundred and forty years, in which they have had no war, nor any other plague, than the extortion, fraud, rapine, and cruelty of their princes, and compare it with their present desolate, wretched, and contemptible condition, may, if he please, think, that much veneration is due to the princes that govern them; but will never make any man believe, that their title can be grounded upon beneficence. The like may be said of the duke of Savoy, who, pretending (upon I know not what account) that every peasant in the duchy ought to pay him two crowns every half-year, did in 1662. subtilly find out, that in every year there were thirteen halves; so that a poor man, who had nothing but what he gained by hard labour, was, through his fatherly care and beneficence, forced to pay six-and-twenty crowns to his royal highness, to be employed in his discreet and virtuous pleasures at Turin.

The condition of the Seventeen provinces of the Netherlands (and even of Spain itself), when they fell to the house of Austria, was of the same nature: and I will confess as much as can be required, if any other marks of their

CHAP. III. their government do remain, than such as are manifest evidences of their pride, avarice, luxury, and cruelty.

France, in outward appearance, makes a better shew ; but nothing in this world is more miserable, than that people under the fatherly care of their triumphant monarch. The best of their condition is, like asses and mastiff-dogs, to work and fight, to be oppressed and killed for him ; and those among them, who have any understanding, well know, that their industry, courage, and good success, is not only unprofitable, but destructive to them ; and that, by increasing the power of their master, they add weight to their own chains. And if any prince, or succession of princes, have made a more modest use of their power, or more faithfully discharged the trust reposed in them, it must be imputed peculiarly to them, as a testimony of their personal virtue, and can have no effect upon others.

The rights therefore of kings are not grounded upon conquest ; the liberties of nations do not arise from the grants of their princes ; the oath of allegiance binds no private man to more than the law directs, and has no influence upon the whole body of every nation : many princes are known to their subjects only by the injuries, losses, and mischiefs, brought upon them : such as are good and just, ought to be rewarded for their personal virtue, but can confer no right upon those who no-way resemble them ; and whoever pretends to that merit, must prove it by his actions : rebellion, being nothing but a renewed war, can never be against a government that was not established by war, and of itself is neither good nor evil, more than any other war ; but is just or unjust, according to the cause or manner of it. Besides, that rebellion, which by Samuel is compared to witchcraft, is not of private men, or a people, against the prince, but of the prince against God : the Israelites are often said to have rebelled against the law, word, or command of God ; but tho' they frequently opposed their kings, I do not find rebellion imputed to them on that account, nor any ill character put upon such actions. We are told also of some kings who had been subdued, and afterwards rebelled against Chedorlaomer, and other kings ; but their cause is not blamed, and we have some reason to believe it good, because Abraham took part with those who had rebelled. However, it can be of no prejudice to the cause I defend : for tho' it were true, that those subdued kings could not justly rise against the person who had subdued them ; or that generally no king, being once vanquished, could have a right of rebellion against his conqueror ; it could have no relation to the actions of a people vindicating their own laws and liberties against a prince who violates them ; for that war which never was, can never be renewed. And if it be true in any case, that hands and swords are given to men, that they only may be slaves who have no courage, it must be when liberty is overthrown by those, who of all men ought with the utmost industry and vigour to have defended it.

That this should be known, is not only necessary for the safety of nations, but advantageous to such kings as are wise and good. They who know the frailty of human nature, will always distrust their own ; and desiring only to do do what they ought, will be glad to be restrained from that which they ought not to do. Being taught by reason and experience, that nations delight in the peace and justice of a good government, they will never fear a general insurrection, whilst they take care it be rightly administered; and finding themselves by this means to be safe, will never be unwilling, that their children or successors should be obliged to tread in the same steps. SECT. 36.

1 Sam. xv.
23.

If it be said, that this may sometimes cause disorders, I acknowledge it; but no human condition being perfect, such a one is to be chosen, which carries with it the most tolerable inconveniences: and it being much better, that the irregularities and excesses of a prince should be restrained or suppressed, than that whole nations should perish by them, those constitutions that make the best provision against the greatest evils, are most to be commended. If governments were instituted to gratify the lusts of one man, those could not be good that set limits to them; but all reasonable men confessing that they are instituted for the good of nations, they only can deserve praise, who above all things endeavour to procure it, and appoint means proportioned to that end. The great variety of governments, which we see in the world, is nothing but the effect of this care; and all nations have been, and are more or less happy, as they or their ancestors have had vigour of spirit, integrity of manners, and wisdom to invent and establish such orders, as have better or worse provided for this common good, which was sought by all. But as no rule can be so exact, to make provision against all contestations, and all disputes about right do naturally end in force when justice is denied (ill men never willingly submitting to any decision, that is contrary to their passions and interests;) the best constitutions are of no value, if there be not a power to support them. This power first exerts itself in the execution of justice by the ordinary officers: but no nation having been so happy, as not sometimes to produce such princes as Edward and Richard the Seconds, and such ministers as Gaveston, Spencer, and Trefilian, the ordinary officers of justice often want the will, and always the power, to restrain them. So that the rights and liberties of a nation must be utterly subverted and abolished, if the power of the whole may not be employed to assert them, or punish the violation of them. But as it is the fundamental right of every nation to be governed by such laws, in such manner, and by such persons, as they think most conducing to their own good, they cannot be accountable to any but themselves for what they do in that most important affair.

S E C T. XXXVII.

The English government was not ill constituted, the defects more lately observed proceeding from the change of manners, and corruption of the times.

I Am not ignorant, that many honest and good men, acknowledging these rights, and the care of our ancestors to preserve them, think they wanted wisdom rightly to proportionate the means to the end. It is not enough, say they, for the general of an army to desire victory; he only can deserve praise, who has skill, industry, and courage, to take the best measures of obtaining it. Neither is it enough for wise legislators to preserve liberty, and to erect such a government as may stand for a time; but to set such clear rules to those, who are to put it in execution, that every man may know when they transgress; and appoint such means for restraining or punishing them, as may be used speedily, surely, and effectually, without danger to the public. Sparta being thus constituted, we hardly find, that, for more than eight hundred years, any king presumed to pass the limits prescribed by the law. If any Roman consul grew insolent, he might be reduced to order without blood, or danger to the public; and no dictator ever usurped a power over liberty till the time of Sylla, when all things in the city were so changed, that the ancient foundations were become too narrow. In Venice the power of the duke is so circumscribed, that in 1300 years, no one, except Falerio and Tiepoli, has dared to attempt any thing against the laws: and they were immediately suppressed with little commotion in the city. On the other side, our law is so ambiguous, perplexed, and intricate, that it is hard to know when it is broken. In all the public contests we have had, men of good judgment and integrity have followed both parties. The means of transgressing and procuring partizans to make good by force the most notorious violations of liberty, have been so easy, that no prince, who has endeavoured it, ever failed to get great number of followers, and to do infinite mischiefs, before he could be removed. The nation has been brought to fight against those they had made to be what they were, upon the unequal terms of hazarding all against nothing. If they had success, they gained no more than was their own before, and which the law ought to have secured: whereas it is evident, that if at any one time the contrary had happened, the nation had been utterly enslaved; and no victory was ever gained without the loss of much noble and innocent blood.

To this I answer, that no right judgment can be given of human things, without a particular regard to the time in which they passed. We esteem Scipio, Hannibal, Pyrrhus, Alexander, Epaminondas, and Cæsar, to have been admirable commanders in war, because they had in a most eminent degree all the qualities that could make them so, and knew best how to employ the
the

the arms then in use according to the discipline of their times; and yet no man doubts, that if the most skilful of them could be raised from the grave, restored to the utmost vigour of mind and body, set at the head of the best armies he ever commanded, and placed upon the frontiers of France or Flanders, he would not know how to advance or retreat, nor by what means to take any of the places in those parts, as they are now fortified and defended; but would most certainly be beaten by any insignificant fellow with a small number of men, furnished with such arms as are now in use, and following the methods now practised. Nay, the manner of marching, encamping, besieging, attacking, defending, and fighting, is so much altered within the last threescore years, that no man, observing the discipline that was then thought to be the best, could possibly defend himself against that which has been since found out, tho' the terms are still the same. And if it be considered, that political matters are subject to the same mutations (as certainly they are) it will be sufficient to excuse our ancestors, who, suiting their government to the ages in which they lived, could neither foresee the changes that might happen in future generations, nor appoint remedies for the mischiefs they did not foresee.

They knew that the kings of several nations had been kept within the limits of the law, by the virtue and power of a great and brave nobility; and that no other way of supporting a mixed monarchy had ever been known in the world, than by putting the balance into the hands of those who had the greatest interest in nations, and who by birth and estate enjoyed greater advantages than kings could confer upon them for rewards of betraying their country. They knew, that when the nobility was so great as not easily to be numbered, the little that was left to the king's disposal, was not sufficient to corrupt many; and if some might fall under the temptation, those who continued in their integrity, would easily be able to chastise them for deserting the public cause, and by that means deter kings from endeavouring to seduce them from their duty. Whilst things continued in this posture, kings might safely be trusted (with the advice of their council) to confer the commands of the militia in towns and provinces upon the most eminent men in them: and whilst those kings were exercised in almost perpetual wars, and placed their glory in the greatness of the actions they atchieved by the power and valour of their people, it was their interest always to chuse such as seemed best to deserve that honour. It was not to be imagined, that through the weakness of some, and malice of others, those dignities should by degrees be turned into empty titles, and become the rewards of the greatest crimes, and the vilest services; or that the noblest of their descendents, for want of them, should be brought under the name of commoners, and deprived of all privileges except such as were common to them with their grooms. Such a stupendous change being in process of time insensibly introduced, the foundations of that government, which they had established, were removed, and the superstructure overthrown. The balance by which it subsisted was broken; and it is as impossible to restore it, as for most of those who

CHAP. III. at this day go under the name of noblemen, to perform the duties required from the antient nobility of England. And tho' there were a charm in the name, and those who have it, should be immediately filled with a spirit like to that which animated our ancestors, and endeavour to deserve the honours they possess, by such services to the country as they ought to have performed before they had them, they would not be able to accomplish it. They have neither the interest nor the estates required for so great a work. Those who have estates at a rack-rent, have no dependents. Their tenants, when they have paid what is agreed, owe them nothing; and knowing they shall be turned out of their tenements, as soon as any other will give a little more, they look upon their lords as men, who receive more from them than they confer upon them. This dependence being lost, the lords have only more money to spend or lay up than others, but no command of men; and can therefore neither protect the weak, nor curb the insolent. By this means, all things have been brought into the hands of the king, and the commons; and there is nothing left to cement them, and to maintain the union. The perpetual jarrings we hear every day, the division of the nation into such factions, as threaten us with ruin, and all the disorders that we see or fear, are the effects of this rupture. These things are not to be imputed to our original constitutions, but to those who have subverted them: and if they who by corrupting, changing, enervating, and annihilating the nobility, which was the principal support of the ancient regular monarchy, have driven those who are truly noblemen into the same interest and name with the commons, and by that means increased a party which never was, and I think, never can be, united to the court, they are to answer for the consequences; and if they perish, their destruction is from themselves.

The inconveniences therefore proceed not from the institution, but from the innovation. The law was plain, but it has been industriously rendered perplex: they who were to have upheld it are overthrown. That which might have been easily performed when the people was armed, and had a great, strong, virtuous, and powerful nobility to lead them, is made difficult; now they are disarmed, and that nobility abolished. Our ancestors may evidently appear, not only to have intended well, but to have taken a right course to accomplish what they intended. This had effect as long as the cause continued; and the only fault that can be ascribed to that which they established is, that it has not proved to be perpetual; which is no more than may be justly said of the best human constitutions, that ever have been in the world. If we will be just to our ancestors, it will become us in our time rather to pursue what we know they intended, and by new constitutions to repair the breaches made upon the old, than to accuse them of the defects that will for ever attend the actions of men. Taking our affairs at the worst, we shall soon find, that if we have the same spirit they had, we may easily restore our nation to its ancient liberty, dignity, and happiness; and if we do not, the fault is owing to ourselves, and not to any want of virtue and wisdom in them.

S E C T. XXXVIII.

The power of calling and dissolving parliaments is not simply in the king. The variety of customs in chusing parliament-men, and the errors a people may commit, neither prove, that kings are or ought to be absolute.

THE original of magistratical power, the intention of our ancestors in its creation, and the ways prescribed for the direction and limitation of it may, I presume, sufficiently appear by what has been said. But because our author, taking hold of every twig, pretends, "that kings may call and dissolve parliaments at their pleasure," and from thence infers "the power to be wholly in them;" alledges, "the various customs in several parts of this nation used in the elections of parliament-men, to proceed from the king's will:" and "because a people may commit errors," thinks "all power ought to be put into the hands of the king:"

I answer, 1. That the power of calling and dissolving parliaments is not simply in kings. They may call parliaments, if there be occasion, at times when the law does not exact it; they are placed as sentinels, and ought vigilantly to observe the motions of the enemy, and give notice of his approach: but if the sentinel fall asleep, neglect his duty, or maliciously endeavour to betray the city, those who are concerned may make use of all other means to know their danger, and to preserve themselves. The ignorance, incapacity, negligence, or luxury of a king, is a great calamity to a nation, and his malice is worse, but not an irreparable ruin. Remedies may be, and often have been found against the worst of their vices. The last French kings, of the races of Meroveus and Pepin, brought many mischiefs upon the kingdom, but the destruction was prevented. Edward and Richard the Seconds of England were not unlike them, and we know by what means the nation was preserved. The question was not who had the right, or who ought to call parliaments, but how the commonwealth might be saved from ruin. The consuls, or other chief magistrates in Rome, had certainly a right of assembling and dismissing the senate: but when Hannibal was at the gates, or any other imminent danger threatened them with destruction; if that magistrate had been drunk, mad, or gained by the enemy, no wise man can think, that formalities were to have been observed. In such cases every man is a magistrate; and he who best knows the danger, and the means of preventing it, has a right of calling the senate or people to an assembly. The people would, and certainly ought to follow him, as they did Brutus and Valerius against Tarquin, or Horatius and Valerius against the decemviri; and whoever should do otherwise, might, for sottishness, be compared to the courtiers of the two last kings of Spain. The first of these, by name Philip the Third, being indis-

CHAP. III. posed in cold weather, a braziero of coals was brought into his chamber, and placed so near to him, that he was cruelly scorched. A nobleman, then present, said to one who stood by him, "The king burns;" the other answered, it was true, but the page, whose office it was to bring and remove the braziero, was not there; and before he could be found, his majesty's legs and face were so burnt, that it caused an erysipelas, of which he died. Philip the Fourth escaped not much better, who being surprised as he was hunting by a violent storm of rain and hail, and no man presuming to lend the king a cloak, he was so wet before the officer could be found who carried his own, that he took a cold, which cast him into a dangerous fever. If kings like the consequences of such a regularity, they may cause it to be observed in their own families; but nations, looking in the first place to their own safety, would be guilty of the most extreme stupidity, if they should suffer themselves to be ruined for adhering to such ceremonies.

This is said upon a supposition, that the whole power of calling and dissolving parliaments is, by the law, placed in the king: but I utterly deny that it is so; and to prove it, shall give the following reasons.

(1.) That the king can have no such power, unless it be given to him, for every man is originally free; and the same power that makes him king, gives him all that belongs to his being king. It is not therefore an inherent, but a delegated power; and whoever receives it, is accountable to those that gave it; for, as our author is forced to confess, "they who give authority by commission, do always retain more than they grant."

(2.) The law for annual parliaments expressly declares it not to be in the king's power, as to the point of their meeting, nor consequently their continuance. For they meet to no purpose if they may not continue to do the work for which they meet; and it were absurd to give them a power of meeting, if they might not continue till it be done: for, as Grotius says, "Qui dat finem, dat media ad finem necessaria." The only reason why parliaments do meet, is to provide for the public good; and they by law ought to meet for that end. They ought not therefore to be dissolved, till it be accomplished. For this reason the opinion given by Tresilian, that kings might dissolve parliaments at their pleasure, was judged to be a principal part of his treason.

(3.) We have already proved, that Saxons, Danes, Normans, &c. who had no title to the crown, were made kings by mickleagemots, wittenagemots, and parliaments; that is, either by the whole people, or their representatives; others have been by the same authority restrained, brought to order, or deposed. But as it is impossible, that such as were not kings, and had no title to be kings, could, by virtue of a kingly power, call parliaments, when they had none; and absurd to think, that such as were in the throne, who had not governed according to law, would suffer themselves to be restrained, imprisoned, or deposed by parliaments, called and sitting by themselves, and still depending upon their will to be, or not to be; it is certain

tain that parliaments have in themselves a power of sitting and acting for the public good. SECT. 38.

2. To the second. The various customs used in elections are nothing to question. In the counties, which make up the body of the nation, all freeholders have their votes: these are properly "cives," members of the commonwealth, in distinction from those who are only "incolæ," or inhabitants, villains, and such as being under their parents, are not yet "sui juris." These, in the beginning of the Saxons reign in England, composed the mickle gemots; and when they grew to be so numerous, that one place could not contain them, or so far dispersed, that without trouble and danger they could not leave their habitations, they deputed such as should represent them. When the nation came to be more polished, to inhabit cities and towns, and to set up several arts and trades; those who exercised them, were thought to be as useful to the commonwealth, as the freeholders in the country, and to deserve the same privileges. But it not being reasonable, that every one should in this case do what he pleased; it was thought fit, that the king with his council (which always consisted of the "procures" and "magnates regni") should judge what numbers of men, and what places deserved to be made corporations, or bodies politic, and to enjoy those privileges, by which he did not confer upon them any thing that was his, but, according to the trust reposed in him, did dispense out of the public stock parcels of what he had received from the whole nation: and whether this was to be enjoyed by all the inhabitants, as in Westminster; by the common hall; as in London; or by the mayor, aldermen, jurats, and corporation, as in other places, it is the same thing; for in all these cases the king does only distribute, not give; and under the same condition that he might call parliaments, that is, for the public good. This indeed increases the honour of the person intrusted, and adds weight to the obligation incumbent upon him; but can never change the nature of the thing, so as to make that an inherent, which is only a delegated power. And as parliaments, when occasion required, have been assembled, have refused to be dissolved till their work was finished, have severely punished those who went about to persuade kings, that such matters depended absolutely upon their will, and made laws to the contrary; it is not to be imagined, that they would not also have interposed their authority in matters of charters, if it had been observed, that any king had notoriously abused the trust reposed in him, and turned the power to his private advantage, with which he was intrusted for the public good.

That which renders this most plain and safe, is, that men chosen in this manner to serve in parliament, do not act by themselves, but in conjunction with others, who are sent thither by prescription; nor by a power derived from kings, but from those that chuse them. If it be true therefore, that those who delegate powers, do always retain themselves more than they give, they who send these men, do not give them an absolute power of doing whatsoever they please, but retain to themselves more than they confer upon their deputies: they must therefore be accountable to their principals, contrary to what our author asserts. This continues in force, tho' he knows not, th

"any

CHAP. III. "any knights and burgesſes have ever been questioned by thoſe that ſent them;" for it cannot be concluded they ought not, or may not be questioned, becauſe none have been questioned. But in truth they are frequently questioned: the people do perpetually judge of the behaviour of their deputies. Whenſoever any of them has the miſfortune not to ſatisfy the major part of thoſe that choſe him, he is ſure to be rejected with diſgrace the next time he ſhall deſire to be choſen. This is not only a ſufficient puniſhment for ſuch faults, as he who is but one of five hundred may probably commit, but as much as the greateſt and freeſt people of the world did ever inflict upon their commanders, that brought the greateſt loſſes upon them. Appius Claudius, Pomponius, and Terentius Varro, ſurvived the greateſt defeats that ever the Romans ſuffered; and, tho' they had cauſed them by their folly and perverſeneſs, were never puniſhed. Yet I think no man doubts, that the Romans had as much right over their own officers, as the Athenians and Carthaginians, who frequently put them to death. They thought the mind of a commander would be too much diſtracted, if at the ſame time he ſhould ſtand in fear both of the enemy, and his own countrymen: and as they always endeavoured to chuſe the beſt men, they would lay no other neceſſity upon them of performing their duty, than what was ſuggeſted by their own virtue, and love to their country. It is not therefore to be thought ſtrange, if the people of England have followed the moſt generous, and moſt prosperous examples. Beſides, if any thing has been defective in their uſual proceedings with their delegates, the inconvenience has been repaired by the modeſty of the beſt and wiſeſt of them that were choſen. Many in all ages, and ſometimes the whole body of the commons, have reſuſed to give their opinion in ſome caſes, till they had conſulted with thoſe that ſent them: the houſes have been often adjourned to give them time to do it; and if this were done more frequently, or that the towns, cities, and counties, had on ſome occaſions given inſtructions to their deputies, matters would probably have gone better in parliament than they have often done.

3. The queſtion is not, whether the parliament be impeccable or infallible, but whether an aſſembly of nobility, with a houſe of commons compoſed of thoſe who are beſt eſteemed by their neighbours in all the towns and counties of England, are more or leſs ſubject to error or corruption, than ſuch a man, woman, or child, as happens to be next in blood to the laſt king. Many men do uſually ſee more than one; and if we may believe the wiſeſt king, "In the multitude of counſellors there is ſafety." Such as are of mature age, good experience, and approved reputation for virtue and wiſdom, will probably judge better than children or fools. Men are thought to be more fit for war, than women; and thoſe who are bred up in diſcipline, to underſtand it better than thoſe who never knew any thing of it. If ſome counties or cities fail to chuſe ſuch men as are eminently capable, all will hardly be ſo miſtaken as to chuſe thoſe who have no more of wiſdom or virtue, than is uſually entailed upon families. But Filmer at a venture admires the profound wiſdom of the king; tho', beſides ſuch as we have known, hiſtories give us too many proofs, that all

Prov. xi. 14.

all those who have been possessed of crowns, have not excelled that way. He SECT. 38.
 speaks of kings in general, and makes no difference between Solomon and his foolish son. He distinguishes not our Edward the First from Edward the Second; Edward the Third from Richard the Second; or Henry the Fifth from Henry the Sixth. And because all of them were kings, all of them, if he deserves credit, must needs have been endowed with profound wisdom. David was wise as an angel of God; therefore the present kings of France, Spain, and Sweden, must have been so also, when they were but five years old: Joan of Castille could not be mad, nor the two Joans of Naples infamous strumpets, or else all his arguments fall to the ground. For tho' Solomon's wisdom surpassed that of all the people, yet men could not rely equally upon that of Rehoboam, unless it had been equal. And if they are all equal in wisdom when they come to be equally kings, Perſes of Macedon was as great a captain as Philip or Alexander; Commodus and Heliogabalus were as wise and virtuous as Marcus Aurelius and Antoninus Pius: nay, Christina of Sweden, in her infancy, was as fit to command an army as her valiant father. If this be most absurd and false, there can be neither reason nor sense in proposing, as our author does, that the power should be in the king, because the parliament is not infallible. "It is," says he, "for the head to correct, and not to expect the consent of the members or parties peccant to be judges in their own cases; nor is it needful to confine the king, &c." Besides that this is directly contrary to his own fundamental maxim, that no man must be the judge of his own case, inasmuch as this would put the power into the king's hands, to decide the controversies between himself and the people, in which his own passions, private interest, and the corrupt counsels of ill ministers, will always lead him out of the way of justice, the inconveniences that may arise from a possibility that the parliament or people is not infallible, will be turned to the most certain and destructive mischiefs; as must have fallen out in Spain, if, upon a supposition that the estates of Castille might err, the correction of such errors had been left to the profound wisdom, and exquisite judgment, of Joan their queen and head, who was stark-mad. And the like may be said of many other princes, who through natural or accidental infirmities, want of age, or dotage, have been utterly unable to judge of any thing.

The matter will not be much mended, tho' I pass from ideots and lunatics, to such as know well enough how to cloathe and feed themselves, and to perform the ordinary functions of life; and yet have been as incapable of giving a right judgment concerning the weighty matters of government, as the weakest of children, or the most furious of madmen. Good manners forbid me to enumerate the examples of this kind, which Europe has produced even in this age: but I should commit a greater fault, if I did in silence pass over the extravagances of those, who being most weak in judgment, and irregular in their appetites, have been most impatient of any restraint upon their will. The brave Gustavus Adolphus, and his nephew Carolus Gustavus, who was not inferior to him in valour, wisdom, and love to his people, were content with the power that the laws of their country gave to them: but Frederic the Fourth of Den-

CHAP. III. Denmark never rested till he had overthrown the liberty of that nation. Casimir by attempting the like in Poland, lost almost half of that kingdom; and flying from the other, left all to be ravaged by Swedes, Tartars, and Cossacs. The present emperor, who passed his time in setting songs in music with a wretched Italian eunuch, when he ought to have been at the head of a brave army, raised to oppose the Turks in the year 1664. and which under good conduct might have overthrown the Ottoman empire, as soon as he was delivered from the fear of that enemy, fell upon his own subjects with such cruelty, that they are now forced to fly to the Turks for protection; the protestants especially, who find their condition more tolerable under those professed enemies to christianity, than to be exposed to the pride, avarice, perfidiousness, and violence, of the jesuits, by whom he is governed. And the qualities of the king of Portugal are so well known, together with the condition to which he would have brought his kingdom if he had not been sent to the Tercera's, that I need not speak particularly of him.

If kings therefore, by virtue of their office, are constituted judges over the body of their people, because the people, or parliaments representing them, are not infallible; those kings who are children, fools, disabled by age, or madmen, are so also; women have the same right, where they are admitted to the succession; those men, who, tho' of ripe age, and not superannuated, nor directly fools or madmen, yet absolutely incapable of judging important affairs, or by their passions, interests, vices, or malice and wickedness of their ministers, servants, and favourites, are set to oppress and ruin the people, enjoy the same privilege; than which nothing can be imagined more absurd and abominable, nor more directly tending to the corruption and destruction of the nations under them, for whose good and safety our author confesses they have their power.

S E C T. XXXIX.

Those kings only are heads of the people, who are good, wise, and seek to advance no interest but that of the public.

THE worst of men seldom arrive to such a degree of impudence, as plainly to propose the most mischievous follies and enormities. They who are enemies to virtue, and fear not God, are afraid of men, and dare not offer such things as the world will not bear, lest by that means they should overthrow their own designs. All poison must be disguised, and no man can be persuaded to eat arsenic, unless it be covered with something that appears to be harmless. Creusa would have abhorred Medea's present, if the pestilent venom had not been hidden by the exterior lustre of gold and gems. The garment that destroyed Hercules appeared beautiful; and Eve had neither eaten of the forbidden tree, or given the fruit to her husband, if it had not seemed to be good and pleasant, and she had not been induced to believe, that by eating it they should both be as Gods. The servants of the devil have always followed the same method: their malice is carried on by fraud, and they have seldom destroyed any, but such as they had first deceived. Truth can never conduce to mischief, and is best discovered by plain words; but nothing is more usual with ill men, than to cover their mischievous designs with figurative phrases. It would be too ridiculous to say in plain terms, that all kings without distinction are better able to judge of all matters than any or all their people; they must therefore be called "the head," that thereby they may be invested with all the pre-eminences which in a natural body belong to that part; and men must be made to believe the analogy between the natural and political body to be perfect. But the matter must be better examined before this mortal poison seem fit to be swallowed.

to

The word "head" is figuratively used both in Scripture and profane authors in several senses, in relation to places or persons, and always implies something of real or seeming pre-eminence in point of honour or jurisdiction. Thus Damascus is said to be the head of Syria; Samaria of Ephraim, and Ephraim of the ten tribes; that is, Ephraim was the chief tribe; Samaria was the chief city of Ephraim, and Damascus of Syria; tho' it be certain, that Ephraim had no jurisdiction over the other tribes, nor Samaria over the other cities of Ephraim, but every one according to the law had an equal power within itself, or the territories belonging to it; and no privileges were granted to one above another, except to Jerusalem, in the matter of religion, because the temple was placed there.

The words also head, prince, principal man, or captain, seem to be equivocal; and in this sense, the same men are called heads of the tribes, princes in the houses of their fathers: and it is said, that two hundred heads of the tribe of Reuben were carried away captive by Tiglath-Pilezer, and proportionably in the other tribes; which were a strange thing, if the word did imply that supreme, absolute, and infinite power that our author attributes to it: and no man of less understanding than he, can comprehend how there should be two hundred or more sovereign unlimited powers in one tribe, most especially when it is certain, that one series of kings had for many ages reigned over that tribe and nine more; and that every one of those tribes, as well as the particular cities, even from their first entrance into the promised land, had a full jurisdiction within itself. When the Gileadites came to Jephtha, he suspected them, and asked whether indeed they intended to make him their head? They answered, if he would lead them against the Ammonites, he should be their head. In the like sense, when Julius Cæsar in despair would have killed himself, one of his soldiers dissuaded him from that design, by telling him, " * That the safety of so many nations, that had made him their head, depending upon his life, it would be cruelty in

* Cum tot ab hac anima populorum vita salusque
Pendeat, & tantus caput hoc sibi fecerit orbis, Sævitia est voluisse mori. ———— Lucan.

CHAP. III. "him to take such a resolution." But for all that, when this head was taken off, the body did still subsist: upon which I observe many fundamental differences, between the relation of this figurative head (even when the word is rightly applied) and that of the natural head to their respective bodies.

The figurative heads may be many, the natural but one.

The people make or create the figurative head; the natural is from itself, or connate with the body.

The natural body cannot change or subsist without the natural head; but a people may change and subsist very well without the artificial. Nay, if it had been true, that the world had chosen Cæsar, as it was not (for he was chosen only by a factious mercenary army, and the soundest part so far opposed that election, that they brought him to think of killing himself) there could have been no truth in this flattering assertion, "That the safety of the whole depended upon his life:" for the world could not only subsist without him, but without any such head, as it had done, before he by the help of his corrupted soldiery had usurped the power; which also shews, that a civil head may be a matter of convenience, but not of necessity. Many nations have had none; and if the expression be so far stretched, as to make it extend to the annual or temporary magistrates set up by the Athenians, Carthaginians, Romans, and other antient commonwealths, or to those at this day in Venice, Holland, Switzerland, and other places, it must be confessed, that the people who made, deposed, abrogated, or abolished, both the magistrates and magistracies, had the power of framing, directing, and removing their heads, which, our author will say, is most absurd. Yet they did it without any prejudice to themselves, and very often much to their advantage.

In mentioning these vast and essential differences between the natural and political head, I no-way intend to exclude others, that may be of equal weight; but as all figurative expressions have their strength only from similitude, there can be little or none in this, which differs in so many important points, and can therefore be of no effect.

However, right proceeds from identity, and not from similitude. The right of a man over me is by being my father, and not by being like my father. If I had a brother so perfectly resembling me, as to deceive our parents, which has sometimes happened to twins, it could give him no right to any thing that is mine. If the power therefore of correcting the parties peccant, which our author attributes to kings, be grounded upon the name of head, and a resemblance between the heads of the body politic and body natural; if this resemblance be found to be exceedingly imperfect, uncertain, or perhaps no-way relating to the matter in question; or tho' it did, and were absolutely perfect, could confer no right; the allegation of it is impertinent and absurd.

This being cleared, it is time to examine, what the office of the head is in a natural body, that we may learn from thence, why that name is sometimes given to those, who are eminent in political bodies, and to whom it does belong.

Some

Some men account the head to be so absolutely the seat of all the senses, SECT. 39.
as to derive even that of feeling, which is exercised in every part, from the brain: but I think it is not doubted, that all the rest have both their seat and function in the head; and whatsoever is useful or hurtful to a man, is by them represented to the understanding; as Aristotle says, "Nihil est "intellectu, quod non sit prius in sensu." This is properly the part of every magistrate: he is the centinel of the public, and is to represent what he discovers beneficial or hurtful to the society; which office belongs not only to the supreme, but proportionably to the subordinate. In this sense were the chief men among the Israelites called, "heads of their fathers house, choice
"and mighty men of valour, chief of the princes." And in the following Chron.
vii. 40.
chapter mention is made of "nine hundred and fifty Benjamites, chief men in the house of their fathers." These men exercised a charitable care over such as were inferior to them in power and valour, without any shadow of sovereignty, or possibility that there could be so many sovereigns:
and such as were under their care are said to be their brethren; which is not a word of majesty and domination, but of dearness and equality.
The name therefore of head may be given to a sovereign, but it implies nothing of sovereignty; and must be exercised with charity, which always terminates in the good of others. The head cannot correct or chastise; the proper work of that part is only to indicate; and he who takes upon him to do more is not the head. A natural body is homogeneous, and cannot subsist, if it be not so. We cannot take one part of a horse, another of a bear, and put upon them the head of a lion; for it would be a monster, that would have neither action nor life. The head must be of the same nature with the other members, or it cannot subsist. But the lord or master differs "in specie" from his servants and slaves: he is not therefore properly their head.

Besides, the head cannot have a subsistence without the body, nor any interest contrary to that of the body; and it is impossible for any thing to be good for the head, that is hurtful to the body. A prince therefore or magistrate, who sets up an interest in himself distinct from, or repugnant to, that of the people, renounces the title or quality of their head. Indeed, Moses was the head of the Israelites: for when God threatened to destroy that people, and promised to make him a great nation, he waved the particular advantages offered to himself, interceded for them, and procured their pardon. Yet he was not able to bear the weight of the government alone; but desired that some might be appointed to assist him. Gideon was the head of the same people; but he would not reign himself, nor suffer his sons to reign over them. Samuel was also their head; he took nothing from any man, defrauded none, took bribes from no man, oppressed none;
God and the people were his witnesses: he blamed them for their rebellion against God in asking a king, but was no-way concerned for himself, or his family. David likewise had a right to that title; for he desired, that God would spare the people, and turn the effect of his anger against himself, and the house of his father. But Rehoboam was not their head; for tho' he acknowledged, that his father had laid a heavy yoke upon them, yet he

CHAP. III. told them he would add to the weight; and that if his father had chastised them with whips, he would chastise them with scorpions. The head is no burden to the body, and can lay none upon it; the head cannot chastise any member; and he who does so, be it more or less, cannot be the head. Jeroboam was not the head of the revolting tribes; for the head takes care of the members, and to provide for the safety of the whole: but he, through fear that the people going to Jerusalem to worship should return to the house of David, by setting up idols to secure his own interests, drew guilt and destruction upon them. Tho' it should be granted, that Augustus, by a gentle use of his power, had in a manner expiated the detestable villainies committed in the acquisition, and had truly deserved to be called the head of the Romans; yet that title could no-way belong to Caligula, Claudius, Nero, or Vitellius, who neither had the qualities required in the head, nor the understanding or will to perform the office. Nay, if I should carry the matter farther, and acknowledge that Brutus, Cincinnatus, Fabius, Camillus, and others, who, in the time of their annual or shorter magistracies, had by their vigilance, virtue, and care to preserve the city in safety, and to provide for the public good, performed the office of the head, and might deserve the name; I might justly deny it to the greatest princes that have been in the world, who, having their power for life, and leaving it to descend to their children, have wanted the virtues required for the performance of their duty: and I should less fear to be guilty of an absurdity in saying, that a nation might every year change its head, than that he can be the head, who cares not for the members, nor understands the things that conduce to their good, most especially if he set up an interest in himself against them. It cannot be said, that these are imaginary cases, and that no prince does these things; for the proof is too easy, and the examples too numerous. Caligula could not have wished the Romans but one head, that he might cut it off at once, if he had been that head, and had advanced no interest contrary to that of the members. Nero had not burned the city of Rome, if his concernments had been inseparably united to those of the people. He who caused above three hundred thousand of his innocent unarmed subjects to be murdered, and filled his whole kingdom with fire and blood, did set up a personal interest repugnant to that of the nation; and no better testimony can be required to shew, that he did so, than a letter written by his son, to take off the penalty due to one of the chief ministers of those cruelties, for this reason, that what he had done, was "by the command, and for the service, of his royal father." King John did not pursue the advantage of his people, when he endeavoured to subject them to the pope, or the Moors. And whatever prince seeks assistance from foreign powers, or makes leagues with any stranger or enemy for his own advantage against his people, however secret the treaty may be, declares himself not to be the head, but an enemy to them. The head cannot stand in need of an exterior help against the body, nor subsist when divided from it. He therefore that courts such an assistance, divides himself from the body; and if he do subsist, it must be by a life he has in himself, distinct from that of the body, which the head cannot have.

But

But besides these enormities, that testify the most wicked rage and fury, in SECT. 39.
the highest degree, there is another practice, which no man that knows the world, can deny to be common with princes, and incompatible with the nature of a head. The head cannot desire to draw all the nourishment of the body to itself, nor more than a due proportion. If the rest of the parts are sick, weak, or cold, the head suffers equally with them; and, if they perish, must perish also. Let this be compared with the actions of many princes we know, and we shall soon see which of them are heads of their people. If the gold brought from the Indies, has been equally distributed by the kings of Spain to the body of that nation, I consent they may be called the heads.
If the kings of France assume no more of the riches of that great kingdom, than their due proportion, let them also wear that honourable name. But if the naked backs, and empty bellies, of their miserable subjects evince the contrary, it can by no means belong to them. If those great nations waste and languish; if nothing be so common in the best provinces belonging to them, as misery, famine, and all the effects of the most outrageous oppression, whilst their princes and favourites possess such treasures, as the most wanton prodigality cannot exhaust; if that which is gained by the sweat of so many millions of men, be torn out of the mouths of their starving wives and children, to foment the vices of those luxurious courts, or reward the ministers of their lusts; the nourishment is not distributed equally to all the parts of the body; the œconomy of the whole is overthrown; and they who do these things, cannot be the heads, nor parts of the body, but something distinct from, and repugnant to it. It is not therefore he who is found in, or advanced to the place of the head, who is truly the head: it is not he who ought, but he who does perform the office of the head, that deserves the name and privileges belonging to the head. If our author therefore will persuade us, that any king is head of his people, he must do it by arguments peculiarly relating to him, since those in general are found to be false. If he say, that the king, as king, may direct or correct the people, and that the power of determining all controversies must be referred to him, because they may be mistaken, he must shew that the king is infallible; for unless he do so, the wound is not cured. This also must be by some other way, than by saying he is their head; for such powers belong not to the office of the head, and we see, that all kings do not deserve that name: many of them want both understanding and will, to perform the functions of the head; and many act directly contrary, in the whole course of their government. If any therefore among them have merited the glorious name of heads of nations, it must have been by their personal virtues, by a vigilant care of the good of their people, by an inseparable conjunction of interests with them, by an ardent love to every member of the society, by a moderation of spirit affecting no undue superiority, or assuming any singular advantage, which they are not willing to communicate to every part of the political body. He who finds this merit in himself, will scorn all the advantages that can be drawn from misapplied names: he that knows such honour to be peculiarly due to him for being the best of kings, will never glory in that which may be common

CHAP. III. to him with the worst. Nay, whoever pretends, by such general discourses as these of our author, to advance the particular interests of any one king, does either know he is of no merit, and that nothing can be said for him, which will not as well agree with the worst of men; or cares not what he says, so he may do mischief; and is well enough contented, that he who is set up by such maxims as a public plague, may fall in the ruin he brings upon the people.

S E C T. XL.

Good laws prescribe easy and safe remedies against the evils proceeding from the vices or infirmities of the magistrate; and when they fail, they must be supplied.

THOSE who desire to advance the power of the magistrate above the law, would persuade us, that the difficulties, and dangers of inquiring into his actions, or opposing his will, when employed in violence and injustice, are so great, that the remedy is always worse than the disease; and that it is better to suffer all the evils that may proceed from his infirmities and vices, than to hazard the consequences of displeasing him. But, on the contrary, I think, and hope to prove,

1. That in well-constituted governments, the remedies against ill magistrates are easy and safe.

2. That it is good, as well for the magistrate as the people, so to constitute the government, that the remedies may be easy and safe.

3. That how dangerous and difficult soever they may be through the defects of the first constitution, they must be tried.

Plutarch.

To the first; it is most evident, that in well regulated governments these remedies have been found to be easy and safe. The kings of Sparta were not suffered in the least to deviate from the rule of the law: and Theopompus one of those kings, in whose time the ephori were created, and the regal power much restrained, doubted not to affirm, that it was by that means become more lasting, and more secure. Pausanias had not the name of king, but commanded in the war against Xerxes with more than regal power: nevertheless, being grown insolent, he was, without any trouble to that state, banished, and afterwards put to death. Leontidas father of Cleomenes, was in the like manner banished. The second Agis was most unjustly put to death by the ephori; for he was a brave and a good prince; but there was neither danger nor difficulty in the action. Many of the Roman magistrates, after the expulsion of the kings, seem to have been desirous to extend their power beyond the bounds of the law; and perhaps some others, as well as the decemviri, may have designed an absolute tyranny; but the first were restrained, and the others without much difficulty suppressed. Nay, even the kings were so well kept in order, that no man ever pretended to the crown, unless he were chosen, nor nor made any other use of his power than the law permitted, except the last Tar-quin, who by his insolence, avarice, and cruelty, brought ruin upon himself and SECT. 40.

 his family. I have already mentioned one or two dukes of Venice, who were not less ambitious; but their crimes returned upon their own heads, and they perished without any other danger to the state, than what had passed before their treasons were discovered. Infinite examples of the like nature may be alledged; and if matters have not at all times, and in all places, succeeded in the same manner, in has been because the same courses were not every-where taken; for all things do so far follow their causes, that, being ordered in the same manner, they will always produce the same effects.

2. To the second; such a regulation of the magistratical power is not at all grievous to a good magistrate. He who never desires to do any thing but what he ought, cannot desire a power of doing what he ought not, nor be troubled to find he cannot do that which he would not do if he could. This inability is also advantageous to those who are evil or unwise; that since they cannot govern themselves, a law may be imposed upon them, lest, by following their own irregular will, they bring destruction upon themselves, their families, and people, as many have done. If Apollo in the fable had not been too indulgent to Phaeton, in granting his ill-conceived request, the furious youth had not brought a necessity upon Jupiter, either of destroying him, or suffering the world to be destroyed by him.

Besides, good and wise men know the weight of sovereign power, and mis-doubt their own strength. Sacred and human histories furnish us with many examples of those who have feared the lustre of a crown. Men that find in themselves no delight in doing mischief, know not what thoughts may infinue into their minds, when they are raised too much above their sphere.
 They who were able to bear adversity, have been precipitated into ruin by properity. When the prophet told Hazael the villainies he would commit, he answered, "Is thy servant a dog, that I should do these things?" but yet he did them. I know not where to find an example of a man more excellently qualified, than Alexander of Macedon; but he fell under the weight of his own fortune, and grew to exceed those in vice, whom he had conquered by his virtue. The nature of man can hardly suffer such violent changes, without being disordered by them; and every one ought to enter into a just diffidence of himself, and fear the temptations that have destroyed so many. If any man be so happily born, so carefully educated, so established in virtue, that no storm can shake him, nor any poison corrupt him, yet he will consider he is mortal; and, knowing no more than Solomon, whether his son shall be a wise man or a fool, he will always fear to take upon him a power, which must prove a most pestilent evil both to the person that has it, and to those that are under it, as soon as it shall fall into the hands of one who either knows not how to use it, or may be easily drawn to abuse it. Supreme magistrates always walk in obscure and slippery places; but when they are advanced so high, that no one is near enough to support, direct, or restrain them, their fall is inevitable and mortal. And those nations that have wanted the pro-

CHAP. III. prudence rightly to balance the powers of their magistrates, have been frequently obliged to have recourse to the most violent remedies, and with much difficulty, danger, and blood, to punish the crimes which they might have prevented. On the other side, such as have been more wise in the constitution of their governments, have always had regard to the frailty of human nature, and the corruption reigning in the hearts of men; and, being less liberal of the power over their lives and liberties, have reserved to themselves so much, as might keep their magistrates within the limits of the law, and oblige them to perform the ends of their institution. And as the law which denounces severe penalties for crimes, is indeed merciful both to ill men, who are by that means deterred from committing them; and to the good, who otherwise would be destroyed; so those nations that have kept the reins in their hands, have by the same act provided as well for the safety of their princes, as for their own. They who know the law is well defended, seldom attempt to subvert it: they are not easily tempted to run into excesses, when such bounds are set, as may not safely be transgressed; and whilst they are by this means rendered more moderate in the exercise of their power, the people is exempted from the odious necessity of suffering all manner of indignities and miseries, or by their destruction to prevent or avenge them.

3. To the third; if these rules have not been well observed in the first constitution, or from the changes of times, corruption of manners, insensible encroachments, or violent usurpations of princes, have been rendered ineffectual, and the people exposed to all the calamities that may be brought upon them by the weakness, vices, and malice of the prince, or those who govern him, I confess the remedies are more difficult and dangerous; but even in those cases they must be tried. Nothing can be feared that is worse than what is suffered, or must in a short time fall upon those who are in this condition. They who are already fallen into all that is odious, shameful, and miserable, cannot justly fear. When things are brought to such a pass, the boldest counsels are the most safe; and if they must * perish who lie still, and they can but perish who are most active, the choice is easily made. Let the danger be never so great, there is a possibility of safety, whilst men have life, hands, arms, and courage to use them; but that people must certainly perish, who tamely suffer themselves to be oppressed, either by the injustice, cruelty, and malice of an ill magistrate, or by those who prevail upon the vices and infirmities of weak princes. It is in vain to say, that this may give occasion to men of raising tumults, or civil war; for tho' these are evils, yet they are not the greatest of evils. Civil war, in Machiavel's account, is a disease; but tyranny is the death of a state. Gentle ways are first to be used, and it is best if the work can be done by them; but it must not be left undone, if they fail. It is good to use supplications, advices, and remonstrances; but those who have no regard to justice, and will not hearken to counsel, must be constrained. It is SECT. 40.

* Moriendum victis, moriendum deditis; id solum interest, an inter cruciatus & ludibria, an per virtutem expiremus. C. Tacit.

Quod si nocentes innocentemque; idem exitus maneat, acrioris viri est merito perire. Ibid.

 folly to deal otherwise with a man who will not be guided by reason, and a magistrate who despises the law; or rather, to think him a man, who rejects the essential principle of a man; or to account him a magistrate, who overthrows the law by which he is a magistrate. This is the last result; but those nations must come to it, which cannot otherwise be preserved. Nero's madness was not to be cured, nor the mischievous effects of it any otherwise to be suppressed than by his death. He who had spared such a monster when it was in his power to remove him, had brought destruction upon the whole empire;
 and by a foolish clemency made himself the author of his future villainies.
 This would have been yet more clear, if the world had then been in such a temper as to be capable of an intire liberty. But the antient foundations had been overthrown, and nothing better could be built upon the new, than something that might in part resist that torrent of iniquity which had overflowed the best part of the world, and give mankind a little time to breathe under a less barbarous master. Yet all the best men did join in the work that was then to be done, tho' they knew it would prove but imperfect. The sacred history is not without examples of this kind: when Ahab had subverted the law, set up false witnesses, and corrupt judges, to destroy the innocent, killed the prophets, and established idolatry, his house must then be cut off, and his blood be licked up by dogs. When matters are brought to this pass, the decision is easy. The question is only whether the punishment of crimes shall fall upon one or a few persons who are guilty of them, or upon a whole nation that is innocent. If the father may not die for the son, nor the son for the father, but every one must bear the penalty of his own crimes, it would be most absurd to punish the people for the guilt of princes. When the earl of Morton was sent ambassador to queen Elizabeth by the estates of Scotland, to justify their proceedings against Mary their queen, whom they had obliged to renounce the government, he alledged amongst other things the murder of her husband plainly proved against her; asserted the antient right and custom of that kingdom, of * examining the actions of their kings; by which means, he said, many had been † punished with death, imprisonment, and exile; confirmed their actions by the examples of other nations; and upon the whole matter concluded, that if she was still permitted to live, it was not on account of her innocence, or any exemption from the penalties of the law, but from the mercy and clemency of the people, who, contenting themselves with a resignation of her right and power to her son, had spared her. This discourse, which is set down at large by the historian cited on the margin, being of * Animadvertendi in reges.

† Morte, vinculis, & exilio puniti. Buchan. hist. Scot. l. xx. Qui tot reges regno exuerunt, exilio damnarunt, carceribus coercuerunt, supplicio deniq; affecerunt, nec unquam tamen de acerbitate legis minuenda mentio est facta, &c. Ibid. Facile apparet regnum nihil aliud esse, quam mutuam inter regem & populum stipulationem. Non de illarum sanctionum genere, quæ mutationibus temporum sunt obnoxie, sed in primo generis humani exortu, et mutuo prope omnium genium consensu comprobata, & una cum rerum natura infragiles & sempiternæ perennent. Ibid.

CHAP. III. such strength in itself as never to have been any otherwise answered than by railing, and no-way disapproved by queen Elizabeth, or her council, to whom it was made, either upon a general account of the pretensions of princes to be exempted from the penalties of the law, or any pretext that they had particularly misapplied them in relation to their queen, I may justly say, that when nations fall under such princes as are either utterly incapable of making a right use of their power, or do maliciously abuse that authority with which they are entrusted, those nations stand obliged, by the duty they owe to themselves and their posterity, to use the best of their endeavour to remove the evil, whatever danger or difficulties they may meet with in the performance. Pontius the Samnite said as truly as bravely to his countrymen, That “ * those arms were “ just and pious, that were necessary; and necessary, when there was no hope “ of safety by any other way.” This is the voice of mankind, and is disliked only by those princes, who fear the deserved punishments that may fall upon them; or by their servants and flatterers, who, being for the most part the authors of their crimes, think they shall be involved in their ruin.

S E C T. XLI.

The people, for whom and by whom the magistrates is created, can only judge whether he rightly perform his office or not.

IT is commonly said, that no man ought to be the judge of his own case; and our author lays much weight upon it as a fundamental maxim, tho', according to his ordinary inconstancy, he overthrows it in the case of kings, where it ought to take place, if in any; for it often falls out, that no men are less capable of forming a right judgment than they. Their passions and interests are most powerful to disturb or pervert them. No men are so liable to be diverted from justice by the flatteries of corrupt servants. They never act as kings, except for those by whom and for whom they are created; and acting for others, the account of their actions cannot depend upon their own will. Nevertheless I am not afraid to say, that naturally and properly a man is the judge of his own concerns. No one is or can be deprived of this privilege, unless by his own consent, and for the good of that society into which he enters. This right therefore must necessarily belong to every man in all cases, except only such as relate to the good of the community, for whose sake he has divested himself of it. If I find myself afflicted with hunger, thirst, weariness, cold, heat, or sickness, it is a folly to tell me, I ought not to seek meat, drink, rest, shelter, refreshment, or physic, because I must not be the judge of my own case. The like may be said in relation to my house, * Iusta piaq; sunt arma; quibus necessaria, & necessaria, quibus nulla nisi in armis spes est salutis. T. Liv. lib. ix. c. 1.

land, or estate; I may do what I please with them, if I bring no damage upon SECT. 41.
 others. But I must not set fire to my house, by which my neighbour's house may be burnt. I may not erect forts upon my own lands, or deliver them to a foreign enemy, who may by that means infest my country. I may not cut the banks of the sea, or those of a river, lest my neighbour's ground be over-flown, because the society into which I am incorporated, would by such means receive prejudice. My land is not simply my own, but upon condition that I shall not thereby bring damage upon the public, by which I am protected in the peaceable enjoyment and innocent use of what I possess. But this society leaves me a liberty to take servants, and put them away, at my pleasure. No man is to direct me, of what quality or number they shall be, or can tell me whether I am well or ill served by them. Nay, the state takes no other cognizance of what passes between me and them, than to oblige me to perform the contracts I make, and not to do that to them which the law forbids:
 that is to say, the power to which I have submitted myself, exercises that jurisdiction over me, which was established by my consent, and under which I enjoy all the benefits of life, which are of more advantage to me than my liberty could have been, if I had retained it wholly in myself. The nature also and measure of this submission must be determined by the reasons that induced me to it. The society in which I live cannot subsist, unless by rule; the equality in which men are born is so perfect, that no man will suffer his natural liberty to be abridged, except others do the like: I cannot reasonably expect to be defended from wrong, unless I oblige myself to do none; or to suffer the punishment prescribed by the law, if I perform not my engagement. But, without prejudice to the society into which I enter, I may and do retain to myself the liberty of doing what I please in all things relating peculiarly to myself, or in which I am to seek my own convenience.

Now if a private man is not subject to the judgment of any other, than those to whom he submits himself for his own safety and convenience; and, notwithstanding that submission, still retains to himself the right of ordering according to his own will all things merely relating to himself, and of doing what he pleases in that which he does for his own sake; the same right must more certainly belong to whole nations. When a controversy happens between Caius and Seius in a matter of right, neither of them may determine the cause, but it must be referred to a judge superior to both; not because it is not fit that a man should be judge of his own case, but because they have both an equal right, and neither of them owes any subjection to the other. But if there be a contest between me and my servant concerning my service, I only am to decide it: he must serve me in my own way, or be gone, if I think fit, tho' he serve me never so well; and I do him no wrong in putting him away, if either I intend to keep no servant, or find that another will please me better.
 I cannot therefore stand in need of a judge, unless the contest be with one who lives upon an equal foot with me. No man can be my judge, unless he be my superior; and he cannot be my superior, who is not so by my consent, nor to any other purpose than I consent to. This cannot be the case of a

CHAP. III. nation, which can have no equal within itself. Controversies may arise with other nations, the decision of which may be left to judges chosen by mutual agreement; but this relates not to our question. A nation, and most especially one that is powerful, cannot recede from its own right, as a private man, from the knowledge of his own weakness, and inability to defend himself, must come under the protection of a greater power than his own. The strength of a nation is not in the magistrate, but the strength of the magistrate is in the nation. The wisdom, industry, and valour of a prince may add to the glory and greatness of a nation, but the foundation and substance will always be in itself. If the magistrate and people were upon equal terms, as Caius and Seius, receiving equal and mutual advantages from each other, no man could be judge of their differences, but such as they should set up for that end. This has been done by many nations. The antient Germans referred the decision of the most difficult matters to their priests: the Gauls and Britons to the Druids: the Mahometans for some ages to the califs of Babylon: the Saxons in England, when they had embraced the christian religion, to their clergy. Whilst all Europe lay under the popish superstition, the decision of such matters was frequently assumed by the pope; men often submitted to his judgment, and the princes that resisted were for the most part excommunicated, deposed, and destroyed. All this was done for the same reasons. These men were accounted holy and inspired, and the sentence pronounced by them was usually revered as the judgment of God, who was thought to direct them; and all those who refused to submit, were esteemed execrable. But no man or number of men, as I think, at the institution of a magistrate, did ever say, If any difference happen between you or your successors and us, it shall be determined by yourself, or by them, whether they be men, women, children, mad, foolish, or vicious. Nay, if any such thing had been, the folly, turpitude, and madness of such a sanction or stipulation must necessarily have destroyed it. But if no such thing was ever known, or could have no effect, if it had been in any place, it is most absurd to impose it upon all. The people therefore cannot be deprived of their natural rights upon a frivolous pretence to that which never was, and never can be. They who create magistracies, and give to them such name, form, and power, as they think fit, do only know, whether the end for which they were created, be performed or not. They who give a being to the power which had none, can only judge whether it be employed to their welfare, or turned to their ruin. They do not set up one or a few men, that they and their posterity may live in splendor and greatness, but that justice may be administred, virtue established, and provision made for the public safety. No wise man will think this can be done, if those who set themselves to overthrow the law, are to be their own judges. If Caligula, Nero, Vitellius, Domitian, or Heliogabalus, had been subject to no other judgment, they would have completed the destruction of the empire. If the disputes between Dursus, Evenus the Third, Dardanus, and other kings of Scotland, with the nobility and people, might have been determined by themselves, selves, they had escaped the punishments they suffered, and ruined the nation SECT. 41.

 as they designed. Other methods were taken; they perished by their madness; better princes were brought into their places, and their successors were by their example admonished to avoid the ways that had proved fatal to them.
 If Edward the Second of England, with Gaveston and the Spencers, Richard the Second with Trefilian and Vere, had been permitted to be the judges of their own cases, they who had murdered the best of the nobility, would have pursued their designs to the destruction of such as remained, the enslaving of the nation, the subversion of the constitution, and the establishment of a mere tyranny in the place of a mixed monarchy. But our ancestors took better measures: they who had felt the smart of the vices and follies of their princes, knew what remedies were most fit to be applied, as well as the best time of applying them. They found the effects of extreme corruption in government to be so desperately pernicious, that nations must necessarily perish, unless it be corrected, and the state reduced to its first principle, or altered. Which being the case, it was easy for them to judge, whether the governor, who had introduced that corruption, should be brought to order, and removed if he would not be reclaimed; or whether he should be suffered to ruin them and their posterity, as it is for me to judge, whether I should put away my servant, if I knew he intended to poison or murder me, and had a certain facility of accomplishing his design; or whether I should continue him in my service till he had performed it. Nay, the matter is so much the more plain on the side of the nation, as the disproportion of merit between a whole people, and one or a few men entrusted with the power of governing them, is greater than between a private man and his servant. This is so fully confirmed by the general consent of mankind, that we know no government that has not frequently either been altered in form, or reduced to its original purity, by changing the families or persons who abused the power with which they had been entrusted. Those who have wanted wisdom and virtue, rightly and seasonably to perform this, have been soon destroyed; like the Goths in Spain, who, by omitting to curb the fury of Witza and Rodrigo in time, became a prey to the Moors. Their kingdom by this means destroyed was never restored, and the remainder of that nation, joining with the Spaniards, whom they had kept in subjection for three or four ages, could not in less than eight hundred years, expel those enemies they might have kept out only by removing two base and vicious kings. Such nations as have been so corrupted, that when they have applied themselves to seek remedies to the evils they suffered by wicked magistrates, could not fall upon such as were proportionable to the disease, have only vented their passions in destroying the immediate instruments of their oppression, or for a while delayed their utter ruin. But the root still remaining, it soon produced the same poisonous fruit, and either quite destroyed, or made them languish in perpetual misery. The Roman empire was the most eminent example of the first; many of the monsters that had tyrannized over them were killed; but the greatest advantage gained by their death, was a respite from ruin; and
 the

CHAP. III. the government, which ought to have been established by good laws, depending only upon the virtue of one man, his life proved to be no more than a lucid interval, and at his death they relapsed into the depth of infamy and misery; and in this condition they continued till the empire was totally subverted.

All the kingdoms of the Arabians, Medes, Persians, Moors, and others of the east, are of the other sort. Common sense instructs them, that barbarous pride, cruelty, and madness grown to extremity, cannot be borne: but they have no other way than to kill the tyrant, and to do the like to his successor, if he fall into the same crimes. Wanting that wisdom and valour which is required for the institution of a good government, they languish in perpetual slavery, and propose to themselves nothing better than to live under a gentle master, which is but a precarious life, and little to be valued by men of bravery and spirit. But those nations that are more generous, who set a higher value upon liberty, and better understand the ways of preserving it, think it a small matter to destroy a tyrant, unless they can also destroy the tyranny. They endeavour to do the work thoroughly, either by changing the government intirely, or reforming it according to the first institution, and making such good laws as may preserve its integrity when reformed. This has been so frequent in all the nations (both antient and modern) with whose actions we are best acquainted, as appears by the foregoing examples, and many others that might be alledged, if the case were not clear, that there is not one of them which will not furnish us with many instances; and no one magistracy now in being which does not owe its original to some judgment of this nature. So that they must either derive their right from such actions, or confess they have none at all, and leave the nations to their original liberty of setting up those magistracies which best please themselves, without any restriction or obligation to regard one person or family more than another.

S E C T. XLII.

The person that wears the crown cannot determine the affairs which the law refers to the king.

OUR author, with the rest of the vulgar, seems to have been led into gross errors by the form of writs summoning persons to appear before the king. The common style used in the trial of delinquents; the name of the king's witnesses given to those who accuse them; the verdicts brought in by juries, "coram domino rege;" and the prosecution made in the king's name; seem to have caused this. And they who understand not these phrases, render the law a heap of the most gross absurdities, and the king an enemy to every one of his subjects, when he ought to be a father to them all; since without any particular consideration or examination of what any witness deposes in a court of justice, tending to the death, confiscation, or other punish-punishment of any man, he is called the king's witness, whether he speak the truth, or a lye, and on that account favoured. It is not necessary to alledge many instances in a case that is so plain; but it may not be amiss to insert two or three of the most important reasons to prove my assertion. SECT. 42.

1. If the law did intend, that he or she who wears the crown, should in his or her person judge all causes, and determine the most difficult questions, it must, like our author, presume that they will always be of profound wisdom to comprehend all of them, and of perfect integrity always to act according to their understanding. Which is no less than to lay the foundation of the government upon a thing merely contingent, that either never was, or very often fails, as is too much verified by experience, and the histories of all nations; or else to refer the decision of all to those who through the infirmities of age, sex, or person, are often incapable of judging the least, or subject to such passions and vices as would divert them from justice, tho' they did understand it; both which seem to be almost equally preposterous.

2. The law must also presume, that the prince is always present in all the places where his name is used. The king of France is (as I have said already) esteemed to be present “* on the seat of justice” in all the parliaments and sovereign courts of the kingdom: and if his corporeal presence were by that phrase to be understood, he must be in all those distinct and far distant places at the same time: which absurdity can hardly be paralleled, unless by the popish opinion of “transubstantiation.” But indeed they are so far from being guilty of such monstrous absurdity, that he cannot in person be present at any tryal; and no man can be judged, if he be. This was plainly asserted to Lewis the XIIIth (who would have been at the tryal of the Duke of Candale) by the president de Bellievre, who told him, that as he could judge no man himself, so they could not judge any, if he were present: upon which he retired.

3. The laws of most kingdoms giving to kings the confiscation of delinquents estates, if they in their own persons might give judgment upon them, they would be constituted both judges and parties; which, besides the forementioned incapacities, to which princes are as much subject as other men, would tempt them by their own personal interest to subvert all manner of justice.

This therefore not being the meaning of the law, we are to inquire what it is; and the thing is so plain, that we cannot mistake, unless we do it wilfully. Some name must be used in all manner of transactions, and in matters of public concernment none can be so fit as that of the principal magistrate. Thus are leagues made, not only with kings and emperors, but with the dukes of Venice and Genoa, the avoyer and senate of a canton in Switzerland, the burgermaster of an imperial town in Germany, and the states-general of the United Provinces. But no man thinking, I presume, these leagues would be of any value, if they could only oblige the persons whose names are used, it is plain, that they do not stipulate only for themselves; and

* Sur son lit de justice.

that

CHAP. III. that their stipulations would be of no value, if they were merely personal.

And nothing can more certainly prove, they are not so, than that we certainly know, these dukes, avoyers, and burgermasters, can do nothing of themselves. The power of the states-general of the United Provinces is limited to the points mentioned in the act of union made at Utrecht. The empire is not obliged by any stipulation made by the emperor without their consent. Nothing is more common than for one king, making a league with another, to exact a confirmation of their agreement, by the parliaments, diets, or general estates; because, says Grotius, "a prince does not stipulate for himself, but for the people under his government; and a king deprived of his kingdom loses the right of sending an ambassador." The powers of Europe shewed themselves to be of this opinion in the case of Portugal. When Philip the Second had gained the possession, they treated with him concerning the affairs relating to that kingdom: few regarded Don Antonio; and no man considered the dukes of Savoy, Parma, or Braganza, who perhaps had the most plausible titles: but, when his grandson Philip the Fourth had lost that kingdom, and the people had set up the duke of Braganza, they all treated with him as king. And the English court, tho' then in amity with Spain, and not a little influenced by a Spanish faction, gave example to others by treating with him, and not with Spain, touching matters relating to that state. Nay, I have been informed by those who well understood the affairs of that time, that the lord Cottington advising the late king not to receive any persons sent from the duke of Braganza, rebel to his ally the king of Spain, in the quality of ambassadors; the king answered, that he must look upon that person to be king of Portugal, who was acknowledged by the nation. And I am mistaken, if his majesty now reigning did not find all the princes and states of the world to be of the same mind, when he was out of his kingdom, and could oblige no man but himself, and a few followers, by any treaty he could make.

For the same reason the names of kings are used in treaties, when they are either children, or otherwise incapable of knowing what alliances are fit to be made or rejected; and yet such treaties do equally oblige them, their successors and people, as if they were of mature age, and fit for government. No man therefore ought to think it strange, if the king's name be used in domestic affairs, of which he neither ought nor can take any cognizance. In these cases he is perpetually a minor: he must suffer the law to take its due course; and the judges, tho' nominated by him, are obliged by oath not to have any regard to his letters, or personal commands. If a man be sued, he must appear; and a delinquent is to be tried "coram rege," but no otherwise than "secundum legem terræ, according to the law of the land," not his personal will or opinion. And the judgments given must be executed, whether they please him or not, it being always understood, that he can speak no otherwise than the law speaks, and is always present as far as the law requires. For this reason a noble lord, who was irregularly detained in prison in 1681, being by habeas corpus brought to the bar of the king's bench, where he sued

sued to be released upon bail; and an ignorant judge telling him he must apply himself to the king, he replied, that he came thither for that end; that the king might eat, drink, or sleep, where he pleased; but when he rendered justice, he was always in that place. The king that renders justice is indeed always there: he never sleeps; he is subject to no infirmity; he never dies, unless the nation be extinguished, or so dissipated as to have no government. No nation that has a sovereign power within itself, does ever want this king. He was in Athens and Rome, as well as at Babylon and Susa; and is as properly said to be now in Venice, Switzerland, or Holland, as in France, Morocco, or Turkey. This is he to whom we all owe a simple and unconditional obedience. This is he "who never does any wrong:"
 it is before him we appear, when we demand justice, or render an account of our actions. All juries give their verdict in his sight: they are his commands that the judges are bound and sworn to obey, when they are not at all to consider such as they receive from the person that wears the crown. It was for treason against him, that Trefilian, and others like to him in several ages, were hanged. They gratified the lusts of the visible powers; but the invisible king would not be mocked. He caused justice to be executed upon Empson and Dudley. He was injured, when the perjured wretches, who gave that accursed judgment in the case of ship-money, were suffered to escape the like punishment by means of the ensuing troubles, which they had chiefly raised. And I leave it to those who are concerned, to consider how many in our days may expect vengeance for the like crimes.

I should here conclude this point, if the power of granting a "noli prose-qui, cesset processus," and pardons, which are said to be annexed to the person of the king, were not taken for a proof, that all proceedings at law depend upon his will. But whoever would from hence draw a general conclusion, must first prove his proposition to be universally true. If it be wholly false, no true deduction can be made; and if it be true only in some cases, it is absurd to draw from thence a general conclusion; and to erect a vast fabric upon a narrow foundation is impossible. As to the general proposition, I utterly deny it. The king cannot stop any suit that I begin in my own name, or invalidate any judgment I obtain upon it: he cannot release a debt of ten shillings due to me, nor a sentence for the like sum given upon an action of battery, assault, trespass, public nuisance, or the like. He cannot pardon a man condemned upon an appeal, nor hinder the person injured from appealing. His power therefore is not universal: if it be not universal, it cannot be inherent, but conferred upon him, or entrusted by a superior power, that limits it.

These limits are fixed by the law: the law therefore is above him. His proceedings must be regulated by the law, and not the law by his will. Besides, the extent of those limits can only be known by the intention of the law that sets them; and are so visible, that none but such as are wilfully blind can mistake. It cannot be imagined, that the law, which does not give a power to the king of pardoning a man that breaks my hedge, can in-

CHAP. III. tend he should have power to pardon one who kills my father, breaks my house, robs me of my goods, abuses my children and servants, wounds me, and brings me in danger of my life. Whatever power he has in such cases, is founded upon a presumption, that he who has sworn not to deny or delay justice to any man, will not break his oath to interrupt it. And farther, as he does nothing but what he may rightly do, "cum magnatum & sapientium consilio;" and that it is supposed, they will never advise him to do any thing, but what ought to be done, in order to attain the great ends of the law, justice, and the public safety; nevertheless, lest this should not be sufficient to keep things in their due order, or that the king should forget his oath, not to delay or deny justice to any man, his counsellors are exposed to the severest punishments, if they advise him to do any thing contrary to it, and the law upon which it is grounded. So that the utmost advantage the king can pretend to in this case, is no more than that of the Norman, who said he had gained his cause, because it depended upon a point that was to be decided by his oath; that is to say, if he will betray the trust reposed in him, and perjure himself, he may sometimes exempt a villain from the punishment he deserves, and take the guilt upon himself. I say sometimes; for appeals may be brought in some cases, and the waterman who had been pardoned by his majesty in the year 1680. for a murder he had committed, was condemned, and hanged, at the assizes upon an appeal. Nay, in cases of treason, which some men think relate most particularly to the person of the king, he cannot always do it. Gaveston, the two Spencers, Tresilian, Empson, Dudley, and others, have been executed as traitors for things done by the king's command; and it is not doubted they would have been saved, if the king's power had extended so far. I might add the cases of the earls of Strafford and Danby; for, tho' the king signed a warrant for the execution of the first, no man doubts he would have saved him, if it had been in his power. The other continues in prison, notwithstanding his pardon; and, for any thing I know, he may continue where he is, or come out in a way that will not be more to his satisfaction, unless he be found innocent, or something fall out more to his advantage than his majesty's approbation of what he has done. If therefore the king cannot interpose his authority to hinder the course of the law in contests between private men, nor remit the debts adjudged to be due, or the damages given to the persons aggrieved, he can in his own person have no other power in things of this nature, than in some degree to mitigate the vindictive power of the law; and this also is to be exercised no other way than as he is entrusted. But if he acts, even in this capacity, by a delegated power, and in few cases, he must act according to the ends for which he is so entrusted, as the same law says, "cum magnatum & sapientium consilio;" and is not therein to pursue his own will and interests: if his oath farther oblige him not to do it; and his ministers are liable to punishment, if they advise him otherwise: if in matters of appeal he have no power; and if his pardons have been of no value, when, contrary to his oath, he has abused that with which he is entrusted, to the patronizing of crimes, and exempting such delinquents from punishment, as could not be pardoned without prejudice to the public; I may justly conclude, that the king, before whom every man is bound to appear, who does perpetually and impartially distribute justice to the nation, is not the man or woman that wears the crown; and that he or she cannot determine those matters, which, by the law, are referred to the king. Whether therefore such matters are ordinary or extraordinary, the decision is and ought to be placed where there is most wisdom and stability, and where passion and private interest does least prevail to the obstruction of justice. This is the only way to obviate that confusion and mischief, which our author thinks it would introduce. In cases of the first sort, this is done in England by judges and juries: in the other by the parliament, which, being the representative body of the people, and the collected wisdom of the nation, is least subject to error, most exempted from passion, and most free from corruption; their own good, both public and private, depending upon the rectitude of their sanctions. They cannot do any thing that is ill without damage to themselves, and their posterity; which being all that can be done by human understanding, our lives, liberties, and properties, are by our laws directed to depend upon them.

S E C T. XLIII.

Proclamations are not laws.

OUR author, according to his usual method and integrity, lays great weight upon proclamations, as the significations of the king's pleasure, which in his opinion is our only law. But neither law nor reason openly directing, nor by consequences insinuating, that such a power should be put into an uncertain or suspected hand, we may safely deny them to be laws, or in any sense to have the effect of laws. Nay, they cannot be so much as significations of his will; for, as he is king, he can have no will but as the law directs. If he depart from the law, he is no longer king, and his will is nothing to us. Proclamations, at most, are but temporary, by the advice of council, in pursuance of the law. If they be not so, the subject is no way obliged to obey them, and the counsellors are to be punished for them. These laws are either immemorial customs, or statutes. The first have their beginning and continuance from the universal consent of the nation. The latter receive their authority and force of laws from parliaments, as is frequently expressed in the preambles. These are, under God, the best defence of our lives, liberties, and estates: they proceed not from the blind, corrupt, and fluctuating humour of a man, but from the mature deliberation of the choicest persons of the nation, and such as have the greatest interest in it. Our ancestors have always relied upon these laws; and it is to be hoped we shall not be so abandoned by God, so deprived of courage and common sense, to suffer ourselves to be cheated of the inheritance which they have so frequently, so bravely, and so constantly defended. Tho' experience

CHAP. III. has too well taught us, that parliaments may have their failings, and that the vices, which are industriously spread amongst them, may be too prevalent; yet they are the best helps we have, and we may much more reasonably depend upon them, than upon those who propagate that corruption among them, for which only they can deserve to be suspected. We hope they will take care of our concerns, since they are as other men so soon as a session is ended, and can do nothing to our prejudice that will not equally affect them, and their posterity; besides the guilt of betraying their country, which can never be washed off. If some should prove false to their trust, it is probable that others would continue in their integrity: or if the base arts, which are usually practised by those who endeavour to delude, corrupt, enslave, and ruin nations, should happen to prevail upon the youngest and weakest, it may be reasonably hoped, that the wisest will see the snares, and instruct their companions to avoid them. But if all things were so put into the hands of one man, that his proclamations were to be esteemed laws, the nation would be exposed to ruin, as soon as it should chance to fall into an ill hand. It is in vain to say we have a good king, who will not make an ill use of his power; for even the best are subject to be deceived by flatterers, and crowned heads are almost ever encompassed by them. The principal art of a courtier is to observe his master's passions, and to attack him on that side where he seems to be most weak. It would be a strange thing to find a man impregnable in every part; and, if he be not, it is impossible he should resist all the attempts that are made upon him. If his judgment come to be prepossessed, he and all that depend on him are lost. Contradictions tho' never so just, are then unsafe; and no man will venture upon them, but he who dares sacrifice himself for the public good. The nature of man is frail, and stands in need of assistance. Virtuous actions, that are profitable to a commonwealth, ought to be made, as far as it is possible, safe, easy, and advantageous; and it is the utmost imprudence, to tempt men to be enemies to the public, by making the most pernicious actions to be the means of obtaining honour and favour, whilst no man can serve his country, but with the ruin of himself, and his family.

However, in this case, the question is not concerning a person: the same counsels are to be followed, when Moses or Samuel is in the throne, as if Caligula had invaded it. Laws ought to aim at perpetuity; but the virtues of a man die with him, and very often before him. Those who have deserved the highest praises for wisdom and integrity, have frequently left the honours they enjoyed to foolish and vicious children. If virtue may in any respect be said to outlive the person, it can only be when good men frame such laws and constitutions as by favouring it preserve themselves. This has never been done otherwise, than by balancing the powers in such a manner, that the corruption which one or a few men might fall into, should not be suffered to spread the contagion to the ruin of the whole. The long continuance of Lycurgus's laws is to be attributed to this: they restrained the lusts of kings, and reduced those to order who adventured to transgress them; whereas the whole fabric must have fallen to the ground in a short time, if the first that had a fancy to be absolute, had been able to effect his design. This has SECT. 43.
that

 been the fate of all governments that were made to depend upon the virtue of a man, which never continues long in any family; and, when that fails, all is lost. The nations therefore that are so happy to have good kings, ought to make a right use of them, by establishing the good that may outlast their lives. Those of them that are good, will readily join in this work, and take care, that their successors may be obliged, in doing the like, to be equally beneficial to their own families, and the people they govern. If the rulers of nations be restrained, not only the people is by that means secured from the mischiefs of their vices and follies, but they themselves are preserved from the greatest temptations to ill, and the terrible effects of the vengeance that frequently ensues upon it. An unlimited prince might be justly compared to a weak ship exposed to a violent storm, with a vast sail, and no rudder. We have an eminent example of this in the book of Esther. A wicked villain Chap. 3. having filled the ears of a foolish king with false stories of the Jews, he issues out a proclamation for their utter extirpation; and not long after, being informed of the truth, he gave them leave by another proclamation to kill whom they pleased, which they executed upon seventy thousand men. The books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel, manifestly discover the like fluctuation in all the councils of Nabuchodonosor, Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes.
 When good men had credit with them, they favoured the Israelites; sent them back to their own country; restored the sacred vessels, that had been taken away; gave them all things necessary for the rebuilding of the city; and advanced the chief of them to the highest employments. But if they fell into ill hands, three just men must be thrown into the burning furnace for refusing to worship an idol; Daniel must be cast to the lions; the holy city esteemed rebellious, and those who endeavour to rebuild it, enemies to kings. Such was the state of things, when their proclamations passed for laws; and numbers of flattering slaves were ready to execute their commands, without examining whether they were just or unjust, good or bad. The life and death of the best men, together with the very being of nations, was exposed to chance; and they were either preserved or destroyed according to the humour of that man who spoke last to the king, or happened to have credit with him. If a frantic fancy come into the head of a drunken whore, Perse-polis must be burnt, and the hand of Alexander is ready to execute her will.
 If a dancing wench please Herod, the most venerable of all human heads must be offered in a dish for a sacrifice to the rage of her impure mother.
 The nature of man is so frail, that wheresoever the word of a single person has had the force of a law, the innumerable extravagances and mischiefs it has produced, have been so notorious, that all nations who are not stupid, slavish, and brutish, have always abominated it, and made it their principal care to find out remedies against it, by so dividing and balancing the powers of their government, that one or a few men might not be able to oppress and destroy those they ought to preserve and protect. This has always been as grateful to the best and wisest princes, as necessary to the weakest
 and

CHAP. III. and worst, as I have proved already by the examples of Theopompus, Moses, and many others. These considerations have given beginning, growth, and continuance, to all the mixed governments that have been in the world; and I may justly say, there never was a good one that was not mixed. If other proofs of their rectitude were wanting, our author's hatred would be enough to justify them. He is so bitter an enemy to mankind, as to be displeased with nothing but that which tends to their good, and so perverse in his judgment, that we have reason to believe that to be good, which he most abhors. One would think he had taken the model of the government he proposes, from the monstrous tyranny of Ceylon an island in the East-Indies, where the king knows no other law than his own will. He kills, tears in pieces, impales, or throws to his elephants, whomsoever he pleases: no man has any thing that he can call his own: he seldom fails to destroy those who have been employed in his domestic service, or public offices; and few obtain the favour of being put to death, and thrown to the dogs, without torments. His subjects approach him no otherwise, than on their knees, licking the dust, and dare assume to themselves no other name than that of dogs, or limbs of dogs. This is a true pattern of Filmer's Patriarchal monarch. His majesty, as I suppose, is sufficiently exalted; for he does whatever he pleases. The exercise of his power is as gentle as can reasonably be expected from one who has all by the unquestionable right of usurpation; and knows the people will no longer suffer him, and the villains he hires to be the instruments of his cruelty, than they can be kept in such ignorance, weakness, and baseness, as neither to know how to provide for themselves, or dare to resist him. We ought to esteem ourselves happy, if the like could be established among us; and are much obliged to our author for so kindly proposing an expedient that might terminate all our disputes. Let proclamations obtain the power of laws, and the business is done. They may be so ingeniously contrived, that the antient laws, which we and our fathers have highly valued, shall be abolished, or made a snare to all those that dare remember they are Englishmen, and are guilty of the unpardonable crime of loving their country, or have the courage, conduct, and reputation required to defend it. This is the sum of Filmer's philosophy, and this is the legacy he has left to testify his affection to the nation; which having for a long time lain unregarded, has been lately brought into the light again, as an introduction of a popish successor, who is to be established, as we ought to believe, for the security of the protestant religion, and our English liberties. Both will undoubtedly flourish under a prince, who is made to believe the kingdom is his patrimony; that his will is a law; and that he has a power, which none may resist. If any man doubt whether he will make a good use of it, he may only examine the histories of what others in the same circumstances have done in all places where they have had power. The principles of that religion are so full of meekness and charity; the popes have always shewed themselves so gentle towards those who would not submit to their authority; the the Jesuits, who may be accounted the soul that gives life to the whole SECT. 43.

body of the faction, are so well natured, faithful, and exact in their morals; } so full of innocence, justice, and truth; that no violence is to be feared from such as are governed by them. The fatherly care shewed to the protestants of France, by the five last kings of the house of Valois; the mercy of Philip the Second of Spain to his pagan subjects in the West-Indies, and the more hated protestants in the Netherlands; the moderation of the dukes of Savoy towards the Vaudois in the marquisate of Saluzzo and the vallies of Piedmont; the gentleness and faith of the two Maries queens of England and Scotland; the kindness of the papists to the protestants of Ireland in the year 1641. with what we have reason to believe they did and do still intend, if they can accomplish the ends of their conspiracy; in a word, the sweetness and apostolical meekness of the inquisition; may sufficiently convince us that nothing is to be feared where that principle reigns. We may suffer the word of such a prince to be a law, and the people to be made to believe it ought to be so, when he is expected. Tho' we should wave the bill of exclusion, and not only admit him to reign as other kings have done, but resign the whole power into his hands, it would neither bring inconvenience or danger on the present king. He can with patience expect, that nature should take her course, and would neither anticipate nor secure his entrance into the possession of the power, by taking one day from the life of his brother. Tho' the papists know, that, like a true son of their church, he would prefer the advancement of their religion before all other considerations; and that one stab with a dagger, or a dose of poison, would put all under his feet; not one man would be found among them to give it. The assassins were Mahometans, not pupils of the honest Jesuits, nor ever employed by them. These things being certain, all our concerns would be secure, if, instead of the foolish statutes, and antiquated customs, on which our ancestors and we have hitherto doted, we may be troubled with no law but the kings will, and a proclamation may be taken for a sufficient declaration of it. We shall by this means be delivered from that "liberty with a mischief," in which our mistaken nation seems so much to delight. This phrase is so new, and so peculiar to our author, that it deserves to be written upon his tomb. We have heard of "tyranny with a mischief, slavery and bondage with a mischief;"
and they have been denounced by God against wicked and perverse nations, as mischiefs comprehending all that is most to be abhorred and dreaded in the world. But Filmer informs us, that liberty, which all wise and good men have in all ages esteemed to be the most valuable and glorious privilege of mankind, is "a mischief." If he deserve credit, Moses, Joshua, Gideon, Samson, and Samuel, with others like them, were enemies to their country, in depriving the people of the advantages they enjoyed under the paternal care of Pharaoh, Adonibezek, Eglon, Jabin, and other kings of the neighbouring nations, and restoring them to that "liberty with a mischief," which he had promised to them. The Israelites were happy under the power of tyrants, whose proclamations were laws; and they ought to have been thankful

to

CHAP. III. to God for that condition, and not for the deliverances he wrought by the hands of his servants. Subjection to the will of a man is happiness, liberty is a "mischief." But this is so abominably wicked and detestable, that it can deserve no answer.

S E C T. XLIV.

No people, that is not free, can substitute delegates.

HOW full soever the power of any person or people may be, he or they are obliged to give only so much to their delegates, as seems convenient to themselves, or conducing to the ends they desire to attain; but the delegate can have none, except what is conferred upon him by his principal. If therefore the knights, citizens, and burgeses, sent by the people of England to serve in parliament, have a power, it must be more perfectly and fully in those that send them. But (as was proved in the last section) proclamations, and other significations of the king's pleasure, are not laws to us. They are to be regulated by the law, not the law by them. They are to be considered only so far as they are conformable to the law, from which they receive all the strength that is in them, and can confer none upon it. We know no laws but our own statutes, and those immemorial customs established by the consent of the nation; which may be, and often are, changed by us. The legislative power therefore, that is exercised by the parliament, cannot be conferred by the writ of summons, but must be essentially and radically in the people, from whom their delegates and representatives have all that they have. But, says our author, "They must only chuse, and trust those whom they chuse, to do what they list; and that is as much liberty as many of us deserve for our irregular elections of burgeses." This is ingeniously concluded: I take what servant I please, and when I have taken him, I must suffer him to do what he pleases. But from whence should this necessity arise? Why may not I take one to be my groom, another to be my cook, and keep them both to the offices for which I took them? What law does herein restrain my right? And if I am free in my private capacity to regulate my particular affairs according to my own discretion, and to allot to each servant his proper work, why have not I, with my associates, the freemen of England, the like liberty of directing and limiting the powers of the servants we employ in our public affairs? Our author gives us reasons proportionable to his judgment: "This were liberty with a mischief; and that of chusing only is as much as many of us deserve." I have already proved, that, as far as our histories reach, we have had no princes or magistrates, but such as we have made, and they have had no other power than what we have conferred upon them. They cannot be the judges of our merit, who have no power but what we gave them, thro' an opinion they did or might deserve it. They may distribute in parcels to particulars that with which they are entrusted trusted in the gross. But it is impossible, that the public should depend absolutely upon those who are nothing above other men, except what they are made to be, for and by the public. The restrictions therefore of the people's liberty must be from themselves, or there can be none. SECT. 44.

Nevertheless I believe, that the powers of every county, city, and borough of England, are regulated by the general law to which they have all consented, and by which they are all made members of one political body. This obliges them to proceed with their delegates in a manner different from that which is used in the United Netherlands, or in Switzerland. Amongst these, every province, city, or canton, making a distinct body independent from any other, and exercising the sovereign power within itself, looks upon the rest as allies, to whom they are bound only by such acts as they themselves have made; and when any new thing, not comprehended in them happens to arise, they oblige their delegates to give them an account of it, and retain the power of determining those matters in themselves. It is not so amongst us: every county does not make a distinct body, having in itself a sovereign power, but is a member of that great body which comprehends the whole nation. It is not therefore for Kent or Suffex, Lewis or Maidstone, but for the whole nation, that the members chosen in those places are sent to serve in parliament: and though it be fit for them as friends and neighbours (so far as may be) to hearken to the opinions of the electors for the information of their judgements, and to the end that what they shall say, may be of more weight, when every one is known not to speak his own thoughts only, but those of a great number of men; yet they are not strictly and properly obliged to give account of their actions to any, unless the whole body of the nation for which they serve, and who are equally concerned in their resolutions, could be assembled. This being impracticable, the only punishment to which they are subject, if they betray their trust, is scorn, infamy, hatred, and an assurance of being rejected, when they shall again seek the same honour. Although this may seem a small matter to those who fear to do ill only from a sense of the pains inflicted; yet it is very terrible to men of ingenious spirits, as they are supposed to be, who are accounted fit to be intrusted with so great powers. But why should this be "liberty with a mischief," if it were otherwise? Or how the liberty of particular societies would be greater, if they might do what they pleased, than whilst they send others to act for them, such wise men only as Filmer can tell us. For as no man, or number of men, can give a power which he or they have not, the Achaians, Etolians, Latins, Samnites, and Tuscans, who transacted all things relating to their associations by delegates; and the Athenians, Carthaginians, and Romans, who kept the power of the state in themselves; were all equally free. And in our days, the United Provinces of the Netherlands, the Switzers, and Grisons, who are of the first sort, and the Venetians, Genoeses, and Luccheses, who are of the other, are so also. All men that have any degree of common sense, plainly see, that the liberty of those who act in their own persons,

M m m

CHAP. III. sons, and for those who send delegates, is perfectly the same, and the exercise is, and can only be, changed by their consent.

But whatever the law or custom of England be in this point, it cannot concern our question. The general proposition concerning a patriarchal power cannot be proved by a single example. If there be a general power every-where, forbidding nations to give instructions to their delegates, they can do it no-where. If there be no such thing, every people may do it, unless they have deprived themselves of their right, all being born under the same condition. It is to no purpose to say, that the nations before-mentioned had not kings, and therefore might act as they did. For, if the general thesis be true, they must have kings; and if it be not, none are obliged to have them, unless they think fit, and the kings they make are their creatures. But many of these nations had either kings, or other magistrates in power like to them. The provinces of the Netherlands, had dukes, earls, or marquises: Genoa and Venice have dukes. If any, on account of the narrowness of their territories, have abstained from the name, it does not alter the case; for our dispute is not concerning the name, but the right. If that one man, who is in the principal magistracy of every nation, must be reputed the father of that people, and has a power which may not be limited by laws, he may be so also in the greatest. The least of men, is a man as well as a giant: and those in the West-Indies who have not above twenty or thirty subjects able to bear arms, are kings, as well as Xerxes. Every nation may divide itself into small parcels, as some have done, by the same law they have restrained or abolished their kings, joined to one another, or taken their hazard of subsisting by themselves; acted by delegation, or retaining the power in their own persons; given finite or indefinite powers; reserved to themselves a power of punishing those who should depart from their duty, or referred it to their general assemblies. And that liberty, for which we contend as the gift of God and nature, remains equally to them all.

Vida de Carlos 5 de Sandoval.

If men who delight in cavilling should say, that great kingdoms are not to be regulated by the examples of small states, I desire to know, when it was, that God ordained great nations should be slaves, and deprived of all right to dispose matters relative to their government; whilst he left to such as had, or should divide themselves into small parcels, a right of making such constitutions as were most convenient for them. When this is resolved, we ought to be informed, what extent of territory is required to deserve the name of a great kingdom. Spain and France are esteemed great, and yet the deputies or procuradores of the several parts of Castile did in the cortez had at Madrid, in the beginning of Charles the Fifth's reign, excuse themselves from giving the supplies he desired, because they had received no orders in that particular from the towns that sent them; and afterwards receiving express order not to do it, they gave his majesty a flat denial. The like was frequently done during the reigns of that great prince, and of his son Philip the Second. And generally those SECT. 44.

 procuradores never granted any thing of importance to either of them, without particular orders from their principals. The same way was taken in France, as long as there were any general assemblies of estates; and, if it do not still continue, it is because there are none. For, no man who understood the affairs of that kingdom, did ever deny, that the deputies were obliged to follow the orders of those who sent them. And perhaps, if men would examine by what means they came to be abolished, they might find, that the cardinals de Richelieu and Mazarin, with other ministers who have accomplished that work, were acted by some other principle than that of justice, or the establishment of the laws of God and nature. In the general assembly of estates held at Blois in the time of Henry the Third, Bodin then deputy for the third estate of Vermandois, by their particular order, Hist. Thuan.
 proposed so many things as took up a great part of their time. Other deputies alledged no other reason for many things said and done by them, highly contrary to the king's will, than that they were commanded to do so by their superiors. These general assemblies being laid aside, the same custom is still used in the lesser assemblies of estates in Languedoc and Britany. The deputies cannot, without the infamy of betraying their trust, and fear of punishment, recede from the orders given by their principals; and yet we do not find, that "liberty with a mischief" is much more predominant in France than amongst us. The same method is every day practised in the diets of Germany. The princes and great lords, who have their places in their own right, may do what they please: but the deputies of the cities must follow such orders as they receive. The histories of Denmark, Sweden, Poland, and Bohemia, testify the same thing: and if this "liberty with a mischief" do not still continue intire in all those places, it has been diminished by such means as suit better with the manners of pirates, than the laws of God and nature. If England therefore do not still enjoy the same, we must have been deprived of it either by such unjustifiable means, or by our own consent. But thanks be to God, we know no people who have a better right to liberty, or have better defended it, than our own nation. And if we do not degenerate from the virtue of our ancestors, we may hope to transmit it intire to our posterity. We always may, and often do, give instructions to our delegates; but the less we fetter them, the more we manifest our own rights: for those who have only a limited power, must limit that which they give; but he that can give an unlimited power must necessarily have it in himself. The great treasurer Burleigh said, the parliament could do any thing but turn a man into a woman. Sir Thomas More, when Rich solicitor to K. Henry the VIIIth asked him, if the parliament might not make R. Rich king, said, that was "casus levis," taking it for granted that they might make or unmake whom they pleased. The first part of this, which includes the other, is asserted by the statute of the 13th of Q. Elizabeth, denouncing the most grievous punishments against all such as should dare to contradict it. But if it be in the parliament, it must be in those who give to parliament-men the powers by which they act; for be-

CHAP. III. fore they are chosen, they have none, and can never have any, if those that send them had it not in themselves. They cannot receive it from the magistrate; for that power which he has, is derived from the same spring. The power of making and unmaking him cannot be from himself; for he that is not, can do nothing; and when he is made, can have no other power than is conferred upon him by those that make him. He who departs from his duty, desires to avoid the punishment; the power therefore of punishing him is not from himself. It cannot be from the house of peers, as it is constituted; for they act for themselves, and are chosen by kings: and it is absurd to think, that kings, who generally abhor all restriction of their power, should give that to others by which they might be unmade. If one, or more princes, relying upon their own virtue and resolutions to do good, had given such a power against themselves, as Trajan did, when he commanded the prefect to use the sword for him, if he governed well; and against him, if he governed ill; it would soon have been rescinded by their successors. If our Edward the First had made such a law, his lewd son would have abolished it, before he would have suffered himself to be imprisoned and deposed by it. He would never have acknowledged his unworthiness to reign, if he had been tied to no other law than his own will; for he could not transgress that; nor have owned the mercy of the parliament, in sparing his life, if they had acted only by a power, which he had conferred upon them. This power must therefore be in those, who act by a delegated power; and none can give it to their delegates, but they who have it in themselves. The most certain testimony that can be given, of their unlimited power, is, that they rely upon the wisdom and fidelity of their deputies, so as to lay no restrictions upon them: they may do what they please, if they take care, "ne quid detrimenti respublica accipiat, that the commonwealth receive no detriment." This is a commission, fit to be granted by wise and good men, to those they chuse through an opinion, that they are so also, and that they cannot bring any prejudice upon the nation, that will not fall upon themselves, and their posterity. This is also fit to be received by those, who, seeking nothing, but that which is just in itself, and profitable to their country, cannot foresee what will be proposed when they are all together; much less, resolve how to vote, till they hear the reasons on both sides. The electors must necessarily be in the same ignorance; and the law which should oblige them to give particular orders to their knights and burgeses, in relation to every vote, would make the decision of the most important affairs to depend upon the judgment of those, who know nothing of the matters in question, and by that means cast the nation into the utmost danger of the most inextricable confusion. This can never be the intention of that law, which is "sanctio recta," and seeks only the good of those that live under it. The foresight therefore of such a mischief can never impair the liberties of the nation, but establish them.

S E C T.

S E C T. XLV.

The legislative power is always arbitrary, and not to be trusted in the hands of any who are not bound to obey the laws they make.

IF it be objected, that I am a defender of arbitrary powers, I confess I cannot comprehend how any society can be established or subsist without them; for the establishment of government is an arbitrary act, wholly depending upon the will of men. The particular forms and constitutions, the whole series of the magistracy, together with the measure of power given to every one, and the rules by which they are to exercise their charge, are so also. Magna Charta, which comprehends our antient laws, and all the subsequent statutes, were not sent from heaven, but made according to the will of men. If no men could have a power of making laws, none could ever have been made; for all that are or have been in the world, except those given by God to the Israelites, were made by them; that is, they have exercised an arbitrary power in making that to be law which was not, or annulling that which was. The various laws and governments, that are or have been in several ages and places, are the product of various opinions in those who had the power of making them. This must necessarily be, unless a general rule be set to all; for the judgments of men will vary, if they are left to their liberty; and the variety that is found among them, shews they are subject to no rule but that of their own reason, by which they see what is fit to be embraced or avoided, according to the several circumstances under which they live. The authority that judges of these circumstances is arbitrary, and the legislators shew themselves to be more or less wise and good, as they do rightly, or not rightly, exercise this power. The difference therefore between good and ill governments is not, that those of one sort have an arbitrary power which the others have not; for they all have it; but that those which are well constituted, place this power so as it may be beneficial to the people, and set such rules as are hardly to be transgressed; whilst those of the other sort fail in one or both these points. Some also through want of courage, fortune, or strength, may have been oppressed by the violence of strangers, or suffered a corrupt party to rise up within themselves, and by force or fraud to usurp a power of imposing what they pleased. Others, being sottish, cowardly, and base, have so far erred in the foundations, as to give up themselves to the will of one or few men, who, turning all to their own profit or pleasure, have been just in nothing but in using such a people like beasts. Some have placed weak defences against the lusts of those they have advanced to the highest places, and given them opportunities of arrogating more power to themselves than the law allows. Where any of these errors

CHAP. III. errors are committed, the government may be easy for a while, or at least tolerable, whilst it continues uncorrupted; but it cannot be lasting. When the law may be easily or safely overthrown, it will be attempted. Whatever virtue may be in the first magistrates, many years will not pass before they come to be corrupted; and their successors, deflecting from their integrity, will seize upon the ill-guarded prey. They will then not only govern by will, but by that irregular will, which turns the law, that was made for the public good, to the private advantage of one or few men. 'Tis not my intention to enumerate the several ways that have been taken to effect this; or to shew what governments have deflected from the right, and how far. But I think I may justly say, that an arbitrary power was never well placed in any men, and their successors, who were not obliged to obey the laws they should make. This was well understood by our Saxon ancestors: they made laws in their assemblies and councils of the nation; but all those who proposed or assented to those laws, as soon as the assembly was dissolved, were comprehended under the power of them, as well as other men. They could do nothing to the prejudice of the nation, that would not be as hurtful to those who were present, and their posterity, as to those who by many accidents might be absent. The Normans entered into, and continued in the same path. Our parliaments at this day are in the same condition. They may make prejudicial wars, ignominious treaties, and unjust laws: yet when the session is ended, they must bear the burden as much as others; and, when they die, the teeth of their children will be set on edge with the four grapes they have eaten. But 'tis hard to delude or corrupt so many: men do not in matters of the highest importance yield to slight temptations. No man serves the devil for nothing: small wages will not content those who expose themselves to perpetual infamy, and the hatred of a nation for betraying their country. Our kings had not wherewithal to corrupt many till these last twenty years, and the treachery of a few was not enough to pass a law. The union of many was not easily wrought, and there was nothing to tempt them to endeavour it; for they could make little advantage during the session, and were to be lost in the mass of the people, and prejudiced by their own laws, as soon as it was ended. They could not in a short time reconcile their various interests or passions, so as to combine together against the public; and the former kings never went about it. We are beholden to Hyde, Clifford and Danby, for all that has been done of that kind. They found a parliament full of lewd young men chosen by a furious people in spite to the puritans, whose severity had distastethed them. The weakest of all ministers had wit enough to understand, that such as these might be easily deluded, corrupted, or bribed. Some were fond of their seats in parliament, and delighted to domineer over their neighbours by continuing in them: others preferred the cajoleries of the court before the honour of performing their duty to the country that employed them. Some sought to relieve their ruined fortunes, and were most forward to give the king a vast revenue, that from thence they might receive receive pensions: others were glad of a temporary protection against their creditors. Many knew not what they did when they annulled the triennial act; voted the militia to be in the king; gave him the excise, customs, and chimney-money; made the act for corporations, by which the greatest part of the nation was brought under the power of the worst men in it; drunk or sober pass'd the five-mile act, and that for uniformity in the church. This embolden'd the court to think of making parliaments to be the instruments of our slavery, which had in all ages past been the firmest pillars of our liberty. There might have been perhaps a possibility of preventing this pernicious mischief in the constitution of our government. But our brave ancestors could never think their posterity would degenerate into such baseness to sell themselves, and their country: but how great soever the danger may be, 'tis less than to put all into the hands of one man, and his ministers: the hazard of being ruined by those who must perish with us, is not so much to be feared, as by one who may enrich and strengthen himself by our destruction. 'Tis better to depend upon those who are under a possibility of being again corrupted, than upon one who applies himself to corrupt them, because he cannot otherwise accomplish his designs. It were to be wished, that our security were more certain; but this being, under God, the best anchor we have, it deserves to be preserved with all care, till one of a more unquestionable strength be framed by the consent of the nation.

S E C T. XLVI.

The coercive power of the law proceeds from the authority of parliament.

HA VING proved that proclamations are not laws, and that the legislative power, which is arbitrary, is trusted only in the hands of those who are bound to obey the laws that are made, 'tis not hard to discover what it is that gives the power of law to the sanctions under which we live. Our author tells us, "that all statutes or laws are made properly by the king alone, at the rogarion of the people, as his majesty king James of happy memory affirms in his True law of free monarchy; and as Hooker teaches us, that laws do not take their constraining power from the quality of such as devise them, but from the power that giveth them the strength of law." But if the rogarion of the people be necessary, that cannot be a law which proceeds not from their rogarion: the power therefore is not alone in the king; for a most important part is confessed to be in the people. And as none could be in them, if our author's proposition, or the principles upon which it is grounded, were true, the acknowledgment of such a part to be in the people shews them to be false. For if the king had all in himself, none could parti-

CHAP. III. participate with him: if any do participate, he hath not all; and 'tis from that law by which they do participate, that we are to know what part is left to him. The preambles of most acts of parliaments manifest this by the words, "Be it enacted by the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled, and by authority of the same." But king James, says Filmer, "in his Law of free monarchy, affirms the contrary;" and it may be so; yet that is nothing to us. No man doubts, that he desired it might be so in England: But it does not from thence appear, that it is so. The law of a free monarchy is nothing to us; for that monarchy is not free, which is regulated by a law not to be broken without the guilt of perjury, as he himself confessed in relation to ours. As to the words cited from Hooker I can find no hurt in them. To draw up the form of a good law, is a matter of invention and judgment; but it receives the force of a law from the power that enacts it. We have no other reason for the payment of excise or customs, than that the parliament has granted those revenues to the king to defray the public charges. Whatever therefore king James was pleased to say in his books, or in those written for him, we do not so much as know that the killing of a king is treason, or to be punished with death, otherwise than as it is enacted by parliament; and it was not always so: for, in the time of Ethelstan, the estimates of lives were agreed in parliament, and that of a king valued at thirty thousand thrymsæ. And, if that law had not been altered by the parliament, it must have been in force at this day. It had been in vain for a king to say he would have it otherwise; for he is not created to make laws, but to govern according to such as are made, and sworn to assent to " * such as shall be proposed." He who thinks the crown not worth accepting on these conditions, may refuse it. The words "le roy le veult," are only a pattern of the French fashions, upon which some kings have laid great stress, and would no doubt have been glad to introduce, "car tel est nostre plaisir;" but that may prove a difficult matter. Nay, in France itself, where that style, and all the ranting expressions that please the vainest of men, are in mode, no edict has the power of a law, till it be registred in parliament. This is not a mere ceremony, as some pretend, but all that is essential to a law. Nothing has been more common, than for those parliaments to refuse edicts sent to them by the king. When John Chastel had, at the instigation of the Jesuits, stabbed Henry the Fourth in the mouth, and that order had designed or executed many other execrable crimes, they were banished out of the kingdom by an arrest of the parliament of Paris. Some other parliaments registred the same; but those of Thoulouse and Bordeaux absolutely refused; and, notwithstanding all that the king could do, the Jesuits continued at Tournon, and many other places within their precincts, till the arrest was revoked. These proceedings are so displeasing to the court, that the most violent ways have been often used to abolish them. About the year 1650, Seguier then chancellor of France was sent with a great number of soldiers to oblige the parliament of Paris to pass some edicts upon which they star-chamber, 1616.

Speech in

Leg. Æthel-
stani, fol. 71.

Mem. de L.
R. F.

* Quas vulgus elegerit.

had

had hesitated: but he was so far from accomplishing his design, that the people rose against him, and he thought himself happy, that he escaped with his life. If the parliaments do not in all parts of the kingdom continue in the liberty of approving or rejecting all edicts, the law is not altered, but oppressed by the violence of the sword: and the prince of Condé, who was principally employed to do that work, may, as I suppose, have had leisure to reflect upon those actions, and cannot but find reason to conclude, that his excellent valour and conduct was used in a most noble exploit, equally beneficial to his country and himself. However, those who are skilled in the laws of that nation, do still affirm, that all public acts, which are not duly examined and registred, are void in themselves, and can be of no force longer than the miserable people lies under the violence of oppression; which is all that could reasonably be said, if a pirate had the same power over them. But whether the French have willingly offered their ears to be bored, or have been subdued by force, it concerns us not. Our liberties depend not upon their will, virtue, or fortune: how wretched and shameful soever their slavery may be, the evil is only to themselves. We are to consider no human laws but our own; and if we have the spirit of our ancestors we shall maintain them, and die as free as they left us. "Le roy le veut," tho' written in great letters, or pronounced in the most tragical manner, can signify no more than that the king in performance of his oath does assent to such laws as the lords and commons have agreed. Without prejudice to themselves, and their liberties, a people may suffer the king to advise with his council upon what they propose. Two eyes see more than one, and human judgment is subject to errors. Tho' the parliament consist of the most eminent men of the nation, yet, when they intend good, they may be mistaken. They may safely put a check upon themselves, that they may farther consider the most important matters, and correct the errors that may have committed, if the king's council do discover them: but he can speak only by the advice of his council; and every man of them is with his head to answer for the advices he gives. If the parliament has not been satisfied with the reasons given against any law they offered, it has frequently passed; and if they have been satisfied, it was not the king, but they, that laid it aside. He that is of another opinion, may try whether "Le roy le veut" can give the force of a law to any thing conceived by the king, his council, or any other than the parliament. But if no wise man will affirm that he can do it, or deny that by his oath he is obliged to assent to those that come from them, he can neither have the legislative power in himself, nor any other part in it than what is necessarily to be performed by him, as the law prescribes.

I know not what our author means by saying, "Le roy le veut is the interpretative phrase pronounced at the passing of every act of parliament:" for, if there be difficulty in any of them, those words do no-way remove it. But the following part of the paragraph better deserves to be observed. "It was, says he, the antient custom for a long time, until the days of Henry the fifth, for the kings, when any bill was brought to them that had passed

CHAP. III. “ both houses, to take, and pick out what they liked not; and so much as “ they chose, was enacted as a law: but the custom of the latter kings hath “ been so gracious, as to allow always of the intire bill, as it passed both “ houses.” He judiciously observes, when our kings began to be gracious, and we to be free. That king (excepting the persecution for religion, in his time, which is rather to be imputed to the ignorance of that age, than to any evil in his own nature) governed well; and, as all princes, who have been virtuous and brave, have always desired to preserve their subjects liberty, which they knew to be the mother and nurse of their valour, fitting them for great and generous enterprizes; his care was to please them, and to raise their spirits.
 But, about the same time, those detestable arts, by which the mixed monar-chies in this part of the world have been every-where terribly shaken, and in many places totally overthrown, began to be practised. Charles the seventh of France, under pretence of carrying on a war against him and his son, took upon him to raise money, by his own authority; and we know how well that method has been pursued. The mischievous sagacity of his son Lewis the Eleventh, which is now called king-craft, was wholly exerted in the subversion of the laws of France, and the nobility that supported them. His successors, except only Lewis the Twelfth, followed his example; and in other nations, Ferdinand of Arragon, James the Third of Scotland, and Henry the Seventh of England, were thought to imitate him the most. Tho’ we have little reason to commend all the princes that preceded Henry the Fifth; yet I am inclined to date the general impairing of our government from the death of that king, and his valiant brothers. His weak son became a prey to a furious Frenchwoman, who brought the maxims of her own country into ours, and advanced the worst of villains to govern according to them. These measures were pursued by Edward the Fourth, whose wants, contracted by prodigality and debauchery, were to be supplied by fraud and rapine. The ambition, cruelty, and perfidiousness of Richard the Third; the covetousness, and malicious subtilty, of Henry the Seventh; the violent lust, rage, and pride of Henry the Eighth; and the bigotted fury of queen Mary, instigated by the craft and malice of Spain; persuaded me to believe, that the English liberty did not receive birth or growth from the favour and goodness of their gracious princes.
 But, it seems, all this is mistaken: Henry the Sixth was wise, valiant, and no-way guided by his wife; Edward the Fourth, continent, sober, and contented with what the nation gave him; Richard the Third, mild, gentle, and faithful; Henry the Seventh, sincere, and satisfied with his own; Henry the Eighth, humble, temperate, and just; and queen Mary, a friend to our country and religion. No less praises sure can be due to those who were so gracious to recede from their own right of picking what they pleased out of our laws, and to leave them intirely to us, as they passed both houses. We are beholden to our author for the discovery of these mysteries: but tho’ he seems to have taken an oath, like that of the gypsies when they enter into that virtuous society, never to speak one word of truth, he is not so subtle in concealing his lyes. All kings were trusted with the publication of the laws; but all kings did

did not falsify them. Such as were not wicked and vicious, or so weak as to SECT. 46.
be made subservient to the malice of their ministers and flatterers, could never be drawn into the guilt of so infamous a cheat, directly contrary to the oath of their coronation. They swear to pass such "laws * as the people chuse;"
but, if we will believe our author, they might have picked out whatever they pleased, and falsely imposed upon the nation, as a law made by the lords and commons, that which they had modelled according to their own will,
and made to be different from, or contrary to, the intention of the parliament. The king's part in this fraud (of which he boasts) was little more than might have been done by the speaker, or his clerks. They might have falsified an act as well as the king, though they could not so well preserve themselves from punishment. 'Tis no wonder, if, for a while, no stop was put to such an abominable custom. It was hard to think a king would be guilty of a fraud, that were infamous in a slave: but that proved to be a small security, when the worst of slaves came to govern them. Nevertheless, it is probable they proceeded cautiously: the first alterations were, perhaps, innocent, or it may be, for the best. But, when they had once found out the way, they stuck at nothing that seemed for their purpose. This was like the plague of leprosy, that could not be cured; the house infected was to be demolished; the poisonous plant must be torn up by the root; the trust that had been broken, was to be abolished; they who had perverted or frustrated the law, were no longer to be suffered to make the least alteration; and that brave prince readily joined with his people, to extinguish the mischievous abuse that had been introduced by some of his worthless predecessors. The worst and basest of them had continual disputes with their parliaments, and thought that whatever they could detract from the liberty of the nation, would serve to advance their prerogative. They delighted in frauds, and would have no other ministers, but such as would be the instruments of them. Since their word could not be made to pass for a law, they endeavoured to impose their own, or their servants inventions, as acts of parliaments, upon the deluded people, and to make the best of them subservient to their corrupt ends, and pernicious counsels. This, if it had continued, might have overthrown all our rights, and deprived us of all that men can call good in the world. But the providence of God furnished our ancestors with an opportunity of providing against so great, so universal a mischief. They had a wise and valiant prince, who scorned to encroach upon the liberties of his subjects, and abhorred the detestable arts, by which they had been impaired. He esteemed their courage, strength, and love, to be his greatest advantage, riches, and glory. He aimed at the conquest of France, which was only to be effected by the bravery of a free and well-satisfied people. Slaves will always be cowards, and enemies to their master: by bringing his subjects into that condition, he must infallibly have ruined his own

* Quas vulgus elegerit.

CHAP. III. designs, and made them unfit to fight, either for him or themselves. He desired, not only that his people should be free, during his time, but that his successors should not be able, by oblique and fraudulent ways, to enslave them. If it be a reproach to us, that women have reigned over us, it is much more to the princes that succeeded our Henry, that none of them did so much imitate him in his government, as queen Elizabeth. She did not go about to mangle acts of parliament, and to pick out what might serve her turn; but frequently passed forty or fifty in a session, without reading one of them. She knew that she did not reign for herself, but for her people; that what was good for them, was either good for her, or that her good ought not to come into competition with that of the whole nation; and that she was, by oath, obliged to pass such laws, as were presented to her on their behalf. This not only shews, that there is no such thing as a legislative power, placed in kings by the laws of God and nature, but that nations have it in themselves. It was not by law, nor by right, but by usurpation, fraud, and perjury, that some kings took upon them to pick what they pleased out of the public acts. Henry the Fifth did not grant us the right of making our own laws; but, with his approbation, we abolished a detestable abuse, that might have proved fatal to us. And, if we examine our history, we shall find, that every good and generous prince has sought to establish our liberties, as much as the most base and wicked to infringe them.

THE

T H E I N D E X.

A.

A ARON, vid. Moses.
 Abdication, Camillus the dictator obliged to abdicate his magistracy 249
 Abraham, and the patriarchs not kings 17
 Could never exercise a regal power 18
 Lived with Lot in perfect freedom 76 Abrogation, where a person abrogates the magistracy 176, 177
 God declared Saul's kingdom to be entirely ab-rogated 259
 A whole people, or part of them, may at their own pleasure abrogate a kingdom 259
 What is said to be so 315
 Non can abrogate the law of God 346, 347
 Absalom, his revolt 261
 Absolute power and Monarchy, out in its first beginning 19, 45
 Of France and Turkey 45, 72, 122, 155, 157, 349
 Burdensome and dangerous 70
 Who fit subjects for it 95, 146, 153, 154
 Scarce ever conquered a free people 105, 111, 157, 161
 Who advocates for it 105
 Nothing more mutable, or unstable 106, 109
 Cannot be restrained by law 109, 148, 149, 153
 Where it should be of more strength than the limited 110
 The sad effects of it 122, 184, 206, 207, 208, 349, 350, 449, 450
 Rome decayed, and perished under it 123
 The root and foundation of it 133, 147, 148
 Not established among the Greeks by law 138, 139
 Encourages venality and corruption 145, 147, 201
 Advances the worst of men 148, 151, 182
 In what sense most contrary to nature 151
 By whom only to be endured 153, 349
 The people under it always miserable 155, 168, 172, 200
 All things managed by one, or a very few men 156 Seems totally to be exempted from mistakes, and why 172
 Almost all troubles arising in them, proceed
 from malice 173

Sedition most frequently in, and natural to them
 181, 183, 192, 193, 194
 By what means this arbitrary power is set up 182, 200
 Few or none long subsist under it 189
 Where it cannot be introduced 201
 Integrity not to be found therein 205
 What care such monarchs have for their people 214
 Their chief labour is to be above the law 228 Absolute power, no society can be established, or subsist, without it somewhere 455 Never well placed in men, and their successors, if not obliged to obey the laws that should be made 256
 Abuses in government, when never to be reformed 220, 221 Account, to whom the people of Rome were to give theirs 36, 37
 Accusers, vid. False witnesses.
 Acquisition, what right can be pretended from it 403 Acts of parliament, till the days of Henry V. for the most part were penned by the king's officers,
vid. statutes 377, 458
 Adam, his sin, what 6
 His kingdom 18
 Had only an oeconomical, not a political power 74
 Adoption, wherein the folly of it 50, 51, 52, 53
 What may be called so improperly 52
 Jacob adopted Ephraim and Manasseh 72 Advancements, ought ever to be for the sake of the publick, not of the man 64
 Have oftentimes made people worse 309, 310
 Adversary, whom a vicious prince reckons such 213, 214 Adultery, became as common in Sparta, as in any part of the world, and why 251 Cannot be dispensed withal, even by the pope himself 397
 Affections of the people, the prince's most important treasure 242
 Agefilaus, his great achievements 110, 111
 His denial of Alexander to be greater than he 276
 Xenophon's great character of him, and for what 256 Agreements, the treachery of violating them, aggravated by perjury, vid. Contracts 178
 O o o Made

- Made by king John of France, when prisoner at London, and Francis under the same circumstances at Madrid, reputed null 234
 A good man performs them, though he is a loler by the bargain 327
 The necessity of standing to them from religion, and the law of nature 341
 Between princes confirmed afterwards by parliaments, &c. 442
 Agrippa (Menenius) appeased one of the most violent seditions at Rome, and how 172
 Ahab's growing sick on Naboth's refusing him his vineyard 276
 When his house was to be cut off 435
 Alexander of Macedon, thought to be meant by Aristotle, for the man framed by nature for a king 62. 64
 His extravagant frolics 108
 His fortune overthrew his virtue 108. 111
 His reign full of conspiracies 183
 After his death the kingdom fell all to pieces 135
 It is thought he died by poison 135
 Alexander of Epirus, in valour thought equal, in power little inferior to him 169
 Alfred, magna charta grounded upon his laws 12
 Acknowledged he found and left this kingdom perfectly free 408 Alienation, vide Dominion.
 Allegiance, is such an obedience as the law requires 414
 Cannot relate to a whole nation 415 Alliances 81. 121
 All things in their beginning are weak 165
 Change by length of time 171
 Altar, the horns of it no protection to wilful murderers 295
 Ambassadors, from whence kings have their right of sending them 394
 Charles Gustavus, his excellent saying to one 400
 From the Privernates, their brave and resolute answer to Plautius the consul, when they were suing for a peace 414, 415
 From the estates of Scotland, to queen Elizabeth 435
 Ambition, honest and wise men expose the folly of it 52, 70
 Can never give a right to any over the liberties of a whole nation 82
 Tends to public ruin 137
 Is the overthrow of states and empires 147, 148
 Man naturally prone to it 148
 What it prompts to 186
 Has produced more mischiefs than any other desires and passions 189
 St. Ambrose, seems to have no knowledge of the Gothick polity 286
 Ancestors, what we ought to do, if we will be just to them 420
 Never thought their posterity would so degenerate, as to sell themselves, and their country 457
 By exerting their vigour we shall maintain our laws 459
 Argli, or Saxons; Tacitus's description of their coming hither, and that they had the root of power and liberty in themselves 380, 381
 Antiochus, his vain boast to destroy Greece and Italy 111
 How soon he lost all he possessed in Greece, &c. 157
 Apostles, what their work was in relation to the civil state 181
 Appanages, in France to the king's brothers, produced very bad effects 135. 235
 Or to their sons; but they remain still subject to the crown 235. 336
 Appeals, the right of them to the people 118, 119. 144. 179. 249
 None from parliamentary decrees 176
 To whom they were made, when there was in Rome no superior magistrate in being 311
 No pardoning a man condemned upon one 444
 Arcana imperii, how to be meddled with 8, 9, 10.
 Arians, as cruel as the Pagans 109
 Aristocracy, what 23
 For whom best 61, 62
 How set up 67
 Was the Jewish government 96
 Who patrons for it 154
 The Lacedemonians for it 238
 Whether it seems established by nature 358
 Aristotle, slighted by Filmer 13
 Commendation of him 59. 102
 His notion of civil societies 60, 61. 65. 95. 230
 Who he thought was framed by nature for a king 62. 65
 Wherein he highly applauds monarchy 102, 103
 Thinks the first monarchs were but little restrained, because they were chosen for their virtue 231
 His distinction between a king and a tyrant 278. 358
 Who, he says, are governed by God, rather than by men 316
 Proves that no man is entrusted with an absolute power 358
 Armies, of the East and West, set up emperors for themselves 114, 115
 Out of what sort of men, they are to be formed 168
Vid. Mercenary and Soldiery
 Arminius, killed for aiming at a crown, which blemished all his other virtues 303. 381
 Arms, those just and pious that are necessary, and those necessary when there was no hope of safety by any other way 436
 Artaxerxes, and his army, overthrown by the valour of 10000 Grecians 110
 Artificer, what sort of one he is, to whom implicit faith is due 9
 Assemblies, that took their authority from the law of nature, considered 80
 General of the people 98, 99
 The use of them 381, 382
 Of the estates in France, brought now to nothing 136
 Settled the crown on Pepin 193
 What they ought to see performed 236
 Had the power always of the whole people in them 289
 In them none judge for themselves 312
 The greatest trust that can be, was ever reposed in them 378
 Incon-

- Inconsistent with the absolute sovereignty of kings 385
 Refused giving supplies to their kings in Spain and France, without orders from their principals 453
 Assyrians, vid. Eastern nations.
   That empire wholly abolished on the death of Belshazzar 107
   Their valour irresistible under Nebuchadnezzar 166
   Little more known of them than from Scripture 185
 Athaliah more ready to cry out treason than David 174. Destroyed the king's race, and by whom herself was killed 183. vide Queen
 Athens, its government not so much approved, as that of Sparta 139
   Banished some worthy men, and put others to death 140
   The cruelty of the thirty tyrants there 141
   As much inclined to war as Rome 160
   The thirty tyrants destroyed by Thrasylbulus 175
   Their ostracism proceeded solely from fear 228
   Was not without laws when she had kings 308
 Athletic habit, what 120
 Attila, called the scourge of God, and gloried in the name 321
 Avarice, the evil effects of it 52
 Augustus, Rome's longest peace under his reign 123
   What happened in it 125
   Was worse in the beginning than latter end of his reign 126
   Had thirty mercenary legions to execute his commands 360
   Whether he truly deserved to be called the head of the Romans 430
   The name of Augustus is a title belonging to the German emperor at this day 404
 Austria, Spain after many revolutions came to this house 170
   Princes of this house pretend to know their original 332
   The German empire came to Rodolphus of this name about 300 years ago 333
   What claim this house has to the crown of France 337
 Authors of great revolutions, their aims 146
 Axioms in law are evident to common sense, and nothing to be taken for one that is not so 370
- B.
- Babel, vide Nations
 Babylonian kings, what right is pretended to be in them 32, 33
   Monarchy ruled by force, the stronger turning out the weaker 106, 107
   How its pride fell 113, 114
   Little more known of its monarchy, than from Scripture 185
   Babylon and Susa trembled at the motion of the Grecian arms 206
   There were a people there before Nimrod was king 362
- Balance of power, where and how it is broken 419, 420
 Nations have suffered extremely through want of this prudence in rightly balancing, &c. 434
 In what manner power should be balanced, for the advantage and service of the state 446
 Banishment, not above five or six men suffered unjustly in the Roman government, in the space of about 300 years 120
 The temporary of the Athenians, never accounted as a punishment 139, 140
 Camillus recalled from it, and afterwards honoured 141
 Barbarorum regna 230
 Baron, the extent of the name 386, 390
 Baronagium, what 79, 387
 Bartholomew de las Casas (a Spanish bishop) his admirable saying concerning the office of a king 40
 Bassompierre, his saying about Rochel 219
 Bastards, those children can inherit nothing 88
   Declared with relation to crowns 90, 340
   Advanced before legitimate brethren 132, 335
   In some places wholly excluded 188
 Beggars of a king to Samuel, such as would not be denied 101
   Parliaments no beggars 325
 Belial, who his sons 103
 Bellarmine's tenets 7, 15, 16, 17, 23.
 Benjamites, how they proceeded in preparing for their defence 100, 101
 Best men, content with a due liberty under the protection of a just law 152, 343, 344
 Have ever been against absolute monarchy 154
 Despised, hated, and marked out for destruction 218, 344
 Have their affections and passions, and are subject to be misled by them 230, 356
 Were so esteemed, who destroyed tyranny 278
 Whom they had need to fear 293, 294
 Can never wholly divest themselves of passions and affections 366
 Birthright gives a right to sovereign dominion 86
   Some have been accused of suppositious births 340
 Bishops, the king's power in making them 211
   What words of servitude are said to be introduced by them among us 303
 Blake, the terror his fleet struck every-where 222
 Blood, by God's law, that man's is to be shed, who sheds another's 290
   The nearest in blood set aside, when it was thought more convenient to advance others 334, 335
 Boccacini, the princes of Europe angry with him, for his definition of a tyrant, vid. 1 cent. Advertisement 76, 230
 Bought and sold, how places come to be so 203, 205
   Senates and people cannot so easily be 204, 205
 Bourbon, Henry of that name, not admitted to the crown till he abjured his religion, and promised to rule by law 234

- Bracton, his Words, "Omnes sub eo, & ipse sub
"nullo," &c. how to be understood 289, 290
What he calls "Esse sub lege" 310, 315
What, he says, the king is obliged to do by his oath 373, 374
His saying about evil or unskilful judges 374
Brethren, all so by nature 26 Nature abhors a difference in specie between
them 72
Where a fraternal equality continued 76
Are equals 84
What advanced some above the rest 97
The governed so called, by their magistrates 429
Bribery, natural to courts 145, 146, 200, 201
Seeks the largest bidder 166
Cannot corrupt, where virtue is preferred 201, 202
The way to prevent it 204, 205
A noble person turned out of a considerable office, as a scandal to the court, for being an enemy to this vice 204
Parliaments not so easily to be prevailed upon 456
Britain, shamefully lost 124
Kings imposed upon the Britains by the Romans, and to what end 254, 374
Severe assertors of their liberties 363, 380
Though they chose commanders in their wars, yet they kept the government in themselves 380 Ever had their great councils to determine their most important affairs 381, 382 Brutus found it dangerous to be thought wise, and
why 179, 190
Established liberty, and the consulate, together 349
Buchanan, joined to Doleman 6
His character of king James III. 233 Concerning the violation of the laws of Scotland 314
Burgundy, continued in Hugh Capet's eldest son Robert, and his descendants for ten generations 337

C.

- Cæsar, of giving him his due 11, 283 Julius subverted all order, by invading the supreme magistracy by force 114, 134, 283, 284, 428
Worse than Tarquin 137
By what means he set up his tyranny 145, 275 Scarce any prince had so many good qualities, till they were extinguished by ambition 147
Designed to make himself a tyrant 150 Thought all things lawful, when the consulate was denied him 187
When the power of the Romans was expressed by this name 283
Had a diadem offered him by Mark Antony 302
How observant he was of his word, when taken by pirates 326
The state of the Roman empire after his usurpation 351

- Augustus's power not given, but usurped 360, 361
Julius, what account he gives of our affairs here
363, 380
When, if ever, fear entered into his heart 381
Cæsars, never called kings till the 6th age of christianity 404
Julius, in despair would have killed himself 427
Cain, had no dominion over his brethren after Adam's death 68, 69
From whence his fear (that every man would slay him) proceeded 253
Caligula, his wish that the people had but one neck
13, 58, 179, 210, 430
A monster of mankind 31, 32, 312
His making love to the moon 50
His expedition, when he said, he had subdued
the sea 124
Valerius Asiaticus appeased the guards, by saying, he wished he had been the man had killed him 181, 313
Murdered by his own guards 184 Affected the title of being called god, which Claudius Cæsar calls "turpem causam infaniam"
227, vid. 302
Whose minister he might be said to be 299
Said of him, that no man ever knew a better servant, nor a worse master 308
Wherein he placed his sovereign majesty 352
Calvin, his opinion of the government instituted by God 96, 99
Camden, his credit forfeited by a great number of untruths 386
Campus Martius, was the land that belonged to the kings of Rome (not above ten acres) afterwards consecrated to Mars 276 Cardinals, the respect paid them, who have the
the power of choosing popes 73
Carthage, how she grew to that excess of power, that only Rome was able to overthrow 128
One of the most potent cities in the world 162 Castile, the lords thereof, had no other title for many ages than that of count, which was afterwards changed to that of king, without any addition to the power 405
Concerning the states thereof erring 425
Catiline, his temper 129
One of the lowest men in the world 145
"Cesset processus," said to be annexed to the person of the king 443
Ceylon, an island in the East Indies, where the king knows no law but his own will 448 Change, of government, no proof of irregularity or prejudice to it, by those that have right 117, 137
Nothing found more orderly 132
A mortal one in root and principle 134, 135
In government unavoidable 136
What change deserves praise 137
Where the wisdom of it is shewn 137
Where they are requisite sometimes 366
What are for the worse 419
Charter of liberty, not from men, but from God 407 Parliaments interposed their authority in these matters 423
Chatham,

- Chatham, the city of London's dread, at the Dutch fleet's burning our ships there 165
Cheat of Mario Chigi, brother of Alexander VII. upon the sale of corn 208
Child or children, a wife one, Eccl. iv. 13. 29. 50. 93. 224. 287.
Their duty is perpetual 54. 68. 250, 251. 255
Of God and of the devil 55. 58
If children, then heirs 71
Wo to thee, O land, when thy king is a child 72. 92
On what account children are admitted to rule 92
What understood by the word child 93
They do not always prove like their parents 205. 314. 315
Children, the danger of having them to be kings 224
The law gives them relief against the severities of their parents 254
Were punished with death, and for what 254
Christianity has been split into variety of opinions ever since it was preached 163
The first professors were of the meanest of the people 298
St. Paul's work was to preserve the professors of it from errors concerning the state 298
Sufficiently proved to be antient, if proved to be good and true 364
Cities consist of equals 60, 61. 65
What makes them free 407
Cives, vide Incolæ.
Civil war, vide War.
Cleanthes, his philosophical reply to Aristippus, about flattery 202
Clergy, the veneration our ancestors had for them 385
Collectors, their extortions 207
Commanders, after the captivity, who thought most fit 28
Of armies, who best to be made so 61
The best among the Greeks and Romans in their times, would not know how to manage an army now 418, 419
Where they have been put to death for misbehaviour, &c. 424
Commands of a master, how far the servant is bound to obey them, &c. 346, 347
Commission, from God, what 56
They who hereby grant authority, do always retain more than they give 422. 454
Comitia centuriata, what 309
Commons, whether they had a part in the government 383, 384
Always had a place in the councils that managed it 385
Many of them, in antiquity and eminency, little inferior to the chief of the titular nobility 385. 389
The nations strength and virtue in them 389
How all things have been brought into the king's and their hands 420
Yet never can be united to the court 420
Have refused to give their opinions in many cases, till they had consulted with those that sent them 424
Commonwealths, for what end instituted 3
All the regular kingdoms in the world are so 23. 62
Of Italy, not without valour and virtue 127
How they seek peace and war 159, 160
Commonwealths, whether better to constitute one for war or trade 161
Another sort composed of many cities associated together, and living "æquo jure" 162
Seldom advance women, children, or such-like, to the supreme power 198
In them all men fight for themselves 199
When the laws are abolished, the name also ceases 199
Less slaughter in these, than in absolute kingdoms 206
Of Greece and Italy, why called nurseries of virtue 209
Justice very well administered in them 292
How they may be saved from ruin 421
Competitors, sovereigns do impatiently bear them 21
Where their own swords have decided their disputes 174. 189
Contests between them relating to the crown, are often very bloody 191. 193. 195. 196. 197. 199
Compulsion; he that will suffer himself to be compelled, knows not how to die 301
Conquest, what is so called 24, 25
William I. had the name of conqueror odiously given to him 82
The extent thereof not the only thing to be considered 123, 124
Some commonwealths hereby designed to enlarge their territories 160
Some conquerors never deserved the name of usurpers 291
The king cannot dispose of a conquered country, because it is annexed to the office 394
It is the people that conquer, not any one man by his own strength 403
Conscience, how it ought to be regulated 300
Consent general, to resign part of their liberty for the good of all, is the voice of nature 13. 24. 151
First conferred power 20, 21. 23. 37. 76. 91, 92
Government arises from it 38, 39. 75. 83. 245, 246
The right of magistrates essentially depends upon it 83, 84. 230. 332. 356. 362
None to tyrannies 83, 84
No complete lawful power without it 85, 91. 155, 175
Of the three estates in many places required to pass a law 239
Whatsoever proceeds not from it, must be de facto only 403
Constantine the Great, with what blood he was polluted 190, 241
His power kept up hereditary, but with extreme confusion and disorder 246
Constitutions of every government to whom referred 27
Human subject to corruption, and therefore to be reduced to their first principles 117
Where new ones are necessarily required 136
That the best, which is attended with the least inconveniences 142
Who endeavours the subversion of them 153. 420
Of commonwealths various 159, 160. 401
Con-

- Constitutions, of the Northern nations that invaded the Roman empire 161
 The temper of that of the United Provinces 164
 Good ones remain, though the authors of them perish 167
 The salutary ones made by men, God approves and ratifies 294
 Of a state aims at perpetuity 307
 Are made for and by the people 349
 What the imperfections of all human constitutions 365
 Our antient has been wholly inverted 389
 What are most to be commended 417. 434
 Of no value, if there be not a power to support them 417, 418
 Consuls, made of plebeians, how seldom chosen, and with what prudence 117, 118
 Represented kings, and were vested with equal power 131. 133. 249. 304. 409
 Were created after the expulsion of Tarquin 137. 241
 Strangers raised to that honour 160
 Though supreme in power, yet subject to the people 176. 249. 274
 Marius continued five years in the office 241
 Only for a year 249
 Title of dread sovereign, might justly have been given to them 409
 If they grew insolent, how they might be reduced 418
 Contracts, how framed between nations and their kings 256. 267. 268. 414, 415
Vid Judges, Nations, Original.
 Entered into by princes before their investiture 297
 The breaking them, overthrows all societies 326
 In writing, said to be invented only to bind villains, and why 326
 All are mutual, and whoever fails of his part discharges the other 329
 Contrarium contraria est ratio 299
 Controversies with other nations, the decision of them left to judges chosen by mutual agreement 238
 Coriolanus duly condemned by the Romans 140
 Coronation oath 85, 86. 91, 92
 Norman kings obliged to take it 288
 How far our kings are obliged to observe it 322, 323. 325. 327, 328, 329. 372. 410
 Corporations, or bodies politic, what places were thought fit by the king and council to be made so 423
 Corruption, natural to courts, instances given, &c. 145. 149. 200, 201
 Of ministers in foreign courts 156
 The effect of that which proceeds from the government in particular instances 170. 439
 Of a people tends to tyranny 182
 Makes princes titles good, and how 185
 Where it certainly most abounds 200, 201. 203
 Must always be opposed by free governments, and why 201, 202
 The basest, but most lucrative traffick 202
 In the head, must necessarily diffuse into most of the members of the commonwealth 204. 221
 Corruption, a just prince, that will hear his people's complaints himself, prevents it 204
 Rooted in the very principle of absolute monarchy, which cannot subsist without it 205
 Mankind naturally propense to it 275
 Of judgment proceeds from private passions 312
 Of members of parliament 456
 Counsellors, made choice of according to the temper of the prince 10. 215. 319, 320
 Signify little to an absolute monarch 157. 170
 In the multitude of them, generally is safety 424
 Whether those of the king are exposed to punishments, and for what 444. 459
 Council of seventy chosen men 98
 God's counsels are impenetrable 113
 A wise and good one cannot always supply the defects, or correct the vices, of a young or ill-disposed prince 319
 Where it is of no use, unless princes are obliged to follow it 320
 Of Toledo, what it made the prince to swear before he was placed in the royal seat 338
 Of what persons it antiently consisted 386. 423
 General, how expressed antiently by authors 391
 When the boldest are most safe 434
 The king is obliged to act, "cum magnatum & sapientum consilio" 444
 He can speak only by their advice, and every man of them is with his head to answer for the advice he gives 459
 Council-table, the proceedings and jurisdiction of it regulated by 17 Car. I. cap. x. 378
 Courtiers, what things are inseparable from their lives 202
 Their phrase is, to make as much profit of their places as they can 203
 A wise prince's saying to some about him of such 204
 Wherein their art consists 212. 446
 The modern ones, by their names and titles, what they are apt to put us in mind of 385
 When they speak most truth 410
 Of Philip III. and IV. of Spain, their sottishness 421, 422
 Cowards, the cruellest of men 227
 Crown, how the English became hereditary 88. 90
 Changed from one family to another by the estates of the realm 132. 250. 335, 336. 378, 379
 Comprehends all that can be grateful to the most violent and vicious 186
 Hereditary or elective, it has its defects 205
 The Spartan transported into nine several families 232
 Of France, is from the people 235. 336, 337
 Where none would accept it, but such as did not deserve it 241
 Arminius slain for aiming at one 303
 Of England, upon what conditions accepted 327, 328
 Crown

Crown, five different manners of disposing crowns, esteem'd hereditary 330
 Of Spain not fixed in a line, but disposed of as the nobility and people thought fit 334, 335
 Many and bloody contests for one 356, 411, 412
 The demesnes of it cannot be alienated 394
 The parliament's power of giving and taking it away 413
 Some have feared the lustre of it 433
 He that wears it cannot determine the affairs which the law refers to the king 441, 443
Curio, by corruption made an instrument of mischief, who had been an eminent supporter of the laws 147
Custom, the authority of it, as well as of law, consists only in its rectitude 364
 The various ones used in elections 423
 Had its beginning and continuance from the universal consent of the nation 445
 The reason why we pay customs 458

D.

David, the most reverend king, had his posterity deprived, and his kingdom at last came to the Asmoncan race 28
 Chosen and anointed king by the tribe of Judah 92, 261
 Slew the sons of Rimmon, and why 92
 Not without his infirmities and punishments 107
 Who were his followers, notwithstanding the justice of his cause 183, 261
 His affection towards his people 254
 His resisting of Saul, without assuming the power of a king 259, 260
 How his heart smote him when he had cut off Saul's skirt 260
 His war with Saul, how grounded 260
 There were many rebellions against him 262
 How he feared men more than God 272
 Why he commanded Solomon, not to suffer Joab to go to the grave in peace 295
 Wise as an angel of God 425
Death of no eminent Roman, except one, for a long time 118
 Citizens to be condemned in public, by the Roman law 144
 Of Barnevelt, and de Wit 164
 Often the reward of such services, as cannot be sufficiently valued 190
 Of the nearest relations, "regnandi causa" 190
 The bitterness of it, how asswaged 243
 Very few suffered in Sparta for above 800 years 296
Decemviri, only for a year 134
 For two years 311
 To regulate the law 137, 308
 Patricians favoured them 172
 Proceeded against as private men, when they continued beyond their time 176
 Used with great gentleness 199
 The Romans easily beaten under them 220
 The power given to them, "fine provocations," was only in private cases 311

Decemviri, why the people destroyed both their power and them 311
Decision of the most difficult matters, antiently left to the priests in all countries 438
 In England, where made by judges and juries, and where by parliaments 444, 445
Defence, all terminates in force 168, 169
 Whether better for every man to stand in his own defence, than to enter into societies 179, 180
 Of one's self, natural 267, 281, 282
Delatores. See Roman empire 115
Delegated persons, their powers to whom referred 78, 79, 80
 In general assemblies 81
 How binding the acts of such are to the whole nation 83
 Where the king acts by his power 444
 Can have no power but what is conferred on them by their principals 450
 How those in the United Provinces, and in Switzerland, are used 451
 Deputies of Castile refused, in the cortez, to give Charles V. the Supplies he desired, and why 452
Deliverers of their countries from oppressions, how they have been esteemed in all ages 11
 What gifts God bestowed on them 29, 97, 105, 113
 Often rewarded with inheritances 78
 Their actions carry their own justification 181
Democracy, God said to be the author of it 15, 100 Perfect, what 23
 For whom best 61, 62, 99, 100
 How instituted 67
 A democratical embassy 98, 99
 Of the Hebrew government 99
 Never good but in small towns 130, 138
 Pure, if it be in the world, the author has nothing to say to it 149
 Where it would prove the most just, rational, and natural 152
 To what mistakes most liable 173
 With whom in a strict sense it can only suit 238
Denmark, the last king thereof overthrew in one day all the laws of his country 148
 The crown elective till 1660, and then made hereditary 332, 401
 In some parts thereof, the whole volumes of their laws may be read in few hours 370
 The authority of their kings said to have been for above 3000 years 380
 Nobleman and Gentleman the same there 387
Deposition of princes said to be the doctrine of Rome and Geneva 6
 For misgovernment, and others placed in their rooms 79, 90, 132, 133, 224, 234, 262, 263, 335, 422
Kings, when deposed, lose the right of sending ambassadors 442
 The practice of France and other countries 90, 136, 193, 196, 225, 334, 335, 336, 378
 For religion differing from the body of the nation 90, 93, 132
 If they become enemies to their people 179
 For their ill lives 296, 297
Depo-

Deposition of Wamba, a Gothic king, who was made a monk after he had reigned many years well 334
 Desertion, the cause of it 156
   Common to all absolute monarchies 156
   Of soldiers 220, 221, 222
 "Detur digniori" 29, 40, 61
 Dictator, from whence his power arose 118, 274
   Cæsar made himself perpetual 121
   Made occasionally at the beginning 134, 135, 138
   A mortal change in root and principle 134, 135
   Why Mamercus and others had this honour 141, 217
   Though supreme, yet subject to the people, if they transgressed the law 176, 248, 249, 408
   His power but for 6 months at most 249, 304, 311
   Camillus in his fourth dictatorship threatened with a fine 249
   The commission that was given them, what 400, 401
   How high the Romans carried the power and veneration due to them 409
   None ever usurped a power over liberty till the time of Sylla 418
 Diets, vid. Estates of the Realm, Parliaments, and General assemblies.
 Difference between a lawful king and tyrant 70, 72, 226, 279, 317
   Between brethren, only in proportion 72
   Between lord and servant in specie, not in degree 69
   Between men fighting for their own interest, and such as serve for pay 220
   Between senates and absolute princes 245
   Between magistrates to whom obedience is due, and to whom not 300, 301
   Between good and bad princes, is from the observation or violation of the laws of their country 306
 Dioclesian's saying, "bonus cautus optimus imperator venditur" 200
   What made him renounce the empire 200
 Dionysius, his tyranny destroyed by the Syracusians 13
   His character 31, 32, 213
   Diogenes his saying of him 213
 Discipline, the excellency of the Roman 143, 144, 158
   The like in all nations that have kept their liberty 158
   The effects of good and bad 218, 219, 220
   The excellency of the Spartan 232, 296
 Dispensing power, our kings have it not beyond what the law gives them 357
 Dissimulation, what 182
 Dissolute persons fittest subjects for absolute monarchs 95, 146, 182
   Abhor the dominion of the law 150, 214
 Doctrine; some, by that which is false, poison the springs of religion and virtue 344
 Dominion, equally divided among all; is universal liberty 26
   Of the whole world cannot belong to one man 43, 46
   Nor over a nation, ever inseparably united to one man and his family 60, 72, 73, 74, 85

Dominion, deeds by which the right of it is conferred 90
   Usurped by the ruin of the best of mankind 145
   Of France not to be alienated 235
   Every child of a parent cannot inherit it 243
   How, and by whom, it was conferred 244, 406
   Implies protection 407
 "Dominus," its signification 73
   The Romans often called lords of the world 390
 Domitian, his character 210
   Tacitus calls him, an enemy to virtue 293
 Duels in France, who only could refuse challenges from any gentleman 387
 Dukes of Venice, Moscovy, &c. 178
 Duke, earl and viscount, the names of offices 395
   Where these names are subjects, and where little less than sovereigns 405
 Duty, arising from a benefit received, must be proportionable to it 255
   Of a magistrate, what 293
   Of no man to deny any one that which is due, much less to oppose the minister of God in the exercise of his office 299
   What to be expected from, and rendered to them 304

E.

Eastern nations what remarkable for 104
 Force is the prevailing law with them 106
 Were and are still under the government of those, whom all free people call tyrants 172, 348
 Solomon's prudent advice to private persons living under the government of these countries 287
 Edward II. imprisoned and deposed by his parliament 454
 —IV. his wants supplied by fraud and rapine 460
 Election, most princes chosen by the people 79, 80, 85, 92
   Proved from scripture instances 80, 85, 92, 93, 99, 259, 261
   From examples of the Saxons 82, 88, 290, 291, 387
   Makes a right 84, 91, 92
   The various ways of electing princes 131
   Frequent chusing of magistrates makes nurseries of great and able men 158, 167, 216
   The prudence of election surpasses the accidents of birth 168
   Of kings in France 234, 235, 336, 337
   Of our kings, how 326, 327
   Of Charles Gustavus to the crown of Sweden 400
   The various customs used in chusing parliament-men 423, 424
 Elective kingdoms 333
 Elizabeth, queen, her government, not without some mixture of blood 197
   What power made her capable of the succession 341, 397
   Her character and failings 355
   The earl of Morton sent ambassador to her by the estates of Scotland, to justify their proceedings against queen Mary 435
 Eliza-

- Elizabeth, none so much imitated Henry V. as she 462 Eminent, the most, ought only to be advanced to places of public trust and dignity 38. 66, 67
     Most obnoxious to be taken off 119. 143. 212, 213
     Are most feared 189. 192
     When these are most impatient 192, 193
     The pillars of every state 192
 Emperors, Roman, three or four, and at one time thirty, who called themselves by this name 135
     Endeavoured to make their power hereditary 246
     The height of their regal majesty 264, 265
     St. Austin's and Ulpian's saying, that they were subject to no law, and why 287. 354
     Some foully polluted themselves with innocent
         blood 299
     The title never solemnly assumed by, nor conferred on them 302, 303 Theodosius confess, it was the glory of a good one to own himself bound by laws 354
     The present one in Germany, an account of him 426
 Empire, grounded on the pope's donation 40
     Gained by violence is mere tyranny 86. 88 Acquired by virtue, cannot long be supported by money 115
     The calamities which the Roman suffered 137
     Settled in Germany 194
     What made Dioclesian to renounce the empire 200
     Under what sort of governors it was ruined
         217, 218. 246
     Of the world divided between God and Cæsar 346
     Not obliged by any stipulation of the emperor without their consent 442
 Enacting laws, continued in the people of Rome
         118, 123
 Enemy of a nation, who 39. 175. 209. 213
     Every man is a soldier against him 175
     Who the most dangerous to supreme magistrates
         180. 341
     Who is so to all that is good 201
     Who is so to virtue and religion, is an enemy to mankind 210. 212
     Those that know they have such abroad, endeavour to get friends at home 280
     Sycophant: the worst enemies 322. 462
     How a king declares he has none when he comes to the crown 357
     A prince that seeks assistance from foreign powers, is so 430
 England, how the crown became hereditary 88
     The state of it since the year 1660 130
     How, and when the glory of our arms was turned into shame 167
     How the succession of her kings has been 189.
         379
     Her wars with France merely upon contests for the crown 195
     Her miseries by our civil contests 196, 197
     When her reputation and power was at a great height 222
     Whether our kings were ever proprietors of all the lands 272
 England, the naked condition of our ancestors upon Cæsar's invasion 281
     Has no dictatorial power over her 283
     Ever a free nation, and chose her own kings 327, 328. 391
     Made her own laws 380, 381. 391
     We know little of the first inhabitants, but what is involved in fables and obscurity 363
     The great number of our laws make them inconvenient 339
     Wherein she ought to be compared with Rome 374
     Brave in William I's time, when she saw her laws and liberties were in danger 375
     What has cost her much blood, and has been the cause of our late difficulties 379
     Our security, the best anchor we have, ought to be preserved with all care 457
     The general impairing of her, may be dated from the death of Henry V. 460 Epaminondas, forfeiture of his life (though saved) for serving his country longer than the time limited 176
 Ephori, established to restrain the power of kings
         87. 232. 378
     When they were created 432
 Equality, in all by nature 5 7. 15. 36. 60. 358.
         436, 437
     Just among equals 62
     Civil society composed of equals 61 Leagues do not imply absolute equality between parties 92
     Where it is hard to preserve a civil equality 121
     Popular, to what it is an enemy 182
     Of right, what is called liberty 244
     Kings under this law with the rest of the people 263
     Equals cannot have a right over each other 406.
         437
     No nation can have an equal within itself 438
 Error, all subject to it 120. 141. 173. 214 Discovered by the discourse of a wise and good man 198
     By it popular governments may sometimes hurt
         private persons 210
     A polite people may relinquish those of their ancestors, which they have been guilty of in the times of their ignorance 364
     Would be perpetual, if no change were admitted 366
     Where they are in government, though it may be easy for a while, yet it cannot be lasting 456
 Escheat of the crown for want of an heir 41, 42
 Estates of the realm divided the kingdom of France
         235. 336, 337
     Their power in voting 239
     Have disposed of crowns as they pleased 306.
         307. 336. 337. 378. & de Parliaments, Assemblies general 400, 401
 Evil, what is so of itself, by continuance is made worse, and on the first opportunity is justly to be abolished 380
 Eutropius, when a slave, picked pockets, &c. but, when a minister, he sold cities, &c. 203 Excommunication denounced on the violators of magna charta 324
     P p p F.

F.

Fabius Maximus one of the greatest and best of men that ever Rome produced 119
 Fabius Quintus, in danger of his life for fighting without order, though he gained a signal victory 409
 Factions about regal power and succession, how to be prevented 189
 The convulsions they make 191. 195. 420
 Of the Guelphs and Ghibelins 208
 Virtue and vice were made the badges of them 214, 215
 Faith, implicit, to whom it belongs 8, 9. 344
 Families, none antienter than other, and why 49
 What required to make a complete one 68
 When our ancestors sent to seek a king in one of the meanest of them in Wales 190
 None that does not often produce weak, ignorant, or cruel children 305, 306
 Famous men for wisdom, virtue, and good government 145. 152, 153. 168
 Have eyes, and will always see the way they go 344
 Fathers, the power of fatherhood belongs only to a father 22, 23. 48, 49. 54
 Cruel princes no fathers of their country 38, 39. 278, 279. 320, 321
 Their characters indelible 48. 54. 60
 Adoption of them absurd 50, 51, 52, 53, 54
 Who deserve the obedience due to natural parents 51
 By usurpation 56. 78
 The fifth commandment how explained 57
 Who has the right of fathers 67, 68
 When it ceases 68. 74
 Embrace all their children alike 72
 There is a sort of tyrant that has no father 321
 Favourites, not always the best of men 51, 52
 Their influence over princes 109, 110
 Whom the monarch commonly makes such 201
 How their exorbitant desires are gratified 246
 Faustina, two of them, who by their ascendancy tarnished the glory of Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius 200
 Fear, what it transports a wicked man to do 227
 Renders communities gentle and cautious 208
 Puts people on desperate courses 241
 What is the measure of it to that magistrate who is the minister of God 296
 When, if ever, said to enter Cæsar's heart 381
 Felicity, man's, where placed 5, 6
 Females, vide Women.
 Excluded from all offices in the commonwealth 331
 Figurative expressions, all have their strength only from similitude 408
 Filmer, his right of all kings 3, &c. 96, 97, 98
 Takes the world to be the patrimony of one man 3, 4. 226
 Uses not one argument but what is false, nor cites one author but whom he has perverted or abused 5. 317
 And his partisans, why reserved to this age 8. 376

Filmer, his business is to overthrow liberty and truth 8. 460
 His bitter malice against England 11
 Makes God the author of democracy 14
 His lord paramount over childrens children to all generations 17, 18, 19
 His opinion, to whom all kings are reputed next heirs 30
 Where his kingly power escheats on independent heads of families 41. 49
 His adoption of fathers of provinces for what 52
 His notion, that we must regard the power, not the means by which it is gained 53. 77, 78. 174. 258, 259. 353
 His distinction between "eligere" and "instituere" 84, 85
 His vile abusing of the reverend Hooker 86. 91
 His notion of begging a king 92
 Absolute monarchy to be the nursery of virtue 104
 Attributing order and stability to it 104. 139
 Imputing much bloodshed to Rome's popular government 120
 His backdoor, sedition and faction 132, 133
 His opinion, that the worst men in Rome thrived best 138. 141
 That the nature of all people is to desire liberty without restraint 151
 His cypher of the form of mixed governments 154, 155
 That there is a necessity upon every people to chuse the worst men, for being most like themselves 167
 His description of the tumults of Rome 199
 Affirms that more men are slain in popular than absolute governments 206
 The extent of his cruelties of a tyrant 210
 His attributing ignorance and negligence to popular governments 215
 His notion, that the virtues and wisdom of a prince supply all distempers of a state 223
 That there is no such tyranny as that of a multitude 226
 That kings must be absolute 229, 230
 His notion of a king's ceasing to be so 229. 237
 His whimsy about democracies 238
 That all the people's liberties flow from the gracious concession of princes 242. 271
 That there is no coming at a king, if he break his contract with his people 247
 That a father of a family, governs it by no other law than his own will 251
 That patient obedience is due both to kings and tyrants 251
 That there were kings, before any laws were made 252
 That Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, were kings 265
 That Samuel, by telling what a king would do, instructed the people what they were to suffer 266. 268
 That inconveniencies and mischiefs are some of the essentials of kingly government 270
 That all laws are the mandates of kings 271
 His ridiculous saying, those that will have a king 274

- Filmer, that the Jews did not ask a tyrant of Samuel 277
- That the people's cries are not always an argument of their living under a tyrant 279
- That our Saviour limits and distinguishes royal power 283
- That the tribute Cæsar imposed was all their coin 284
- Cities Braſton, as a patron of the absolute power of kings 290
- That St. Paul's higher powers meant only a monarch that carries the sword, &c. 292
- That kings are not bound by the positive laws of any nation 300. 317
- That the original of laws was to keep the multitude in order 305
- That laws were invented for every particular subject to find his prince's pleasure 309
- That kings are above the laws 312
- His opinion when princes degenerate into tyrants 314
- That tyrants and conquerors are kings and fathers 317
- That the king swears to observe no laws, but such as in his judgment are upright, &c. 322
- That kings are not obliged by voluntary oaths, &c. 325
- His principles animadverted on 330. 331
- That obedience is due to a command, though contrary to law 345
- That the king's prerogative to be above the law, is only for the good of them that are under it 348
- His equivocal king 351
- His opinion, that the law is no better than a tyrant 356
- That a perfect kingdom, wherein the king rules by his own will 358
- That the first power was the kingly in this nation 361
- That all judges receive their authority from the king 369
- That the power of kings cannot be restrained by act of parliament 376
- That the king is the author, corrector, and moderator of both statute and common law 379
- His trivial conceits about parliaments, the time when they began, &c. 379. 383. 384
- His notion about usurpers, and lawful kings 386
- That the liberties claimed in parliament are liberties of grace from the king, and not of nature to the people 399
- That the people's language is submissive to the king, but his is haughty to them 409
- That kings may call and dissolve parliaments at pleasure 421
- Admires the profound wisdom of all kings 424
- A bitter enemy to all mankind 447. 448
- His book here lately reprinted, as an introduction to a popish successor 448
- His meaning of "le roy le veut" 458. 459. 460
- Flatterers, what the vilest of them dare not deny 10
- What called by Tacitus 127
- The Hebrew kings not without them 183
- Flatterers, their pernicious advices to what end given 186
- Weak princes most subject to them 192. 200. 203. 219
- Cleanthes's saying to Aristippus 202
- By what handle they lead their princes 212
- Have made valour ridiculous 221
- By whom thought the best friends, and most worthy of great trusts 344
- The author's wish, that princes would abhor these wretches 374
- Almost ever encompass crowned heads 446
- Fleets, when ours were very famous 222
- Florence, the seditions there, and in Tuscany 208
- More depopulated now than any part of that province, though formerly, in a few hours, it could bring together 135000 well armed men 208. 349
- Folly; mankind does not universally commit, and perpetually persist in any 42
- Some are fools at 40 years of age 224
- Lord chancellor Egerton said he did not fit to relieve fools 327
- Force, where it is the only law that prevails 107
- What the Romans gained by the valour of their forces 124
- All defence terminates therein 165. 237
- Those that use it, must perfect their work, or perish 173
- Or fraud, in opposition to the laws of one's country, is absolutely monarchical 199
- When the Spartan kings were overthrown by it 232
- Is generally mortal to those that provoke it 237
- To be used, when there is no help in the law 241. 306. 435
- Can never create a right 245. 256. 403
- The French under a force they are not able to resist 271. 272
- What is gained by it may be recovered the same way 332. 403
- When all disputes about right naturally end in force 417
- Forfeiture of liberty, how it can be 406
- Fortune, of all things the most variable 113
- How right is made a slave to it 189. 190
- Of a prince, supplies all natural defects 223
- France, the fælic law there 47. 89. 330. 331
- Her antient kings right how conferred on them, and what was her antient government 88. 396
- Her revenge on England, for all the overthrows she received from our ancestors 130
- Frequently divided into several parties 135
- Her races of kings four times wholly changed 136. 191. 192. 224. 234
- The miserable condition of her people 155. 192. 193. 221. 222. 416. 458. 459
- Her greatest advantages have been by the mistaken counsels of England 156
- Her bloody contest and slaughters for the crown 191. 192. 193. 194. 195
- Had ten base and slothful kings, called, "les roys faineans" 192. 224
- The regal power limited 194. 233
- Had four kings deposed within 150 years 194
- P p p 2 France,

- France, civil wars frequent there, though not so cruel as formerly 195
Compared with Venice 219
Her soldiers running from their colours 221, 222
Her general assemblies continued the exercise of the sovereign power, long after Lewis XIth's death 233, 234
Had never any kings but of her own chusing 233
Henry V. of England most terrible to her 234
Their laws made by themselves, and not imposed on them 234
The people have understood their rights 235
The reason of the people's miseries 271, 272.
276, 277
The right to the crown is in a great measure from the law of that country. Instances hereof 336, 337
She does not allow her kings the right of making a will 337
By whom the power of conferring the sovereignty was exercised 401
By the people's increasing the power of their master, they add weight to their own chains 416
Her king cannot be called the head of his people,
and why 431
"Le roy le veut," and "tel est notre plaisir," are French rants; but no edict there has the power of a law, till it be registred in parliament 458
The conquest of her only to be effected by the bravery of a free and well satisfied people 461
Franks soon incorporated themselves with the Gauls 161 Fraud, accounted a crime so detestable, as not to be imputed to any but slaves 375
All wicked designs have been thereby carried on 426, 427
Who delight in it, and will have no other ministers but such as will be the instruments of it 461
Free, what nations so esteemed 12, 349
Vid. Popular governments.
Men, how to know ourselves such 23, 75, 102.
329, 348
People, scarce ever conquered by an absolute monarch 104, 111
Philip of Macedon confess his people to be freemen 111
The Britons were so, because governed by their own laws 380
Men, or noblemen, exempt from burden, and reserved, like arms, for the uses of war 389
Free cities, what and who made them 407
Frugality, the virtues that are upheld by it 275
Fruits of our corrupt nature 95
Own labour 98
Recovered liberty 132
Victory, how gained and lost 167 Always of the same nature with the seeds from whence they come 218
- G.
- Genealogies, the Hebrews exact in observing
them 27, 246
- Genealogies of princes, nicely to be searched in,
would be dangerous to some crowns 42, 43.
46, 402
Of mankind very confused 41, 42, 246, 333
Of being the eldest son of the eldest line of Noah 244
Geneva and Rome, wherein they only can concur 6
Genoa, how it is governed 131, 162
By whom that city was infected 162 Gentlemen, at this day, comprehends all that are raised above the common people 387 Germanicus's modesty in refusing the empire, was the occasion of his death 190, 327
Germany, how governed 131, 381
Equal to the Gauls in fortune, so long as Rome was free 169
The power of the German kings 232
The power of this emperor 232
From thence our original and government is drawn 296
When she had no king 303
The emperors thereof restrained by laws 306
The Western empire, how it came hither 332, 333
Tacitus's account of the people's valour 381
Not imaginable, that these people, jealous of liberty, should conquer this country to enslave themselves 383
No monarchy more limited 409
Gibeonites, by deceit, got Joshua to make a league with them 326
Gladiators were slaves 121, 126
Their fury extinguished with their blood 126
God, with an equal hand, gave to all the benefit of liberty 14
What sort of kings he approves in scripture 16
Can save by few as well as by many 18
Always constant to himself 29, 257 Never prescribed any rule about dividing the world 44
The fountain of justice, mercy, and truth 54, 63
By a universal law gave no rule for the making of kings 84
Is our Lord by right of creation 101
How he endowed the rulers of his people 105
His secret counsels impenetrable 113
What the usual course of his providence 128
Helps those who justly defend themselves 166
His general ordinance 174
Gave laws to the Jews only 187, 188
When he refused to hear the cries of his people 257, 264, 268
His anointed and accursed 260
A law in Rome, that no god should be worshipped without the consent of the senate 299 Good; every one seeks their own, according to the various motions of their mind 38, 76.
226
The public, the end of all government 50, 252.
281, 312, 313
Is more observed in mixed than absolute ones 215
Of mankind depends on religion and virtue 212
Called evil, and evil good 293
Good

- Good actions always carry a reward with them 342
 And evil, but three ways of distinguishing between them 29
 Men, who deserve to be called so 4
 How they obey their princes 201
 Know the weight of sovereign power, and doubt their own strength 433
 Goodness is always accompanied with wisdom 314
 Gospel, the light of the spiritual man 212
 Goths, their polity 131. 352
 For above 300 years never contracted marriages, nor mixed with the Spaniards 161
 Seized Rome, whilst Honorius was looking after his hens 169
 Subdued by the Saracens in one day 221
 Grew famous by the overthrow of the Roman tyranny 286
 Concerning succession to the crown during their reign 330
 Not above four in 300 years time were the immediate successors of their fathers 334
 In Spain overthrown by the Moors 334. 439
 Their kings in Spain never ventured to dispute with the nobility 379
 Their kingdom never restored 439
 Government, the original principles of it to be examined, and our own in particular 9. 103
 An ordinance of God 14. 16
 The several forms thereof left to man's choice 14. 16. 24. 37. 43. 44. 48. 67. 70. 75. 76. 94. 117. 130. 150. 152. 238
 Of the lawfulness of changing it, considered 15. 117. 132. 281
 Despotical differs from the regal 17. 18. 59
 The ground of all just governments 28. 144. 155. 372
 No man has it either for or from himself 29. 92. 175. 229. 230. 318
 None ever began with the paternal power 32
 To whom the constitution of every government is referred 37
 All for the good of the people, and their posterity 55. 70. 71. 77. 92. 67. 103. 123. 147. 165. 166. 168. 320. 365. 416. 417
 Is a collation of every man's private right into a public stock 60. 74
 Where just, it has ever been the nurse of virtue 60. 65. 66
 Popular for whom best 61
 For whom instituted 70. 72. 144
 What sort was ordained by God 98
 The effects of one well ordered 174
 What only deserves praise 123. 126
 How the best has been composed 130. 161
 Regal had a mixture of aristocratical and democratical in them 133
 Whence the denomination of all is taken 133. 139. 238
 The foundation remaining good, the superstructures may be altered 134. 137. 138. 171. 281
 When it cannot subsist 140
 The effects of a disordered one 142
 All subject to corruption and decay 149
 None imposed on men by God or nature 151. 155
 Mixed compared with absolute 153. 448
 Government, what the only just one, by consent of nations 155
 What may be imputed to it 158
 None ever freer from popular seditions than Switzerland 163
 That the best which best provides for war 165. 166. 168
 None without civil wars, tumults and seditions 172. 206. 207
 The end for which it is constituted 179. 180. 228. 407
 The Roman, how introduced 184
 Exposed to the most infamous traffick 202
 Of what parts it may consist 238
 Is a great burden to the wise and good 240. 241. 306. 309. 320. 350
 To reform it, is to bring it to its first principles 241. 439
 Questions arising concerning our own, must be decided by our laws, and not by the writings of the fathers 284. 285
 St. Paul's obedience to higher powers, must be understood to all sorts of government 292
 What would make all in the world "magna la-trocinia" 300
 When the ends of it are accomplished 351
 Most of them have been mixed, at least good ones 352. 448
 What only is reckoned good 359
 Our own the same with the Roman in principle, though not in form 375
 From whence the great variety of them proceeds 417
 The English, not ill constituted 418
 By what means the foundations may be removed, and the superstructure overthrown 419
 In a well constituted one, the remedies against ill magistrates are safe and easy 432
 Wisdom and valour required for the institution of a good one 440
 Where it is either intirely to be changed, or reformed according to its first institution 440
 The blessings of an absolute one 449
 Its establishment is an arbitrary act, wholly depending upon the will of man 455
 Governors appointed to execute the laws for the good of the people 60. 63. 72. 176. 438. 439
 The law appoints helps for their infirmities, and restrains their vices 240
 The people's creature 265. 274. 406. 436
 Where they are removable, if they will not be reclaimed 439
 The good and bad make the people happy and miserable in their turns 447
 Grants of king John to the pope, declared by parliament to be unjust, illegal, &c. 325
 What implies an annihilation of some grants 360
 Where they ought well to be proved, that the nature and intention of them may appear 393
 Of what nature those of our kings are 394
 Of lords, where they have been resumed 395
 Grecians knew no other original title to government,

ment, than that wisdom, &c. which was beneficial to the people 36
 Wherein they excelled other nations 104
 Overthrew the vast armies of the Persians 110, 111
 Were reduced to yield to a virtue greater than their own 129
 No absolute monarch among them established by law 138
 Have been, by disorder in government, exposed as a prey to the first invader 170
 When they were happy and glorious 206
 Their virtue expired with their liberty 218
 The word tyrant came from Greece, and what it signified 278
 Flourished in liberty in the time of Saul 281
 Grotius, his explanation of sovereign and limited power 177. 236. 402
 Wherein he justifies subjects in taking up "arms" 211
 His making St. Peter and St. Paul perfectly agree, about their different phrases of ordinances of God, and ordinance of man 294
 His saying, "qui dat finem, dat media ad finem necessaria" 422
 About kings stipulations, and right of sending ambassadors 442
 Guelphs and Ghibelins, their factions in Tuscany 127. 208
 Genoa infected with their factions 162
 Gustavus (Charles) his confessing to an ambassador how he ought to reign over the people that had chose him 400, 401
 He and his uncle (Adolphus) were content with the power that the laws of their country gave them 425, 426

H.

H Annibal killed more great Roman captains than any kingdom ever had 158
 The Samnites embassy to him 158
 How he lost the fruit of all his victories 169
 When he invaded Italy, no country seemed to have been of greater strength 207
 What to be done, if he be at the gates 421
 Hanseatic towns 164
 Hatred universal incurred by princes, who always fear those that hate them 210. 214
 To all that is good 255
 Head, why kings are called by this name, and the import of the word, both in scripture and profane authors 427, 428
 The differences between the natural and political 428
 What the office of a head is in a natural body 429, 430, 431
 Hebrew judge different from a king 97
 Kings not instituted by God, but given as a punishment 97
 How their government consisted 130, 162
 Kings, their power exceeded the rules set by God 182. 237
 What their discipline 232
 In their creation of judges, kings, &c. had no regard to fraternity 243, 244

Like to their neighbours in folly and vice, and would be like them too in government 257
 Hebrew judges, their power greater than what the law allows to our kings 287
 Whether the law given them by God be so perfect as to be obligatory to all nations 367
 Heir reputed, the absurdity of the notion 31, 32, 33, 34, 37, 41, 49
 Next in blood 46, 47, 68, 69, 89, 90, 105, 401
 Annexed to one single person 71
 All the children of Noah were his heirs 72
 Next to the crown set aside 89, 334, 335, 336
 Bellay's extravagant doctrine of an heir apparent 339
 Enjoys the same right as the parent, and devolves the same to his posterity 406
 Hengist and Horsa, on what terms the county of Kent was given them 392
 Henry IV. of France, how he desired to recommend himself to his people 339
 I. of England, whether he was an usurper or not 396
 V. His care was to please his people, and to raise their spirits 459, 460
 Was terrible to France 234
 His character 459, 460, 461, 462
 VI. became a prey to a furious Frenchwoman 460
 VII. Had neither cross nor pile for his title 397
 VIII. acknowledged the power of the parliament, in making, changing, and repealing laws 315, 375
 Heptarchy, when this was divided into seven kingdoms, each kept still the same usage within itself 382
 Could as easily unite the seven councils as the seven kingdoms into one 383
 Hercules, an account of him 129
 Hereditary right cannot naturally be in any 45, 69
 Prerogative of dominion, how understood 60
 Right, as a reward of virtue 78
 How a kingdom comes to be so 87, 88
 Crowns so as to their ordinary course, but the power restrained 131
 Monarchies, in them no care is taken of him that is to command 168
 According to proximity of blood, not prescribed by any laws of God 187
 Children seldom prove like their parents 205
 Crowns, five different ways of disposing them 330
 "Heroum regna" 36, 67, 252
 The government of whom 244
 History Roman, Tacitus says it wanted men to write theirs 216
 Hobbes, scurrilously derides Plato, Aristotle, and Cicero 38
 His "bellum omnium contra omnes" 43, 48, 342
 His "hostis & latro" 175
 The first that contrived a compendious way of justifying kings in the most abominable perjuries 323
 Holland, of great strength since the recovery of their liberty from the Spanish yoke 112
 The war with them in 1665. 222, 223
 Holland,

Holland, how they have defended themselves from the greatest monarchies 292
 The States are called high and mighty lords; and the word heer, which signifies lord, is as common as monsieur in France, &c. 390. 409, 410
 The condition of the seventeen provinces of the Netherlands, when they fell to the house of Austria 415
 The power of the States-General how limited 442
 Honours, the highest, falsely attributed to ill men 52
 Given to ill gotten wealth 64. 114, 115. 129. 203, 204
 To suffering virtue sometimes 141
 Where they have been rewards of vice 146
 To those who diserved the commonwealth 152, 153
 Justly bestowed on those that rightly perform their duty 177
 From whom purchased 202
 Given for services done to the public 246
 Princes could not, without breach of trust, confer them upon those that did not deserve them 384
 Hooker, his mistake in the fundamentals of natural liberty 13
 His admirable saying about lawful powers 85
 Slighted by Filmer 91. vid. 13
 Hottoman, his character and account of the French kings 233, 234
 Human nature, the miserable state of it, if not improved by art and discipline 281
 Frailty, allowances must be made for it 355
 Hurt, they do none who do nothing; where this rule is false 192

I.

James I. (king) his saying about his making of judges and bishops 211
 Acknowledges himself the servant of the commonwealth 236
 Said he was sworn to maintain the laws, and should be perjured if he broke them 313, 314. 460
 James II. what we might expect from him 448, 449
 Japhet, this part of the world seems by the Scriptures to be given to his sons 332
 Jealousy of state 190. 197
 Jesuits joined to Geneva 6
 To be believed with caution 67
 The present emperor of Germany too much governed by them 426
 The soul that gives life to the whole body of the popish faction 448, 449
 The order banished out of the kingdom by an arrest of the parliament of Paris, but refused by those of Tholouse and Bourdeaux 458
 Jews had a great veneration for the house of David, and why 92
 Grown weary of God's government 102. 309
 Had leave to destroy their enemies 107
 Idolaters among them in David and Hezekiah's days 146

Jews, idolatry the production of the government they had set up 183. 230, 231
 Submit to the Roman power 283
 Thought Christ's first work would be to throw off the Roman yoke 234
 Being converted, thought themselves freed from the obligation of human laws 298
 Some pretend to know their original 332
 A proclamation to extirpate them 447
 "Imperator," a name given by the Roman armies to pretors and consuls 404
 "Imperium summum summo modo," }
 "Modo non summo," } 176
 "Liberrimum" } 402
 "Ab eo à quo spiritus" } 406
 Imposing on people's easy consciences 163
 On some princes how it is 203
 "Incolæ," who they are at Venice 131
 Distinction between them here and "cives" 423
 Indemnity, the assurance of it would turn men's other vices into madness 248
 Industry, what is a spur to it 215
 Infancy, vid. Child.
 Inheritance, the common division of it among brothers 72, 73
 Where it gave no right to crowns 88. 91
 To one family 89, 91. 105
 Of the sword left to families 108
 What the apostles left to their successors in relation to the supreme power on earth 181
 Private, many controversies arise upon them 187
 What right is equally inherited by all children on the death of their parents 243
 William I. did not leave the kingdom as such at his death 297
 What belongs to females 331
 Little regard to it in the Austrian house according to blood 339
 In some places the law gives private inheritance to the next heir, in others makes proportions and allotments 339
 Injuries, the ways to prevent or punish them, either judicial or extrajudicial 174. 180
 Great ones, will one time or other fall on those that do them 237
 The Italians say, he that does an injury never pardons 255
 Those that are extreme, when so to be understood 315
 Injustice, what is so in the beginning, can never be the effect of justice 358, 359
 Inquisition of Spain, and other places 449
 Instinct, what 100
 Institution, he that institutes may also abrogate 15. 55. 315
 Is an election 84
 Of a kingdom is the act of a free nation 253. 275
 No prince had a more solemn one than Saul 358, 359
 Some kings have by it but little power 287
 The magistrates prerogatives depend upon it 302
 Of power is coercive 304
 When princes deflect from the end of theirs 312
 Wherein the end of it chiefly consists 341
 Institu-

- Institution, often the corruption of the state is taken for it 365
 They who institute a magistracy, best know whether the end of the institution be rightly pursued or not 400, 434
 Integrity of manners makes laws, as it were, useless 145
 Never subservient to the lust of princes 146
 Makes men contented with a due liberty 152
 Preserves popular equality 182
 Cannot be found in absolute governments 205
 Preserves the people's safety 275
 Interest, what advantages are reaped from uniting the nation's to that of the government 220
 Personal, preferred to the public good 275
 Interrenum, that there can be none, a fundamental maxim of great monarchies 187
 John's (king) grants to the pope declared by the parliament unjust, illegal 325
 Josephus of the Jewish government 96
 On what account he calls it a theocracy and an aristocracy 99, 238
 Says, their princes were to do nothing without the advice of the sanhedrin; or to be opposed, if they did 230
 Joshua had neither the name nor power of a king 97, 253
 Isaac, his character 18
 Israelites had no kings in the first institution of their government 36
 Nor till 400 years after 363
 Strangers only excluded from being kings 84
 Their government aristocratical 96
 What the effect of their having kings 107, 237
 After Solomon perpetually vexed with civil seditions and conspiracies, &c. 183
 Asked for a tyrant (though not by that name) when they asked for a king after the manner of other nations 277
 Not known certainly by what law they were governed 363
 Lived under the power of tyrants, whose proclamations were laws 449
 Italy, when she lay desolate 114, 185
 How her commonwealths have flourished and decayed 126, 127, 169, 170, 185, 207, 208
 Charles VIII. of France, conquered the best part of it without breaking a lance 156, 170, 259
 Judge, where every man is to be his own 75, 313, 425, 436
 Who shall be between prince and people 178, 179, 312, 313, 340, 365
 No prince fit to be judge of his own facts 312, 313, 348, 436, 438, 439
 The power of judging when it is fit to call the senate or people together, to whom and by whom referred 400, 421
 The parliament the best judge in dubious cases 424, 425, 438, 439
 Where he is not fit to be a judge in his own case 437
 Judges (such as Joshua, Gideon, &c.) whether their power was regal and just, or not 27, 28, 249
 Judges, whether there be any concerning king's titles 187
 The power of making them 211
 Sometimes the courts are filled with ill ones 214, 371
 Appointed to decide the contests arising from the breach of contracts 248
 Their opinion concerning ship-money 274, 443
 The religion of their oath 309, 315, 354, 370, 371, 372
 Parliament owned by kings to be judges of their stipulations 325
 What they ought to be, and in what sense chosen by the king 354
 Who were executed as traitors for subverting the laws of the land 355, 371, 443
 What act Edward III. promoted for his judges to do justice 355
 The general rule they are sworn to observe 356, 370, 443
 The power by which they act is from the law 369, 370, 371
 When they become the ministers of the devil 374
 The sad consequence of having all kings constituted judges over the body of the people 424, 425, 436, 438
 To determine controversies in a matter of right 437
 Whose commands they are bound to obey 443
 Judgment perverted, the ill effects of it 10
 Future, not sufficient to restrain men from being vicious 290
 Here they are passed by equals 371
 Those the kings of Judah gave, were in and with the sanhedrin 371
 None that is right can be given of human things, without a particular regard to the time wherein they passed 418
 Kings can give none upon any of their subjects, and why 440, 441
 Human is subject to error 442, 443, 459
 Juries, grand and petit, their power 354, 371
 How the judges are assistants to them 371
 In whose sight they give their verdict 443
 Justice has always truth for its rule 34, 68
 What the proper act of it 63
 Of every government depends on an original grant 77
 Has some times been perverted by the deceit of ill men 140, 355
 The sword of it for what use and end 174
 Where it will be exposed to sale 203
 The rule of civil and moral actions 211
 How well administered in republics 292
 What is meant by it 299, 301
 The distribution of it justly, is a work above the strength of one man 309
 When the course of it is certainly interrupted 342
 Deviations from it 355
 Where it is best administered 365
 Overthrown by the number of laws 369
 In receiving it the king is equal to another man 371
 Magistrates made to see it well executed 438, 439

K.

K Atharine de Medicis said never to have done any good but by mistake 142
 Kingcraft, what 225. 235. 236
 Was wholly exerted in the subversion of the laws of France, and the nobility that supported them 460
 Kingdom, the patriarchs had a spiritual one 17, 18
 No paternal one among the Hebrews 27, 28
 Thought never to be bought at too dear a rate 35
 How the first kingdoms were set up 42
 What are lawful ones 60
 What it imports 87
 One possessed by nine several Families within 200 years 108
 All have their various fluctuations, through ill discipline or conduct 109. 166
 The greatest have been destroyed by common-wealths 169
 Disputes about them most difficult and dangerous, and very bloody in several instances 187. 190, 191
 Of France divided by the estates of the realm 235
 Not established but for the good of the people 240
 Of Granada, their usage of their princes 241
 All erected at first by the consent of nations 244
 Frequently reduced to their first principles 245
 Some elective, some hereditary, and how directed 401, 402
 Constituted by conquering armies, and those established in the most orderly manner 403
 And estates, how they came to be erected 407
 Kings, the prerogative or royal charter granted to them 4 65, 66
 The end of their institution 7, 8. 15. 38. 40. 55. 63, 64. 77. 88. 213. 373. 438, 439
 Whether they may be restrained or censured 7. 15. 41. 58. 131. 176, 178, 179. 230. 237. 263. 304. 305. 402. 405. 422. 435
 In what sense they are like other Men 9, 10. 49. 101
 Evil ones will have evil ministers 10. 148
 The relation between them and the people 13
 The only sort mentioned in Scripture with approbation 17. 97. 275. 352
 The first a cruel tyrant 19, 20
 Who taken from out of the least family of the youngest tribe 28
 All not the natural fathers of their people 31
 Whom the antients chose for theirs 36, 37. 69. 97
 Not all of them wise 50 224. 424, 425
 A king by nature, who 62. 64. 67. 103. 108. 294. 359
 No design to speak irreverently of them 82. 148
 Set up by the nobles, antients, and people 82. 85. 87, 88. 123. 212. 234. 235. 237. 335.
 All not alike in power, nor spirit and principle 88. 314
 Some good, and some bad 314. 447.
 Whether any are immediately so on the death of the predecessor, and before they are proclaimed 91, 92. 187

Kings given in wrath 96, 97, 98. 132. 338
 426700 kings 100
 Many great ones overthrown by small republics 104
 Few possess the qualities requisite 106. 205. 230 240
 The name thereof abolished 131. 302, 303
 "Regis ad exemplum," not always so in all 146
 A virtuous one, but a momentary help sometimes, when his virtues die with him 157. 193. 205
 Whether those may be thrown down that set up themselves 179
 The slothful and negligent accounted great evils 192, 193, 194. 197, 198. 214. 217
 The best liable to be corrupted, and subject to mistakes and passions 200. 348. 436
 Who said to be like a phoenix 204
 None so vicious but will sometimes favour justice 210
 Apt to live under the power of their lusts 212
 Wherein just ones will find their honour and security 215
 Where lawful ones have proved equal to the worst usurpers 211
 Whose condition most miserable, and why 224, 225
 Some have experience as men, but not otherwise 225
 The name cannot make a king, unless he be one 226. 411
 Have a power of granting honours, immunities, &c. out of the public stock. 229. 242. 384. 423
 None to have more power or abilities to perform his office than Moses 230
 Advanced by abjuring their religion 234
 Under the happy inability to do any thing against the laws of their country 235, 236. 240. 249. 307. 339. 353. 433
 Where they have their share (and the senate theirs) of the supreme authority, the government is best supported 236
 Have found out now easier ways of doing what they please 241
 How there would be as many kings in the world as men 243
 If they have no title, they must be made so either by force or consent 244. 256
 The consequence of being unaccountable 248
 Have no other just power than what the laws give 250. 275
 The safety of their kingdoms, their chiefest law 251
 The first were of the accursed race, while the holy seed had none 253
 By what wicked means many of them have come in 254
 Of Israel and Judah under a law, not safe to be transgressed 262
 Why those of Israel committed many extravagancies 262 Judged by the great sanhedrin 263
 This sort of government the people's creature 265. 274. 406. 412. 438. 451, 452
 Q q q Kings

- Kings, not to claim the liberty of doing injustice in virtue of their prerogative 267, 268
 Bound up to the laws as to matters of property 271
 Not to be too powerful, nor too rich 275
 Of Israel, though they led vast armies into the field, seem to have possessed but little 276
 What their government ought to be 278
 Of England reign by law, and are under it, and why 284, 287, 290, 443
 What will endear them to their people 288
 The sovereign power often meant by this name 289
 What meant by lawful ones 291, 310, 318
 Why those of Judah could make no laws 295
 May be feared by those that do ill 296, 297
 How made in the Saxon times 296
 What those of the greatest nations have suffered 301
 What is that king which never dies 310, 311, 443
 Cannot mitigate or interpret laws 315, &c.
 When said to become perjured 314
 Not masters but servants of the commonwealth 318, vid. 236
 Cannot be interpreters of their own oaths 322
 Compelled to perform the conditions of magna charta 325, 326
 May resign, if they will not observe their oaths 328, 329
 Next in blood, generally cannot be said to be kings till they are crowned 330, 332
 How he is not to be heard 355
 The regal power, not the first in this nation 361
 Where the same power that had created this government, abolished it 363
 What our ancestors did with relation to them 363
 Judges rightly qualified are to instruct them in matters of law 370
 Wherein they are equal to other men 371
 None as such have the power of judging any 371, 373, 374, 375
 Where they cease to be so, and become tyrants 372
 Their power not restrained, but created by magna charta, and other laws 376
 What is natural for the worst of them to do 377
 The Norman had no more power than the Saxon, and why 283
 Tacitus says, they were taken out of the nobility 384
 Said to be chosen, or made, and sometimes deposed, by their great councils 391, 422
 Never masters of the soil of England 391, 392, 406, 407
 Why they speak always in the plural number 394
 The titles of ours examined into 397
 Whom the parliament have made are lawful, or we have had none for these 700 years 398
 Their power of calling parliaments was given to them 399, 421
 Naturally delight in power, and hate what crosses their wills 402, 454
 The most absolute princes in the world never had this name 404
- Kings, some subject to a foreign power, some tributary; and the Romans had many depending upon them 405
 The acts of one "de facto" considered 410, 411
 Wherein the essence of a king consists 411
 Deterred from endeavouring to seduce any of their great men from their duty 419
 Who are a great calamity to a nation 401, 461
 Who only are the heads of the people 426, 429, 430, 431
 If their actions are to be examined, and their persons punished 435
 None less capable oftentimes of forming a right judgment than they, and why 436
 Nor can be present in all their courts 441
 Do not stipulate for themselves, but their people 442
 Their power not universal; for many things they cannot do 443
 May in some degree mitigate the vindictive power of the law 444
 The advantage of their being restrained 447
 Not created to make laws, but to govern by them; and what is signified by "le roy le veut" 459, 460
 Are sworn to pass such laws as the people chase 459, 461
 King's-bench, for what end established 373
 The king that renders justice is always there, &c. 443
 Knight's service, what 587
 Knighthood, the dignity of it, and what was accounted a degrading 387, 388
 Knights of shires in the Saxon times 388
- L.
- LAWS, the prevalency of them over sovereign commands 4, 12
 Who best obeys them 6
 The end of them is to enjoy our liberties 12, 13, 288, 330
 Invest magistrates with power for the public good 39, 70
 Of England acknowledge one only heir 44, 72
 Said to be written reason 63, 64
 Have in them a constraining force 85
 To whom the power of making them belongs 85, 86, 308
 Are the measure of power 87, 89, 103, 230, 241, 443, 444
 Of each country create a right to the person that governs it 88
 Prescribe rules how power should be transmitted 89
 Where good ones do no good 105, 254
 To be suited to present exigencies 117, 136
 Make no distinction of persons 141
 "Lex perduellionis" 143
 Made in a sort useless by integrity of manners 146
 Abhorers of the dominion of it 150
 Instituted for the preventing of evil 174, 179, 236, 329
 Laws,

- Laws, those that go beyond them, act therein as private persons 177
 Who most restrained by them 178
 Subsist by executing justice 180. 253
 Concerning the succession 187. 308
 Tricks at law to put men to death 190. 214
 When in force, men of wisdom and valour are never wanting 198
 When they were overthrown 209
 The despisers destroyed without law 232. 236
 Do not always go by plurality of voices 239
 Of every place, shew the power of each magistrate 248
 Where before kings 252
 Proofs hereof 253. 305
 Of God, not to be abrogated by man 263
 Our kings can make none of themselves 215. 287. 402
 We know none but those of God and ourselves 288
 Are not made in vain 290
 Some neither just nor commendable; instances thereof 268, 269. 299. 300
 The directive power, which is certain, has a power over the conscience 300
 The sanction that deserves the name of a law 301. 309. 351. 365. 368
 To what end made as to magistrates 305, 306
 Princes and nations both gainers by the due observance of them 308. 310. 328, 329. 433, 434
 That is not a state or government, which has them not 308
 Athenians not without them when they had kings ibid.
 How said to be above the king 310
 Can only be altered in parliament 315, 316. 368. 378
 For what reason established; an encomium 316
 Who violate those of nature in the highest degree 320
 Of one's country to be submitted to 331
 Of nature, eternal 331. 336
 By whom the rigour of it is to be tempered 354
 None made by man can be perfect 358. 369, 370. 376
 By them, kings became first what they were 362. 376
 Those good for one people, that are not so for all 366, 367
 The statute of Henry VII. concerning a king "de facto," for what end made 411, 412. 420
 Plain ones, have been industriously rendered perplexed 420
 Good ones prescribe safe remedies against the mischiefs of ill magistrates 432, 433
 Where they are merciful both to ill and good men 434
 Should aim at perpetuity 446
 The mischiefs effected by a person's word having the force of a law ibid.
 When they may be easily overthrown, it will be attempted 456
 What gives the power of law to the sanctions under which we live 457
 Leagues do not imply absolute equality between parties 92
 With conquered nations 121
 League factions, and wars of the Hugonots 135, 136
 How faithfully they have been observed 164
 Men cannot too much rely upon them 164, 165, 166
 Those that make such as are detrimental to the public, are punishable 177
 Leagues, made against the Hollanders 292
 Of Joshua with the Gibeonites gained by deceit 326
 Made on a national, not personal account 441
 Learning makes men excel in virtue 110
 Said to make men seditious, but disproved 103. 139
 Legislative power of Rome and Sparta, continued in the people 118. 123. 296
 When it came to be scorned 120
 The magistratical power receives its being and measure from hence 304, 305
 Cannot be conferred by the writ of summons, but must be essentially and radically in the people 450
 Is always arbitrary 455
 Only trusted in the hands of those, who are bound to obey the laws that are made 457
 The king cannot have it in himself, nor any other part of it than what is formal 459. 462
 Legislators should always be of the wisest men 85, 86
 Wherein their wisdom consists 137
 Wherein they shew themselves wise and good 455
 Legitimacy contracted 90, 91
Vide Bastardy.
 Some children, though born in wedlock, utterly rejected as being begotten in adultery 340
 Lewis XI. his subverting the laws of his country 233
 XIV. accounted his not being able to act contrary to law, a happy impotency 339
 Liberty, the notions thereof, and from whence 5. 7. 14
 Natural, the consequence, if removed 7
 Wherein it solely consists 12. 317
 Filmer's notion of the greatest liberty in the world 12
 Oppugners of public liberty 13
 Universal asserted, and what that is 18. 25. 44. 75
 The assertors thereof have God for their patron 60. 149
 Produces virtue, order, stability 104. 139
 The loss of it in the Roman empire 108, 109. 111, 112. 115, 116. 126. 143. 361
 The mother and nurse of virtues 108. 111. 126. 159. 201. 209. 217
 Made the most virtuous people in the world 127
 When subverted, the worst men thrive best 142, 143
 How our natural love to it is tempered 151
 None sought it but with some restraint 153
 What the love of it inspires 158. vid. page 139
 At home, and war abroad 160
 When this is lost, kingdoms and states come to nothing 169. vid. page 111. 126, 127.
 Patricians the best defenders of it 173
 The way to recover it 181
 Q q q 2 Liberty,

- Liberty, cannot be preserved, if the manners of the people be corrupted 201
 None remained in Rome, when Sylla resigned his power 209
 When lost, excellent spirits failed 216, 217
 A people can desire nothing besides it 228
 Cannot subsist, if vice and corruption prevail 241, 242
 Is a right common to all 242, 243
 God gave the Israelites this law 264
 Who have no true sense of it 269
 Our ancestors left us the best laws they could devise to defend it 288
 All by the law of nature have a right to their liberties, lands, goods, &c. 320, 393
 What principles make men lovers of it 341
 None can subsist where there is an absolute power above the law 349
 Where it is destroyed by the prerogative 350
 Of a people, naturally inherent in themselves 362, 393, 406
 The value our ancestors set upon theirs 368, 408, 453
 None has better defended them than this nation 375, 453
 To it Tacitus attributes the German bravery 381
 What is the utmost act of it 383
 The exercise of the natural liberty of nations, in the several limitations of the sovereign power 402
 Of a people, the gift of God and nature 406
 Forfeited or resigned 406, 407
 No veneration paid to magistrates can lessen the liberty of a nation 409
 Nothing valuable to it in the opinion of the Romans 414
 Easy to get partizans to make good by force the greatest violations of it 418
 How to use one's own with relation to the public 437
 With a mischief 449, 450, 453
 Of those who act in their own persons, and of those who send delegates, is perfectly the same 451, 452
 That for which we contend as the gift of God and nature, remains equally in all 452
 Lineal subjection never learned from Moses 66
 Succession, where not followed 89, 90
 London, the privilege of the common-hall 423
 Lord paramount, over whom 17, 18, 19, 20
 From whence he must come 25
 None by nature over his brethren 72
 The mischiefs they both do and suffer are very great 241
 Lords, how they have lost the authority which they had formerly 420
 Lord's day, not to be spent in sports and revellings 346
 Love to ones country, commonwealths have it most 157, 159, 160
 The happy effects of it 158
 A resolution to die for, or live with it 158, 162, 165
 The way to make people in love with it 165, 194, 218
 This now turned into a care of private interest 171
- Love, the behaviour of those that are lovers, &c. 194, 217
 Occasions sometimes wars and tumults 207
 Loyalty, those that boast loudest of it most apply it in the wrong way 242
 Lucullus, his little army put Tigranes with 200000 men to flight 112
 Luxury of the Romans, the occasion of their ruin 129
 Brought into Rome by C. Manlius 145
 Exposes the virtuous to scorn 202
 When in fashion, the desire of riches must increase 203
 The bravest nations most enslaved by it 277
 Lysurgus, his laws received their authority from the general assembly 296, 308
 Absurd to think of restoring his laws 366
 To what the long continuance of them is attributed 446
- M.
- Macedonian kings, their power was but small 111
 Their army overthrown by Paulus Emilius 166
Vide Monarchy.
 Machiavel, his admirable saying 105, 226
 Magi, who usurped the dominion of Persia after the death of Cambyfes 175
 Magistracy can have no interest distinct from the public 55, 146
 Its office is to execute the law 55, 174, 351, 352
 If the people be base, &c. it cannot be supported, be the ruler never so perfect 150, 185
 Whether it be that power which above all restrains liberty 151
 Strangers admitted into that of Rome 160
 The effect of regal power committed to an annual or otherwise chosen magistracy 167, 216
 None can have the right of it, that is not a magistrate 175
 Where it had nothing to do in spiritual things 285, 286
 The ordinance both of God and man 294, 302, 303, 304
 Circumscribed by such rules as cannot be safely transgressed 296, 433
 Where obedience is due 300, 301, 302
 On what the right and power of it depends 302
 The nature of it 409, 410
 None now in being, which owes not its original to some judgment of the people 440
 Magistrates, by whom constituted 9, 62, 71, 247, 348
 To what end set up 38, 55
 Ministers of God 55, 283
 How they are helpful to nations 63, 97, 421, 429
 Under several names and limitations 89, 248
 Jewish, wherein like the dictators of Rome 98
 Punishable with death by the Roman law 144, 176, 177
 Annual election of them 158
 Have enjoyed large powers, that never had the name of kings 178
- Magistrates,

- Magistrates, how to be restrained 178. 305, 306. 433
 A particular character of good and evil ones 343, 344
 When they were temporary and occasional 363
 Walk in obscure and slippery places 433
 What to be done to those who despise the law 434, 435
 Wherein their strength is 438
 The first may be virtuous, but their successors may soon be corrupted 456
 Magna charta grounded on king Alfred's laws 12
 The Jews had none such 284
 What it obliges the king to swear to 311
 Puts every thing on the laws of the land, and customs of England 315
 Is only an abridgment of them 324. 390
 Not the original, but a declaration of the English liberties 376. 455
 The rights the nation have resolved to maintain 390
 Male-line examined 46, 47. 188
 Malice is blind 144
 Seditions, &c. arise from thence 172, 173
 Mamalukes, their great defeat near Tripoli, by Selim 156
 Accounted themselves all noble, though born slaves 390
 Man naturally free 5. 23. 407, 408
 Every one chief in his own family 16. 22
 Cannot overthrow what God and nature have instituted 21. 288, 289
 Creates governments and magistrates 24
 None knows originally from whom he is derived 27. 29. 42. 332
 Whence his misery proceeds 63, 64
 Wants help in all things 63. 446
 What makes a natural difference among men 66
 All subject to error 120. 186. 308
 Enters into some kind of government by reason 151
 Follow what seems advantageous to themselves 218
 What every one ought to be 254
 None can serve two contrary interests 281
 Are all by nature equal 358
 Where every one is a magistrate 421
 Manors, &c. enjoyed by tenure from kings 393
 Marriages, often declared null 90
 Of plebeians with patricians 117. 134. 137
 Where proved of no force to legitimate children 340
 A power must be lodged somewhere to decide them 340
 Masters, how far their commands are binding 345, 346
 Only to decide contests between them and their servants 437
 Maxims, nothing to be received as a general one, which is not generally true 320
 Mazarine, the ways of his advancement 205
 Medices, of the title of that family to Tuscany 415
 Members of parliament sent to serve for the whole nation, not for a particular borough, &c. 451
 Instructions are often given to them 453
 Members of parliament, have no power before they are chosen, nor ever could, if those that send them had it not in themselves 454
 Must take care that the commonwealth receives no detriment by their votes ibid.
 A few possibly may be corrupted 456
 Mercenary army, vide Soldiery.
 Their business is to keep on their employment 156
 Soldiers always want fidelity or courage 166. 221
 Courtiers will expose not only honours, but even justice to sale 202, 203
 Wretches, their power at court 205
 Augustus Cæsar had thirty legions of them to execute his commands 361
 Merit, men rarely make a right estimate of their own 186
 The way of advancement to honour 216
 What preserves, and what abolishes it 218, 219
 Micklegemots were general assemblies of the noble and freemen 382. 388. 423
 They set up seven magistrates over the heptarchy 383
 Of what they were in the beginning of the Saxons reign 423
 Miltiades, his desire to wear an olive-garland for his victory at Marathon, and the answer given to him 245
 Ministers, according to the temper and genius of the prince 10
 Of the devil, who 44. 56. 59. 294. 300, 301
 Of God, who 56, 57. 133. 213. 293. 300, 301
 Must receive their dignity from a title not common to all 296
 Every man by his works will declare whose he is 299
 The devils of a lower order 344
 Of God, how they become the worst of men 353
 What sort have seldom escaped punishment 355
 Of the devil, have always carried on their designs by fraud 427
 Mistakes in punishments carefully repaired by honours 120
 Seditions, tumults, and wars, arise from thence 172
 None in Sparta, after Lycurgus's laws were established 173
 That some have fallen into by the form of writs, summoning persons to appear before the king, rectified 440
 Mithridates, what reckoned the greatest danger of war with him 112
 Monarchs, who have their right from God and nature 12
 Ought to consult the public good 40
 How most came to their dignities 133
 Are not above the law 319
 Monarchy, paternal, over whom exercised 20
 Whence so called 23
 For whom best 62
 No natural propensity in men and beasts to it 94, 95
 How Aristotle commends it 102, 103
 Mixed, regulated by law 106. 109. 146. 153
 Of Rome, at first not absolute 123

Monarchy,

Monarchy, most have suffered far greater changes than Rome 125
 Macedonian, fell all to pieces after the death of Alexander 135. 184
 In what sense said to be natural 149
 A peaceable one in Peru for twelve generations 186
 The French has been full of blood and slaughter 194. 195. vid. 155
 The gentlest more heavy than any commonwealth 197
 All subject to civil wars 198
 Well regulated, when its powers are limited by law 229
 The justice of them established by common consent 229. vide 82, 83. 92. 155. 175
 Why so called 238. vide 133. 139
 Nothing in the nature and institution of it, that obliges nations to bear with its exorbitances 255
 What sort was displeasing to Samuel, and a rejection of God 264
 Paternal, overthrown by Filmer 274
 Not universally evil 278
 Where it is regular, kings can neither make nor change laws 310
 Not established among us in Julius Cæsar's time 363
 Mixed, what the best way to support it 419
 What has given beginning, growth, and continuance, to all the mixed ones in the world 448
 That not free, which is regulated by a law, not to be broken without the guilt of perjury 458
 When the mixed monarchies began to be terribly shaken 460
 Money, Charles VII. of France raised it by his own authority 460
 Moses and Aaron, the first rulers of the people, neither of the eldest tribe, nor eldest line 27
 His admirable gifts 25. 105. 309
 Had not the name, or power of a king 70. 97. 253
 Gave the people leave to chuse their own magistrates 137
 Divided the Hebrews under several captains 162
 Power insupportable to him 309
 His character 230. 311. 429
 Whether we ought to conform to his law 367. 368
 Multitude, what a right it has to change a tyrannical government 16
 Composed of freemen; the power that is placed in them 75
 None can be seditious till a commonwealth be established 81
 Those that enter into contracts, act according to their own will ibid.
 Where it brings confusion 165
 Is the glory and strength of every prince 213
 May have its fears as well as tyrants 228
 Confers on the prince all the power he has 243
 What is natural thereto in relation to government 247
 Murderers wilful, the horns of the altar gave no protection to such 295 Mysteries of state 9

N.

NAMES are not essential to magistrates 404
 Of sovereign lord, &c. consistent with liberty 409, 410
 Nothing of majesty among the Romans and Grecians to a single person 410
 There must be some used in all public transactions 441
 Not to be regarded so much as the power 452
 Nations, what their rights are 9. 327. 352. 357. 374. 376. 402. 417. 452. 462
 That went from Babylon, how many 20. 22. 24. 25. 26. 27. 33. 43. 75. 76. 243
 Natural for them to chuse governors 59. 67. 71. 155. 304. 352
 Northern, their governments how instituted 79. 80. 236. 386
 Free, never conquered but with difficulty 111
 Oppressed, can never grow wanton 122
 None safe without valour and strength 124. 378
 Foreign, called in by some princes to destroy their own people 210
 Some sell their children 166
 Slight matters sometimes bring them into confusion. Instances thereof 183
 When they are most unquiet 192, 193. 206
 The wisest have set bounds to their princes power, &c. 240. 248. 275
 Their liberties are from God and nature 242. 256, 257
 Where they have taken the extremest courses 248
 Owe nothing to kings till they are kings 268. 373
 What set limits to their patience 270, 271
 What inclineth them to set up governments 270
 When all were governed by tyrants 281
 Their safety ought not to depend on the will of their princes 316
 What are free, and what not 349
 Those that had no kings had power 362
 What shews best their wisdom and virtue, or their vices and folly 368
 Wherein their failure has been too frequent 370
 This divided into seven kingdoms 383
 None can have a power over any, otherwise than "de jure," or "de facto" 402
 Obedience due from the whole body, what 413
 Their liberties do not rise from the grants of princes 416
 Delight in the peace and justice of a good government 417
 What the most ready way to effect their ruin 420. 438, 439. 446
 When obliged to remove the evils they lie under 436
 None can have an equal within itself 438
 One that is powerful cannot recede from its own right 438
 What king none ever wants, that has a sovereign power 443

Nations,

Nations, what those ought to do that are so happy
as to have good kings 447
Great ones never ordained by God to be slaves 452
Naturalization, Rome was for a general one 160
Negative voice, how far it is said to extend 377, 378
"Le roy s'avifera," what meant by it 410
Nero, the power of the state over him 15. 287
His endeavour to make a woman of a man 50. 57
To tear up virtue by the roots 58. 142. 212
Condemned to be put to death 144. 301
What sort of vermin he encouraged 144
Set the city on fire 179. 210. 299
Died by the hand of a slave 184. 287
His character 312
His madness not to be cured but by his death 435
Nimrod the first king 19. 20. 24. 25. 33. 253
Usurped the power over his father, &c. 20. 256
Heir to no man as king 32
Slain by Ninus ibid.
No right can be derived from him 42. 49
Erected his kingdom contrary to paternal right 220. 362
Noah, bore no image of a king 19. 362
His dividing of Asia, Europe, and Africa, among his sons 21
When he went out of the ark, God gave him a law sufficient for the state of things at that time 253 None but his right heir can have a title to an universal patriarchal right 291. 332
Nobility of Rome extirpated 124
The Roman power chiefly in them, after the expulsion of the kings 134
Hold the balance between the king and the commons; when and how weakened 194. 197
Of Arragon's saying to their new-made king 238
What our ancestors meant by them 384. 395, 396
The strength of the government when placed in
them 384. 420
Sometimes called "infinita multitudo" 386. 388.
390
Knighthood always esteemed noble 387
In France, &c. of what esteem 387, 388
The present titular has no affinity to the antient nobility of England 388
Of Venice and Switzerland, what makes them so 390
Their virtue and power formerly kept the kings within the limits of the law 419
Many have lost their estates and interest now 420
"Noli prosequi," said to be annexed to the person of the king 443
Norman kings swore to govern by the same laws as the Saxons had 383. 456 Notions, common, what are agreed to by all mankind 40

O.

OATH of allegiance used in the kingdom of Arragon 77, 78

Oath, agreements between prince and people, always confirmed by them 178
How kings may be absolved from them 322, 323
Its force consists in the declared sense of those who give it 324. 415
Scarce any prince broke it but to his ruin 325
All either voluntary or involuntary ibid.
Ought to be performed in reverence to the religion of it 326. 329
What to be done, where the observation of it would be grievous 328
How the judges are bound by theirs 354, 355
Wherein that of the crown had not been kept 356
What kings are obliged to do by them 340. 373.
455
How far those of allegiance bind private persons 416
Obedience, active and passive 10, 11. 347
Where due, and not due 16. 57. 77. 251. 255.
268. 303, 304. 413
How far a good man will pay it to his prince 201
The effects of its discipline among the Romans 217
To higher powers, St. Paul's words favour all sorts of governments, as well as monarchy 292, 293, 294. 303. 304
Why it should be paid 298
Is not due to that which is not law 301, 302,
303. 345
The prince owes it to the laws, as well as the meanest subject 310
Due to parents, from whence it arises 406 Simple and unconditional, to what king we all owe it 443
Object, the only worthy one of man's desire 39 Obligation arising from benefits, can only be to those who confer them 44
Of gratitude, to whom due 256
How far the extent of it can be known 267
Henry VIII. owned it lay on him, right'y to use the power with which he was entrusted 315
Occupation, the meaning of the word 176
Offa, Vid. Saxons.
Officers, great ones in armies think only of enriching themselves 221
How their authority and power is to be regulated 304
Ought to have their places for the people's good 374
Frequently put to death by the Athenians, &c. 424
Offices, what fits men for the execution of them 65
Those that buy will make the most of them 203
Or must be turned out as a scandal to the court 204
By what means they have been often obtained 205
Oppression sometimes makes nations outrageous 122 Does people such injury, as can never be pardoned 255
Order, when inverted, introduces extreme confusion 64

Order

- Order, wherein it principally consists 105. Vid. 64.
76. 81
The effect of it 105, 106. 110
Good, not wanting in Venice 112
Nor among the Romans 114
Being established, makes good men 167
The best sometimes subverted by malice and violence 365
Ordinance, what is blasphemy to impute to God 42
Civil and human 81
God's general, and the particular ordinance of all societies 174
Of God, appointed for the distribution of justice 180
Several tending to the same end 294
Original, no man knows his own 30. 36. 38. 246.
332
Contract 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67. 76, 77. 79.
82, 83. 249. 269
Right must be regulated according to it 245
Where it would be of no value 247, 248
Of nations almost wholly unknown to us 252
Ours is deduced both from the Romans and Saxons 381. 408
Ostracism of the Athenians, no dishonour, nor accounted as a punishment 140
Nothing favoured so much of injustice 140
Otho had the empire given him, by whom 184
Was a self-murderer ibid.
Why he was advanced 187
Outlaw, or lawless, often applied to the wicked, but never to the just 253

P.

- PAPAL power, the foundation of it 8
The civil dissensions in Germany proceeded from thence 306, 307
Pretends to the power of absolution 323
Her excommunications, "bruta fulmina" 325
Papists, their kindness to the protestants instanced in 449
Paradoxes, many of them true 59
Pardons, said to be only the bounty of the prerogative 356. 443
The meaning of a general one at a coronation 443
Where granted against the oath of the crown ibid.
Granted by act of parliament 357
None for a man condemned upon an appeal 443, 444
The king cannot always pardon in cases of treason 444
Parents, how obliged by nature to seek their children's good 251. 254
Parliaments, the institution of them, and for what 79
The settling and transferring of crowns lodged in them 83. 132. 246
In France, set up to receive appeals from other courts, and to judge sovereignly, now of little use 136. 235
A free and well regulated one to chuse ministers of state 153, 154
Their great power in all the kingdoms that came from the North 233

- Parliaments, declared Henry III. of France from the crown 234
How they may be made useless 276
England never wanted them 289
The word parliament came from the French, but the power was always in ourselves 289
Henry VIII. confesses them to be the law-makers 315. 375
Doubtful cases referred to them 315. 356, 357
By writs compel the king to perform the conditions of the great charter 325, 326
Have given the crown to whom they pleased 331. 335, 336. 378. 386. 391. 397, 398, 399, 400
Judge of disputes arising from the children of royal marriages 340. 375
Have the sole power to explain and correct laws 357, 358. 377, 378. 386. 412
Ought of right to be annually 377. 424
From whence they derive their authority 380. 399, 400. 421. 423
Have refused to be dissolved till their work was finished 423
Not impeccable or infallible, but less subject to error than some princes 424, 425. 445
Our lives and liberties depend upon this court 446
What the great Burleigh, and Sir Thomas More, said of their power 453
If they make unjust laws, their posterity will suffer 456
How difficult they are to be bribed ibid.
To have their rolls in their offices, not a mere ceremony 458
What kings have had continual disputes with them 461
Parties, what certainly divides the nation into them 342
Threaten a national ruin 420
Passions, every one has them; few know how to moderate them 186
Put princes upon the most unjust designs 194
The law is without passion 316
Patents, began long after the coming of the Normans 385
"Pater patriæ," the title thereof considered 31. 57
By killing a tyrant how said to become so 34. 35. 39. 54
Paternal right, Abraham arrogated none to himself 20, 21 Impossible to be known 25. 30. 33, 34. 69
All the kingdoms of the earth established upon it 33
Government of Rome not paternal 38
Cannot be conferred on princes 49. 53. 54. 85
To whom it belongs 31. 71, 72. 274
In what the Hebrews had no regard to it 244. 256
Is a mere fiction 346
Is from nature, and incommunicable 250
Patriarchal right, women and children have it according to Filmer 4
The absurdity of it 16, 17. 43. 291. 452
All pretence to it destroyed 20. 24. 26. 33. 380
Must accrue to every father 22
Either divisible or indivisible 25. 33
Power different from the regal 17, 18. 59

Peace,

- Peace, there can be none without justice 115. 126
 Desirable by a state constituted for it 124
 Slavish 125
 What men have in their graves ibid.
 What the Spaniards settled in the West-Indies ibid.
 The name of it given to desolation 125. 207. 208, 209
 The sad one which France enjoyed for five or six ages 193, 194
 In Spain to what imputed 196
 The terms offered, if good, like to be observed; if bad, will soon be broken 414
 Peers act for themselves in their own house 454
 Pembroke, a late earl of that noble family, his saying 189
 People, not originally created for kings to reign over them 7
 Whether they chuse governors 14. 59. 62. 78. 87. 90
 Scripture-instances for the proof of it 97. 237
 The choice of the constitution is from them 86. 130, 131. 248. 334. 362
 Kings receive their right from them 88. 246
 How God deals with a people, when he intends to exalt them 113
 Of Rome, their sad degeneracy 115. 118, 119
 Their right to appeals 122. 131. 144
 Acting according to their own will, never set up unworthy men, unless through mistake 150
 The body of them the public defence. 157. 161, 162
 None ever well defended, but those who fight for themselves 162
 In civil contests they equally suffer 173
 Whether to be judges in their own cases 178, 179
 When generally corrupted, the event is always the erection of a tyrant 182. 199
 Their condition where tolerable under very cruel emperors 192
 Their hating of cruel princes, and they them 214
 Must necessarily have all the power originally in themselves 229. 237, 238. 253
 Their right of looking into matters of government, &c. 260. 311—313. 349. 423. 436, 437
 Can never fall into nonage or dotage 318
 Did never part with all their power to kings 323
 May govern by themselves 328
 Their whole body not subject to the commands of the magistrate 413
 In their collective body, always continue as free as the inward thoughts of a man 46
 They certainly perish, who suffer themselves to be oppressed 434
 That are not free, cannot substitute de'legates 450
Vid. Nations and Multitude.
 Perfection, simple and relative 367
 Persecution among the first Christian emperors 109
 Persia, their kings reigned from the Indies to the Hellespont 31
 The decrees of these kings passed for laws 87
 Persia, the just sentence of the princes about Daniel 107 Torn to pieces by the fury of two brothers 138
 Under what ill conduct and discipline their army was 166
 Petition, the haughty Romans condescended to join in one with their tribunes to their dictator 409
 Pharamond, his race in France, an account of it 336
 Pharaoh, his monarchy an act of tyranny 27
 Pharisees, their superstition 345
 Philo, to what he imputes the institution of kingly government in Israel 96
 Philosophy true, perfectly conformable with what is taught by men divinely inspired 64
 Phocion, of his death 140
 Phœnicians settling in Africa, brought their liberty with them 407
 Plato, a commendation of him 59
 His principles of government 62. 65, 66. 70
 His opinion, who ought to be advanced above all 65. 97. 230
 Plays, the consequence of them 115. 126. 146. 155
 Plebeians elected to the chief magistracies 117. 134. 137. 198
 Their jealousy of the patricians 172
 Polity, its signification 67
 Political science abstruse 94
 Pompey, his cause more plausible, but his designs as bad as Cæsar's 209
 The first step to his ruin was by violating the laws 236
 Popular government for what people best 61
 No-where dispraised by Aristotle 104
 The extent of its conquests 105. 109. 128
 Of Rome, how supported 128, 129
 Something of monarchical in them 133
 Can never be upheld but by virtue 147. 202
 Possible, but not easily to fall into corruption, &c. 149. 200, 201. 205
 Improperly what, and what in the strictest sense 149
 Preserves peace, and manages war best 154, 155
 Every man concerned in them 157. 210. 215
 States remarkable for peace 163
 Excellent men are generally chosen in them 168
 What seditions are seldom seen in them 172, 173
 How ruined 182
 Encourage industry 209
 Never hurt private persons but through errors 210. 229
 When they began to appear in the world 285
 Obedience due to them as well as to monarchies 292
 Portugal, who accounted king thereof by the English court 442
 Poverty, no inconvenience in it, if virtue be honoured 201
 The miserable condition of Greece, Italy, &c. 206, 207, 208
 When it grew odious in Rome 277
 Power (all just sovereign) from the people 54. 78. 80, 81. 89. 194. 237, 238. 247
 How he that has it is the minister of God 55, 56. 338. 353. 377. 417
 Power,

- Power, not an advantage but a burden 70, 71
 Delegated, to whom referred 70, 79, 80
 The root and foundation of it 81
 Civil, an human ordinance ibid.
 Of the people subject to no rule but their own will 119
 Of the Romans, after the expulsion of the kings, chiefly in the nobility 134
 Naturally of a fierce and aspiring temper 147, 148
 Sovereign and limited 176, 177, 194
 What, in all the kingdoms peopled from the North 232
 Most safe when least envied and hated 233
 If it has been divided, it may be so "in infinitum" 244
 The Roman emperors endeavoured to make their power hereditary 246
 The ill effects of unlimited power might cause it to be moderated 252
 What may be lawfully resisted 258
 What prince ought to have it, and what not 287
 Wilt thou not be afraid of the power? what meant by it 290
 Directive and coercive 300, 301, 304
 Why it ought to be limited 307
 Of the king is the power of the law 315, 371, 377
 What requisite in every state 320
 None can be just but what is good 359
 Over nations must either be "de jure," or "de facto" 402
 Of the king various, according to the constitutions of every state 403
 Nothing can make that inherent, which is only delegated 423 Restrained, when it began to grow insolent. Instances 432, 433
 Where it is not universal, it is not inherent 443
 How that of every county, city, and borough of England is regulated 451
 What must be in those that act by a delegated power 454
 Where it is placed by well constituted governments 455
 Practice cannot declare the greatness of authority 262
 The consequence of such a doctrine 263
 Of nations to their sovereigns 409
 Prayers and tears the only arms of the first Christians 282
 Preferments, by what means men now rise to them 205
 Given to those that were most propense to slavery 216
 Where obtained only by virtue 218
 Prerogative of kings, what 5, 65, 66
 Of birth 29
 Hereditary of dominion 60
 All granted by consent of the whole society 76
 What the most glorious 268, 373
 The utmost extent of it, what 348, 373
 Only instituted to preserve liberty 350, 368
 What is not the gracious bounty of it 357, 461
 Who thought whatever could be detracted from the liberty of the nation, would serve to advance the prerogative 461
 Princes, ordained for the good of the people 39, 58, 60, 61, 62
 Ought to be rich in virtue and wisdom 64, 65, 325
 All things vary according to the humour of those that govern 107, 108, 109
 Very few of an inflexible virtue 148, 149
 Killing one to obtain the crown 193. vide 39
 Easily imposed on by pretenders 203
 By setting up their own interest, become enemies to the public 210, 211, 212, 214
 God's vicegerents, doing their duty 252
 The best, by what means drawn out of the way of justice 141, 206
 For they have their failings 356
 Virtuous ones will have virtuous courts 204, 205
 Evil ones just the contrary 146, 148, 201, 202, 203, 216, 217, 218, 318
 How they soon lose their dominions 169, 170, 192
 Seek the destruction of their best subjects 193, 214, 293
 Some consider nations, as graziers do their herds and flocks 213
 May commit many errors in the beginning of their reigns, to the ruin of themselves and people. Instances 223, 224
 The treachery and perjury of some 242
 What those that govern them instigate them to 252
 How far their legal power extends 258
 Such as are barbarous to their own people, are usually gentle to the enemies of their country 280
 A dangerous thing to arm them with too much force 306
 Bound by their oaths and promises 325, 326, 327
 From whence their power is derived 377
 Not safe to contradict some, though never so justly 446
 An unlimited one, what compared to, and an instance of such an one in scripture 447
 "Principes," the extent of the word 16, 51, 72, 302, 388, 389
 The sanhedrin meant hereby 230
 Principles of all generous nations before Christ's time, what 6
 And practices the best way to judge men by 146
 Prisoners, ought to pay their promised ransom 326
 Private person, what actions denote a magistrate so 176, 178
 Privernates, their city taken by Plautius the consul 414
 Process, judicial and legal, what 174
 Or extrajudicial 179, 180
 Proclamations are at most but temporary 445, 450
 The danger of their being accounted laws 446, 447, 448
 Promises ought justly to be performed 326
 Even those extorted by fraud. A scripture instance 326, 327
 Property is an appendage to liberty 317, 318
 Of our kings, if they be the fountain of it 392
 Propositions ought to be universally true 13, 20
 Filmer's general one, found false 32, 214
 Proscrip-

- Proscriptions 114. 116. 122. 142. 184
 Prosperity runs naturally into all manner of excesses 122. 145
 Men have been precipitated into ruin by it 433
 Proxies, the way of using them 81
 Proximity of blood, only regarded in some places, whether legitimate or not 188. 401
 How right descends this way 397
Vid. Succession
 Punishment of supreme magistrates in three instances 176, 177, 178
 To exempt all persons from it, supposes they would be guilty of the worst 180
 Where there is no fear of it 202, 203
 Future, many do not believe, or not regard it 254. 290
 Of those the prince corrupted to desert the public cause 419
 Of those that give princes ill advice 423. 444, 445
 Whether it ought to fall upon one or a few guilty persons, or a whole nation that is innocent 435
 To what members of parliament are subject 541
 In whom the power of it is lodged 454
 Pyrrhus seems equal to either of the Alexanders 168
 His answer to him that asked who should succeed him 184, 185
- Q.
- Qualities, no more extraordinary in princes than in others of less degree 10
 What are requisite for chief magistrates 38. 41. 61
 Few kings possess all that are requisite 106
 What subsist in a well-ordered government 114
 The most eminent without virtue, reputed vile and odious 118
 Quarrels among princes for the most part begun upon personal titles 173. 193, 194, 195
 Of princes, where they have been decided with their own swords 173. 189
 What would make a perpetual spring of irreconcilable and mortal quarrels 188
 Such as arise between the nobles and commons, frequently produce good laws 198
 Ours with the Dutch 211
- R.
- Raleigh, Sir Walter, reflected on by Filmer 398
 His morals no way exact to a well qualified gentleman ibid.
 Reason is man's nature 151. 265. 308. 311
 Universal is that to which all nations owe an equal veneration 301
 Rebellion, the greatest empire of the East overthrown by that of the Mamalukes 121
 People driven to it by misery or despair 122. 262, 263
 There can be no such as that of a nation against its own magistrates 413
 What it implies ibid.
 Is nothing but a renewed war ibid. 416
 What is compared to witchcraft ibid.
- Regal power, never exercised by Abraham 20
 The first fathers after the flood had not the exercise of it 243
 Regicides, their abominable sin 353
 "Regnum," the signification of the word 252
 Rehoboam, a sad account of him 108. 224
 His power far from being absolute 287
 Had good counsel, but would not hearken to it 319
 Was not the head of his people, and why 429
 Religion, always dangerous in the times of the best Roman emperors 109
 Of the same nature with virtue 212
 The principles of the Popish 448
 Remedies to government applied according to the necessity of circumstances 117. 136. 432, 453
 What children have, against their too severe parents 254
 None to the Hebrews cries and prayers under their miseries 257
 Must be tried, how difficult soever 434
 Which most fit to be applied, the best time to apply them, and who the properest judges 439
 Representatives, how, and by whom, they came to be deputed 382. 387. 389. 423
 Whether the people should judge of their behaviour 424
 Republics, vide Commonwealths.
 Resignation of one's liberty, what 406
 Of the crown 435. 329. vid. 328.
 Resistance, in what cases justified 211. 258, 259, 260. 269
 Every one has a right to resist what ought not to be done to him 266
 Scripture instances of resisting princes 290, 291
 Resumption of lands, vid. Grants.
 Retaliation, where nothing was more just 107
 Kings under this law as well as people 263, 264
 Revenue, how granted to and settled on kings 276
 Revolts of conquered nations 121
 Of subjects or allies 122. 184
 Of Israel in Solomon's time 183. 262
 Of Absalom 261, 262
 Of the ten tribes ibid.
 General of a nation cannot be called a rebellion 413
 Revolutions, vid. Authors.
 Rewards and punishments how to be proportioned 141
 Make men subservient to ill designs 275, 276
 What called the rewards of the vilest servitude 381
 Riches, the root of all evil 52, 53. 202, 203
 When they become formidable 117
 Exhausted by tribute and rapine 122
 Desired, to gain followers 275
 From thence all mischiefs ensue 277
 Right of those sovereigns that are limited 177, 178
 Proceeds from identity, not from similitude 428
 What belongs to every man in all cases 436
 Acquired, how to be obtained 332
 How the resignation of it to another operates 393
 Hereditary to the dominion of the world, no such thing 45. 69 Right,
- R r r z

- Right, great variety in the deduction of it 88
   Universal, conferred by God and nature 37
   Where it must have been 41. 43. 49. 77
   Must be in one, or divided 42, 43
   Where it devolves on particular nations 77
   Of chusing, infers a right of making a king 83
   Created by an explicit act of approbation 84. 21 Naturally belonging to nations, not impaired by the name of supreme given to Magistrates 176
   Of proceeding judicially, or extrajudicially, against all that transgress the laws 180. 258.
   Of occupancy 38, 39. 55
   None can come by conquest 24
   None to be deduced from him that had none 24.
     43. 54
   Where to be acknowledged 39
   Of Jack Straw, Wat. Tyler, Perkin Warbeck 189
   The continuance of an unjust usurpation can never create a right 247
   Of particular nations, how it may subsist 11, 12 Proceeds from the laws of nature 380
   To crowns, what said to be inseparable from kings 97
   Must be either natural, created, or acquired 332
   Rochel, how it came to be taken 219
   Rods and axes, before whom, and why, carried 144. 175, 176
 Roman emperors, who the best and wisest of them 200
   How they were set up 285
   Empire, destroyed by the loss of her liberty 108. 111, 112, 113, 114. 124, 125. 128, 137
   Its extent, after the recovery of liberty 113. 124
   Tacitus's description of it in its declension 114.
     116
   It did not fall on a sudden, and why 115
   Her "delatores," what sort of people 114
   Subdued by the most barbarous nations 116. 125.
     143
   Perpetually decayed, when it fell into the hands of one man 123, 124, 125. 230. 237
   Its own prudence preserved it 128. 173
   Romans had three ways of dealing with conquered
     nations 121
   What raised them above the rest of mankind 158
   They only fit to be so, who thought nothing valuable but liberty 414
 Rome, whether that government was paternal 38
   Overthrew all the monarchies within their reach 38. 113. 128
   Its extent at first 73. 123
   Wherein she excelled other nations 104. 123
   When she met with defeats and ruin 105. 216, 217
   All that ever was desirable in her, proceeded from liberty 112
   Never produced a brave man since the first age of her slavery 114
   How it was composed 130
   Sought her grandeur by war 134. 160
   Her fortune when she became a monarchy 135
 Rome, none so free from crimes of wilful injustice, nor guilty of so few errors, as she 141
   Her generosity ibid.
   The mildness of her government for 300 years 142, 143, 144
   Struggling for liberty, at last was ruined by the Barbarians 143
   Not enslaved when Brutus was killed 167
   Was jealous of Valerius Publicola, and why 172
   The peace she had under Augustus 184
   When filled with blood and ashes ibid. 185
   Her condition now 207
   Suffered more by one villain, than by all the defeats received from Hannibal 208
   A perpetual spring of brave and valiant men so long as liberty lasted 218 Remained in slavery notwithstanding the slaughter of Cæsar 269
   Her kings lands, after their expulsion, consecrated to Mars 276
 Romulus, slain for aiming at too great an authority 37
   How not made king by the people, but by God 54. v.d. 362 Laid the right of appeals to the people, as the foundation of his commonwealth 119
   How he tempered the fierce humour of the people 366
 Rule, there must be one relating to the acquisition and exercise of power 227. 400
   The law of nature, is that which God has given to things 265
   If any had been given by God and nature, it must have been from the beginning universal and perpetual 364
   There is one which kings are obliged to follow 401
   None can be so exact as to make provision against all disputes 417
   Without it, society cannot subsist 437
   Men subject to none but that of their own reason 455
 Rules, set to distinguish between right and wrong in princes 39
   By which men are governed are named laws 60
   Not generally true, if there be any just exceptions against them 80
   In politics, some which ought always to be observed 136, 137. 150
   Observed in England as to point of succession 188

S.

 Sabeans, their kings, though obeyed in all things within their palace, yet might be stoned without
   it 89
 Sacred, not to be accounted so by crimes 179, 180
   The stile given to the tribunes as well as monarchs ibid.
 Salic law in France 47. 188. 234. 330. 334
   Has been in force above 1200 years 234
   Not without difficulties sufficient to subvert the polity of that kingdom. Instances thereof 340
 Salmasius, his story of bees 94, 95
 "Salus populi lex est suprema" 90. 252. 281.
   333, 334. 368
   "Salus.

- "Salus populi," to what this safety extends 318
 The end for which governments are instituted 320
 Samuel was no king; for the Israelites asked one of him 253
 What he wrote in a book, was not a law to the people, but to the king 253, 254
 Told them their folly and misery in asking a king 257, 264
 Not he, but God, was rejected by them 231, 278
 How he behaved himself as head of the Israelites 429
 Sanhedrin instituted by Moses 98, 130
 How permanent 99
 Always to be advisers of the Jewish kings 230, 295
 Where said that kings can do nothing without them 263
 For what end constituted judges ibid.
 Saul, his first sin, by which he fell 96, 99
 Opposing God's command, he pretended to fulfil it 102
 The effects of his various fits of fury 107, 280
 His vices never discovered till he was upon the throne 205
 Gave the Israeliter no law 253
 Chosen king in the most democratical way, by lot 256, 259
 How he overthrew his own right 260
 Not made king by virtue of God's unction only ibid.
 Savoy, the duke, found out thirteen halves to be in every year 415
 Saxons set up kings, and deposed them, as they pleased 296, 384
 The brave saying of king Offa 327, 401, 408
 Laws to which all our kings have sworn, continue still in force among us 328
 Severe assertors of their liberties and laws 363, 380, 392
 We chiefly derive our original and liberties from them 380, 408
 Their assemblies the same in power with our parliaments 382
 In their own country scorned all employments but that of the sword 390
 By what names they and their general assemblies were called 391
 Came hither under Hengist and Horfa 392
 How they came to reform their manners, and frame laws 408
 Their great wisdom in making laws 456
 Schoolmen, an unjust imputation on them 5, 6, 13, 59
 To what a nicety they have minced oaths 323
 "Scientes temporum," who 216
 Scipio Africanus, the first that disdained the power of the law 141
 Scotland, the mischiefs brought upon it by their contests 196
 When and how conquered 220
 Their little number of foot beat the king's army at Newborn 222
 James III. Lewis XI's apt scholar in subverting the laws, &c. 233
 Many of their kings punished with death, imprisonment, and exile 435, 439
 Scripture, the places therein relating to government, how best interpreted 16
 What it says concerning kings 17, 97, 275
 The accounts there given concerning their leaders 97
 What it occasionally relates of the Babylonian and other monarchies 185
 Declares the necessity of setting bounds to princes 230
 Is clear concerning the antiquity of laws 253
 Senate, their power 15, 118
 Julius Cæsar slain in it 108
 Set up by the people 123
 How exposed and destroyed 125
 Condemned Nero to be put to death 144
 Killed Romulus 160
 Strangers admitted into that of Rome ibid.
 Abrogated the power of the decemviri 176
 The best judges 178, 179
 And people of Rome not to be bribed 204, 205
 Of Rome like to be butchered, and for what 184
 Chosen for their virtues 206
 Of what constituent parts it may be composed 239
 The greatest part of them fell at the battle of Pharfalia 360
 Of Sparta and Venice, their great power 378, 379
 Senators and servants employed in our public affairs 450
 Sedition, popular 10
 What 174
 What it implies 81, 180
 Said to be occasioned by learning 103, 110, 139
 None hurtful to Rome, till men got above the law 120, 121
 From whence it arises 172, 173, 186
 Proceeding from malice, is seldom or never seen in popular governments 173
 But always detestable 181
 One of the greatest that ever was at Rome appeared, and how 181
 When justified by God and man 174, 175, 176, 177, 181
 Most natural to absolute monarchies 182
 From Solomon's time the Jews perpetually vexed with them 183
 To what some magistrates gives this name 343
 Seneff, the batt'e of it 221
 Servants of God, who 56
 Raised to high degrees of honour 64
 None can be members of a commonwealth 68, 79
 Ship-money, vid. Judges
 Shires, far more antient than Alfred's time, and what meant by them 388
 "Singulis major, universis minor" 177, 290
 Slaves by nature, who 6, 12, 34, 64, 90, 270
 Oftentimes advanced 64, 114, 115, 138, 139, 143, 146, 317
 No members of the civil society 121
 Absolutely resign themselves to the will of others, and why 153, 154
 What states become so to their protector 166
 What tributes they are forced to pay ibid.
 What denotes a slave 317, 349, 350
 Slaves

- Slaves, what the true badges of slaves 344
 Sad, when the worst of them come to govern kings 461
 Will always be cowards, and enemies to their master ibid.
 Slavery, what to be understood by it 12. 23. 24. 29
 What it is accompanied with 104. 139
 The produce of it 127. 155
 The Asiatics underwent the greatest 257
 A great part of the curse against Cham and all his posterity 263
 None of God's institution 264
 What brings it upon any nation, together with its ruin 440
 With a mischief 449
 Sloth in princes, the miserable effects thereof 192
 Smyrna, the design of taking that fleet 223
 Societies must in some measure diminish liberty 24. 25. 26. 60
 Substist only by order 64. 76. 436
 Civil, composed of equals 68
 How instituted 74. 80
 When once entered into, oblige all to the laws thereof 80
 Are maintained by mutual contracts 236
 Socrates put to death by false witnesses 140
 Soil, kings not originally lords of it 391. 406. 407
 Soldiers in Scripture, there were as many to fight for their country, as there were able men to fight 162
 Every man is one against a public enemy 174
 The Grecian in the time of their virtue had no equals 218
 The Christian, their obligation 347
 Mercenary, overthrew all the laws of a country 148. 236
 Often betray their masters in distress 156. 157
 Several cities in Italy made their wars by them 160
 Always want fidelity or courage 166
 Sent to the wars by force 221
 And other villains, subdued the Syracusans, Spartans, and Romans 245
 Soldiery, accounted a trade 120
 Solomon, his idolatry and oppression 107. 108
 The bad effect of his magnificence 183
 His peaceable reign ibid.
 Overthrew the law given by Moses 262
 None will say he was a tyrant; yet he was complained of by the people 279
 His wisdom surpassed that of all the people 425
 Sovereigns impatiently bear competitors 21
 Majesty, the extravagance of it in Augustus Caesar's time 361
 Sovereignty remained in the Roman people 118
 To whom the disposal of it must perpetually belong 400. 401
 Spain, has nothing save Milan, but what is come to her by marriage 170
 The civil wars there 196
 The antient kingdom of Spain hereditary 330. vid. 89
 When one kingdom comprehended all Spain 334
 Spain, how the crown was disposed of according to the humour of the people 334. 335
- Spain, the only title Isabel had to the crown, was derived from legitimation 340
 How the king may deserve the name of being head of his people 431
 Spaniards, their valour against the Carthaginians and Romans; and their overthrow by two lewd tyrants 170
 The condition to which they have reduced Naples, Sicily, the West-Indies, &c. 208
 Spartan kings, what they were subject to from their people 87. 88
 Together with their power 232
 Government, in what it consisted 130
 Preferred by Xenophon to Athens 139
 Framed a most severe discipline 161
 Never any sedition against their kings 232
 Called an aristocracy by all the Greek authors 238
 Appointed limits to the power of their kings 240. 418. 432
 Had no law against adultery, and why 251
 Spartans, whom they brought from Thebes and Epirus to be their kings 36
 Jealous of Lycurgus, and why 172
 Had kings before the time of Hercules and Achilles 88
 Sacrificed their lives in defence of their country 159
 Never heard an enemy's trumpet for 880 years 161
 Whether descended from the Hebrews, and what power the collective body of the people had over them 231. 232
 The poverty and simplicity of their kings 276
 Their legislature was in the people 296
 Stability, the effect of good order in that which is good 38. 105. 106
 Wherein it consists in man 106
 There can be none in absolute kingdoms 109. 184. 194. 195
 Produces strength 110
 Not wanting in Venice 112
 Nor among the Romans 114
 Star-chamber, its jurisdiction abolished 378 States-General, vid. Holland.
 Statutes, from whom they receive their authority and force 445
Vid. Acts of parliament.
 Stipulations are not personal but national 441. 442
 Suarez, his saying about Adam 67
 Subjection lineal, never antiently dreamt of 66
 To the power, however acquired 175
 And protection are relatives 407. 408
 Submission, all manner of it is a restraint of liberty 151
 The nature and measure of it how to be determined 436. 437
 Succession, no difference in religion said to be able to divert the right of it 25
 The eldest brother preferred before the son 89
 To the next in blood 105
 Of blood, the disease incident to it 167
 Laws concerning it 187. 307
 By the law of God and Nature 187
 The various ways of it in several kingdoms 188
 Succession,

Succession, the slaughters about it in France 191
 Sometimes comes to monsters in cruelty, to children and fools 306
 The law gives the rule of it 310. 330. 333
 Five different ways of disposing of it 330. 401, 402
 In Spain, according to the pleasure of the nobility and people 335
 Where in France it is like to be questioned, if not overthrown by the house of Austria 337. 396
 Contests will arise concerning it, how exactly forever it be disposed of by law 339
 No footsteps of any regular one, either by inheritance or election 363
 Of the crown settled by parliament 378
 Several questions arising from that which is hereditary 395. 396
 Superiority, given to Moses, who was the younger brother 27
 Not in nature, but in virtue 60, 61. 65
 Supplications and remonstrances, where to be used 434
 Supreme, the extent of the word 176, 177, 178. 248, 249. 352. 378
 Power has been enjoyed in the fullest extent by such as never had the name of king 304
 Where there was a reservation of this power in the people 311
 Sweden, the blood-royal not to marry out of the country, or without the consent of the states 188
 How the inheritance of the crown is settled there 331. 400
 Election the best title to it 332. 387
 Their laws but few 370
 Who the nobility of that country 387
 What Charles Gustavus told an ambassador there 400
 Switzers, the thirteen cantons, how long they have enjoyed more peace than any other state of Europe 163, 164
 None more free from popular seditions 163
 The laws of their country read over in a few hours 370
 How they use their delegates 451
 Sword, where left as an inheritance to families 108
 The right of appeals overthrown by it 119
 He that draws it against his prince ought to throw away the scabbard 173
 Of justice, and of war 174, 285, 286
 When the only law that governs 185. 209
 A way of killing, worse than that of the sword 208
 To what end swords were given to men 270
 The use of the civil as well as military, equally condemned by the first Christians 185, 286
 Of power, in all sorts of governments 292
 So to be used that nations may live peaceably 295
 What meant by this word 295, 296
 Of justice comprehends the legislative and executive power 295
 What the military signifies 296, 297
 Questions about title to crowns often determined this way 339

Sword, where edicts are hesitated at by the parliament of Paris, this power has been made use of to compel 458
 Sylla, the crimes of his life, and miseries of his death 199
 If not a tyrant, there never was any in the world 209
 Resigns his power, though too late for Rome's recovery ibid.

T.

Tacitus, his sad account of Rome 57. 114. 116. 127. 142, 143. 155
 Speaks of the burden of absolute power 70
 Mentions a sort of kings used by the Romans, to keep nations in servitude to them 363
 When he says the Roman laws grew innumerable 369
 Tamerlane said he was not a man, but the scourge of God, and the plague of mankind 321
 Tarquin, the expulsion of him from Rome 13. 362, 363
 The first that reigned "sine jussu populi" 78
 Came in by treachery and murder 113. 123. 137. 179
 How the people delivered themselves from him 132. 152. 198
 What followed from his being expelled 172. 269
 His counsel concerning the poppies 189
 Taxes, upon what accounts to be given, but not to oppress the people 276, 277
 Tenants, how they now look upon their lords 420
 Tenure, none in England owes any but by virtue of a contract, made either by himself or his predecessors 271, 272
 Those of turpitude now abolished 272
 Of the commons, as antient as many of the nobility's 385
 Tertullian, several sayings out of his apologetics 285, 286
 The design of his apology, and treatise to Scapula 286
 Calls the whole people of Carthage "antiquitate nobiles, nobilitate felices" 391
 Thanestry, the law of it 89
 Themistocles, his character 140
 His envy and spite to Aristides ibid.
 All the citizens of Athens, able to bear arms, went along with him against Xerxes 159
 A great and true saying of his 201
 Tiberius, his reign an uninterrupted series of murders, subornations, perjuries, &c. 184. 190
 Assumed the name of Caesar without any title 283
 His detestable lust described by Tacitus 303
 To what counsellors he only inclined 320
 Time changes nothing 171. 218
 Can make nothing lawful and just, that is not so of itself 380
 Titles of the first kings came not from paternity 32. 242
 Of princes, derived from murders, &c. 39. 175
 Some would have them examined into 39. 175
 Hobbes of another opinion 175
 Instances of ours in particular 397
 Titles

- Titles of civility have no power to create a right of dominion 73
 Disputes about them, by what power to be determined 90, 91. 340, 341
 Thought good, if the princes could corrupt two or three legions 185
 No emperor had a better than what he got by money or violence ibid.
 To dominion, by whom conferred 343, 344
 The sordid ways of attaining them in our days 385
 On whom those of offices were antiently conferred ibid.
 In what just ones do consist 395
 Several ways to overthrow most of them 396
 Kings, where instanced in to have no other than what was conferred on them by the people 399
 Whatever is given to the chief magistrate, he can have no other power than what is given him by the people, and the laws 404
 The most swelling and august, to whom given 409, 410. 419
 Trade, subservient to the end of war 160, 161
 Spartans banished all the curious arts that are useful to it ibid.
 Trajan, his expedition into the East 124
 Bitterly derided for his clemency by Tertullian, and why 299
 Whom he bid to use the sword for or against him, as he reigned well or ill 402. 454
 Treason, the principal part of Trefilian's was his opinion, that kings might dissolve parliaments at their pleasure 422
 Persons executed as traitors for things done by the king's command 444
 It is enacted, that to kill the king is so, and to be punished with death 458
 Treaties, the king's name always used in them, though they are children, or otherwise incapable; but yet they oblige them, their successors, and people 442
 If parliaments should make ignominious ones, when the session is ended, they must bear the burden as much as others 456
 Tribes, the ten, why they did not return to the house of David 262
 Tribunes of the people, their creation 134. 198
 Military, with a consular power 134. 137
 How Cæsar corrupted them 135. 147
 The most dangerous sedition composed by them 173
 Threaten the dictator with a great fine 249
 Esteemed sacred and inviolable 409
 Tribute, the antient Jews scrupled paying it to the emperors 276
 What understood by that name 283, 284
 We owe none but what we freely give 288
 Triumvirate, first set up by Pompey 209
 Trust, what the greatest that can be reposed in men 378
 Where that reposed in kings has been misemployed 389
 How kings are said to dispense with it out of the public stock 423
Vid. Kings.
 Truth, no consequence can destroy it 7
 Truth is comprehended by examining principles 8.
 Is the rule of justice 361
 Our thoughts ought ever to be guided by it 34
 The knowledge of it makes men wise 66
 Can never be repugnant to justice 68
 What are real truths grounded on the laws of God and nature 86, 87
 Kings seldom hear it, till they are ruined by lies 224, 225
 Can never be made too evident in matters of importance 334
 Of absolute necessity to keep the tongue from falsehood 341
 The bond of union 344
 They that inquire for it, must not deny or conceal any thing 393
 Can seldom or ever conduce to mischief 427
 Trial, vid. Law.
 Once acquitted, not questioned a second time for the same fact 235
 In France the king cannot be present at any; for no man can be judged, if he be 441
 Here is said to be "coram rege;" but it must only be according to the law of the land 442
 Tumults, where they do not hurt 105
 From whence they arise 172
 What 174
 Among the Hebrews 183
 Of Rome, their difference from some of our battles 199
 What reigns are most accompanied with them 206. vid. 192
 Turks, all the royal brethren exposed to be destroyed by the sultan 73
 Their greatest strength consists in children that do not know their own fathers 155
 How they came by their ruin 208
 When the Germans fled to them for protection 426
 Tuscany, when one of the most flourishing provinces in the world, now to how low an ebb reduced 415
 Tyranny, how it may be weakened 7, 8. 105
 Abhorred by the laws of God and man 40. 200.
 Brought ruin to those subjected thereto 230
 To impose laws arbitrarily 86
 Can create no right 67
 Is empire gained by violence ibid.
 The occasion of revolts 122
 All had their beginning from corruption 146. 181, 182
 Introduced by the worst of men 152. 275
 The overthrow of Spain 170
 The people miserable under all 177. 210, 211
 Never founded on contracts 256
 When it began to become odious 280
 Where it is very cruel, a nation cannot subsist, unless it be corrected or suppressed 312
 To set it up, is to abolish kings 322
 Is the death of a state 434
 Not the tyrant, but tyranny, must be destroyed 440
 Tyranny with a mischief 449
 Tyrants,

Tyrants, how they have been accounted 11. 31, 32. 58. 138
 The first king a cruel one, and called the mighty hunter 20. 107
 Consult only their own greatness 40. 70. 135. 246
 Obedience said to be due to them from the fifth commandment 57
 The difference between lawful kings and them 70. 226
 Few go to their graves in peace 70. 199. 237. 242. 269. 306
 Many would resist, but cannot 83
 Destroyed by one another 108. 179. 181. 182. 193. 194. 313. 321
 When they reign, the virtuous are unregarded 112, 113
 Fear and abhor all men of reputation or virtue 125. 179. 192. 210
 All evils come in with them 126
 Destroyed by their own people 132. 246
 The thirty of Athens 140. 175
 Said "exuisse hominem" 152. 177
 Consider nations as graziers do their herds 213
 A virtuous man could scarce die in his bed under them 143
 Among the most virtuous nations every man might lawfully kill them 175. 226. 246. 321
 "Tyranni sine titulo" 175. 412
 Extrajudicial proceedings must be sometimes against them 180
 What may be expected from them 213
 None such upon Filmer's principles 227. 317, 318, 319, 320, 321
 To what excesses of cruelty their fear drives them 227
 Whom Aristotle accounts such 230
 Who said to have laid the foundations of tyranny 233
 Do many mischiefs, and suffer more 237. 241
 Their life miserable, death infamous, and memory detestable 242
 Whether the whole course of their actions do well suit with the sacred name of father 250, 251, 252. 320, 321
 Some in removing them have cut tyranny by the roots 269
 No name for one in any of the oriental tongues 278
 He's no more than an evil or corrupted monarch 278, 279. 313
 No obedience due to any of them 303, 304
 When kings are said to degenerate into such 314, 315
 Set themselves up against all laws 317
 Called so, because they have no rights 320
 Are the worst of all God's creatures 360
 Speak always in the singular number 372

V.

Valour, the Romans, was for the good of their country 112, 113
 By the excellence of it, the greatest powers in the world were subdued by the Romans 120
 Venality, natural to courts 145, 146. 200, 201
 Looks always after the best bargain 166

Venetians, of what they are composed 131. 173
 Their relying on trade, and mercenary soldiers, too much, are forced to depend on foreign potentates 160, 161
 Their too great inclinations to peace, accounted a mortal error in their constitution 162
 Venice, the dukes, though stiled supreme, yet are so under the power of the law, that divers have been put to death for transgressing it 176, 177. 418. 433
 Their noblemens love for their commonwealth 208
 Concerning the council of ten 402
 Verdict of juries, in this consists the strength of every judgment 371
 Vice, mankind inclined to it 114. 145
 The effects of it to a nation 114. 174. 182. 194. 198
 May be profitable to private men, but can never be so to the government 146
 Its deformity when most conspicuous 147
 What England has lost by her vices 167
 Those of princes result to the damage of the people 198. 212. 214
 The vermine that attend vicious courts 216, 217
 By what means, and to what end, the vices of princes have been fomented 275
 Vicious persons, they will submit to any power, that promises them impunity 153
 Care not what they do, if they can find account in it 344
 Villains, little better than slaves, appointed to cultivate the lands, and to other servile offices 389
 Villainy, where it has been promoted to supreme dignity 38. 49. 203
 What it inspires, to attain its end 53. 175. vid. 35
 Tarquin hated only for his villainies 179
 None, that men of desperate fortunes will not undertake 182
 Supported by committing yet more 203
 What Rome suffered by it 208
 Virtue, what 212
 What requisite in kings 29. 34. 40, 41. 60, 61. 63
 Gave birth to the Grecian governments 36
 Gives a natural preference of one man above another 59. 103
 And also to children 72
 Carries the true marks of sovereignty 62. 65. 103
 Never continues in any race of men 72. 185. 204, 205. 373. 446
 Essentially necessary for preserving of liberty 104. 116. 218
 When persecuted, few will follow it 114
 No way to real honour without it 118. 201. 218
 Not to be considered, when it is departed from 140
 When attended with certain destruction 141, 142. 212, 213. 218. 298
 The Roman, of being as a law to themselves 145
 Whose will be remembered in all ages 152, 153. 168. 181. 217, 218
 Makes as many soldiers as there are freemen 157. 217
 Overcomes all difficulties 158. 167
 S. f. f. Virtue,

Virtue and strength make and preserve conquests 170
 He that hath virtue and power to save a people, can never want a right of doing it 181
 Can never long uphold what is vicious in the principle 182
 By what means it becomes popular 201
 Those hated and feared, who most excel in it 204
 Hated for its own sake 212
 Expires with loss of liberty 216, 217, 218
 Given where God pleases without distinction 225
 Where it has the advantage, there can be no arbitrary power 242
 Once blemished, makes former services forgot 303
 Who encourage it most 343 Makes the distinction between men, simply or relatively considered 359
 Men are truly ennobled by it only 385
 Those that are enemies to her, and fear not God, are afraid of men 426
 The virtues of a man die with him 446
 Vitellius thrown into the common-sewer 184. 301
 His contemptible character 187
 Ulpian, his saying, that "princeps legibus non te-netur," concludes nothing against us 374 Union; similitude of interests, manners and designs, is a link of it 150, 151
 United Provinces, so steady in practice and principle, as hardly to be paralleled in the world 164
 How the deputies are used there 451
 Have had dukes, earls, or marquises 452
 Vortigern, the last and worst of the British kings 384
 His favour to the Saxons, and carriage to the Britons 392
 "Vox populi est vox Dei" 55
 Nothing more natural than to follow the voice of all mankind 86. 436
 General consent is the voice of nature 23, 24. 152
 The consequence of one voice in each state 237
 Usurpation made the first king 20, 21. 41
 Grounding pretensions of right from thence 24. 32. 37. 49. 53. 77. 103
 Justified 49
 The greatest injury can be done to man 77. 152. 175
 What power is so 86
 By whom bid to submit to it 175
 Lawful for an injured people to resume their own 179
 And violence, said to confer an incontestable right 126. 250
 All is detestable and abominable 292
 None can deduce any title from it 396
 Usurpers, Athaliah an usurper 48
 Have their root in violence and fraud 81. 133
 Seem to be born for plagues to mankind 118
 What is lawful against one is lawful against all, that is, to get rid of them 175
 May be suppressed as enemies and robbers 258
 Some that never were conquerors 291

Usurpers, declare their contempt of all human and divine laws 349
 We ought to examine the titles so, as to judge of them 396
 Usury, the cruelty of it 117
 The mitigation of it composed intestine quarrels 198

W.

W Antonnefs, from whence it proceeds 122 War and peace, the kings of Sparta never had the power of either 88
 Transacted by the collected body of the people 98, 99, 100
 The Hebrew government fitted them for war 130. 162
 Of Charles duke of Burgundy, with the Swiss-Cantons 163
 Better performed in popular governments than in monarchies 168
 It is "decertatio per vim" 174
 When the people may engage in it justly 174, 175
 What to be accounted making of war 259, 260
 Differs much from what it was formerly 281
 There is such a thing among men as a just war,
 and why 291, 292
 Kings of Judah could not make any without the consent of the sanhedrin 295
 Whether a subject may examine, if it be just or unjust 347, 348
 Where the cause of it is originally just, and it proves successful; what right the generals have over their enemies 403
 The events of it various 411 Wars, civil, only made by members of the civil society 121
 None till the times of Marius, Sylla, and Cati-line ibid.
 Esteemed the last strugglings of expiring liberty ibid.
 The root of the Romans, what 129
 In France 135. 195
 From whence they arise 172. 196
 Pretences for them commonly false 173
 When they will always be frequent 192
 What reigns most accompanied with them ibid.
 In Spain 196
 More in kingdoms than in commonwealths 198. 206. 208
 Not the greatest evil that befalls nations 206
 The Romans and Grecians glory in freeing their countries from a civil war 221
 In Machiavel's account are a disease 434 Wards, that court, how the institution of it was
 perverted 51
 Westminster, what its privileges in point of elections 423
 Wickedness, makes men cowards 226
 Will is ever drawn by some real good, or the appearance of it 38
 The dividing of the world, left to the will of man 43, 44
 Passing for law, the effects of it 109. 226, 227
 246. 455, 456
 Where this is the rule, the prince sets up an interest separate from that of his people 242 William

- William I. elected "à clero & populo" 82. 297
 Could inherit nothing 88
 On what conditions sworn to be received 327
 In his time, our ancestors were in a low condition 375
 Wisdom, not always annexed to the character of kings 50
 When men give testimony of it ibid.
 Whose we ought to admire and imitate 65. 177
 The wisest men most fit for government 105
 Of man imperfect 136
 A kind of ability to dispatch some sort of affairs, is so called 225
 Of the collected body of the people surpasses that of a single man 318
 Witnesses false encouraged, and called "custodes legum" 114. 146
 No sufficient defence against them, either by the laws of God or man 140
 Ministers of iniquity 170. 214
 Countenanced at Rome 207
 The best tribunals in the world may be misled by them 228
 Irish 114
 Wittena-gemote, its power as declared by Camden 383
 The power of the nation resided in them 388. 422
 Women, on what account they are excluded in France and Turkey 47. 89. 188. 331. 401
 And were by other nations 47
 Some do admit them 90. 188
 What have governed kings, but seldom senates, or popular assemblies 191. 200. 201
 What mischiefs kings have been guilty of to gratify them 447
 Work, that of all magistrates and governors 55. 61
 Worst men advanced, and most ambitious to be so 51. 58. 64. 65. 70
 And by whom preferred 148. 149. 150. 154
 Stiled fathers of their people 54. 55
 Have their tools to execute their detestable designs 126
 Tyranny set up by them 152. 153. 154. 214
 Engaged in all tumults 183
 Most frequently have obtained the empire by the worst means 187
 Worst men, their principles ought to be destroyed 201
 Easily swallow bribes 202. 204
 Have most power in some courts 204. 205
 How princes become so, as also the most miserable 241. 242
 Delight in the worst things 265
 Whom they had no need to fear 293
 What base courses they take to gain the favour of weak and vicious princes 306
 What encourages them to murder the best princes 377
 Worthy men, in ill times, suspected for their virtue 114
 Ought to be had in highest veneration 365
 Wrong is a breach of the laws, which determine what is right 227
 If there be none done, there can be no revenge ibid.
 Where kings can do none 443
 X.
 XENOPHON, why he called Agesilaus a good and faithful king 87
 Conducted the Grecians retreat in despite of above 400000 men, who endeavoured to oppose them 111
 His opinion concerning tyranny 138
 For aristocracy 138. 139. 154
 Xerxes, his folly in inflicting stripes on the sea 50
 His invasion of Greece 159
 Y.
 YNCA Garcilasso of Peru, the fabulous story of him 186
 Younger brothers preferred to the elder 27. 28
 Z.
 ZEAL, excess of violence is but an ill testimony of it 163
 When it can never be capable of excess 259
 Zimri, his title to the supreme honour, how acquired 35
 Zoroaster, supposed to be Ham 32

1. The first part of the paper is devoted to a general discussion of the problem. It is shown that the problem is of great importance in the theory of the differential equations of the second order.
 2. In the second part the author gives a detailed analysis of the case when the function  $f(x)$  is continuous. It is shown that in this case the problem is solvable and the solution is unique.
 3. In the third part the author considers the case when the function  $f(x)$  is discontinuous. It is shown that in this case the problem is not solvable in general.

The nation of China is a vast country
 in the eastern part of Asia. It is bounded by the Pacific Ocean to the east, and by the Indian Ocean to the south. It is separated from Europe by the Ural Mountains, and from Japan by the Korean Peninsula.
 The population of China is over 1,200 millions, and it is the most populous
 country in the world.
 The capital is Peking, and the largest city is Shanghai. The language spoken in China is Chinese, and the official religion is Confucianism.
 China has a long history, and it has been a great power
 for many centuries.
 It has been the seat of many great empires, and it has played a major role in the history of the world.

Y
of the
You get the above printed in the night

[illegible]

Sidney, Algernon

Discourses concerning government

London 1763

4 Pol.g. 210

urn:nbn:de:bvb:12-bsb10688197-3